Remember the "baseball, hot dogs, apple pie and Chevrolet" car ad from the 1980s? Turns out it was prescient. While the food is still sold separately, baseball now comes free with many Chevys, at least for a three-month introductory offer.

That's because General Motors has a deal to build XM Satellite radios into Chevys and its other cars. And XM has a deal with Major League Baseball.

Satellite competitor Sirius is frozen out of both. But it has the NFL and NBA contracts, which means that if there's a Ford in your future, football and basketball aren't far behind. Not a sports fan? Oprah is on XM; Martha Stewart is on Sirius.

As Stewart might say, that is not a good thing. It makes little sense that sports fans must decide between every single pro football game and no baseball games, or vice versa. Nor does it make much sense that people's listening preferences should enter into their car-buying decisions.

That's one reason the proposed XM-Sirius combination, announced this week, may be the rare merger that is good for consumers.

Before the federal government approves the deal, of course, it should be thoroughly vetted. The salient question for regulators is whether satellite radio is a market unto itself, in which case a merger would create a monopoly, or whether it is part of larger universe that includes broadcast radio and an array of existing and emerging technologies.

If it's the latter — and a strong case can be made that it is — the merged entity would represent a more potent competitor to entrenched broadcast interests, one that would offer its customers a more enticing and complete product.

Satellite clearly competes with ground-based radio. If it didn't, the National Association of Broadcasters wouldn't be trying to restrict the traffic and weather channels offered on the satellite services, nor would it be so concerned about an XM-Sirius merger.

Satellite competes at a disadvantage with traditional radio. Broadcasters can offer programs free in part because they don't pay the government for use of the airwaves. Sirius and XM had to pay about $90 million each for a tiny fraction of the space on the airwaves that broadcasters enjoy. If the government insists on maintaining such an uneven playing field, the least it can do for satellite is unshackle it.

Satellite listeners would end up paying more than the $12.95 a month they currently pay, as well they might expect if they get more content. But the merged company might offer à la carte pricing options and would face natural constraints. The more it charged, the more listeners would opt for free broadcast radio, MP-3 devices or new car-based Internet options being developed.

The case against the proposed deal would be stronger if XM, with 7.6 million subscribers, and Sirius, with 6 million, were strong and profitable companies. Both, in fact, have been big money losers, hemorrhaging $6 billion collectively in less than a decade.

The most pressing question is not whether XM and Sirius would be too powerful if they merged; it is whether they can survive if they don't. And the best way to ensure survival is to let them combine. Baseball goes with Chevrolet, so why not also with football, basketball, Howard Stern and Martha Stewart?

Apple And Cisco Settle Dispute Over IPhone Name (FT)

By Kevin Allisonin San Francisco

Financial Times, February 23, 2007

Shares of Apple and Cisco Systems were little changed yesterday after the companies settled their dispute over the use of the iPhone name by announcing an agreement to share the controversial trademark.

The accord put to rest a month-long dispute that began when Apple launched the iPhone, marking the computer maker's long-awaited foray into the mobile handset market.

Apple and Cisco said they had reached agreement to share the iPhone name, allowing each to apply the name to products sold around the world.

Under the agreement, both sides agreed to "explore opportunities for inter-operability in the areas of security, and consumer and enterprise communications".

Other terms of the deal were not disclosed. The agreement represented a concession on the part of Apple, which had originally resisted calls to make the iPhone compatible with other companies' hardware.

But Gene Munster, an analyst at Piper Jaffray, said he was sceptical over whether Apple was serious about making its hardware and software compatible with rival products. "It's good lip service from Apple," he said. "I don't know what's really in it for them."

Apple has long preferred closed, proprietary systems, which lock customers into using Apple hardware and software.

Music bought from the Apple's iTunes online music store, for example, will not play on music players other than Apple's iPod.

"Apple feel that by having a closed system they can have better products," said Mr Munster. "Their perspective is they can have a lot tighter experience if they control it and keep variability out of it."

Cisco filed a lawsuit seeking to block the computer maker from using the name iPhone shortly after Steve Jobs, Apple's co-founder and chief executive, unveiled the mobile handset at a January trade show.

Cisco, the world's biggest maker of data networking equipment, had earlier begun marketing its own line of iPhone internet telephones with the trademark it acquired seven years ago.

The iPhone settlement came weeks after Apple settled a long-running trademark dispute over the use of the Apple name with Apple Corp, the Beatles' record label.

It comes as Apple faces growing pressure to open iTunes by stripping out digital rights management software that limits the ability of music downloaded from the online store to play on rival music players.

Consumer rights groups and agencies in Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Norway, the Netherlands and Sweden have filed complaints in recent months seeking to remove the software limitations.

Apple's shares fell fractionally yesterday to $89.17 by mid-day. Cisco's shares slipped 0.2 per cent to $27.33.

South Korea Fines Four Refiners For Price-Fixing (WSJ)

By Kyong-Ae Choi

Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

SEOUL, South Korea -- South Korea's antitrust regulator said it fined four domestic refiners a combined 52.6 billion won ($56.1 million) for colluding to fix the prices of light-oil products in 2004.

The country's top four refiners -- SK Corp., GS Caltex Corp., S-Oil Corp. and Hyundai Oilbank Corp. -- colluded to coordinate the prices of light-oil products diesel, gasoline and kerosene from April 1 to June 10, 2004, according to the Korea Fair Trade Commission.

"The collusion has incurred 240 billion won in damages to customers, which is equal to 15% of their combined sales worth 1.6 trillion won during the cited period," said Song Sang Min, a commission official.

During the 71-day period, international oil prices rose by the equivalent of 20 won a liter, but the four companies raised the prices of the three light-oil products by 40 won to 70 won a liter.

The commission said it has also filed a complaint with prosecutors for further investigation against the four refiners.

DOJ_NMG_0135843

"We believe the FTC's decision today does not reflect the facts and the realities of the marketplace," said SK Corp. spokeswoman Katharine Kho. "Therefore, further administrative actions including an appeal will be carefully reviewed, so the commission's announcement today should not be considered the final judgment on this issue."

A GS Caltex official said "we will appeal the FTC ruling because we were not involved in the collusion in 2004."

SK Corp., the country's largest refiner by capacity, was fined around 19.2 billion won, while GS Caltex was fined 16.2 billion won, Hyundai Oilbank 9.3 billion won and S-Oil 7.8 billion won.

Traverse Mountain Antitrust Suit Fails (SLT)

By Pamela Manson, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, February 23, 2007

Allegations against home developer SunCrest don't meet criteria, judge rules

For the second time, a federal judge has thrown out a lawsuit that accuses the developer of a planned community on Traverse Mountain in Draper of antitrust violations.

U.S. District Judge Dee Benson ruled that U.S. General Inc. and DJ Investment Group failed to specify alleged conduct by developer SunCrest LLC that would be considered an antitrust violation.

"An antitrust claim requires harm to the competitive process, not simply harm to a particular competitor," Benson wrote in his Feb. 14 decision dismissing the suit.

He also wrote that Traverse Mountain does not constitute an economic market as defined in antitrust law.

SunCrest is building its community high atop Traverse Mountain, which is in an area that straddles Salt Lake and Utah counties. DJ Investment owns adjoining land and wants to build its own community with U.S. General, a construction company.

DJ Investment and U.S. General filed suit in November 2005, accusing SunCrest of conspiring with Draper city officials to shut them out of developing their land. They claimed that during secret meetings, Draper and SunCrest agreed to create protection strips that would limit access by the two companies to the DJ Investment property.

SunCrest and Draper strongly denied all of the allegations. In June 2006, U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart threw out the suit. Within days, DJ Investment and U.S. General filed a new lawsuit that made the same claims but had a more detailed argument about the alleged evidence in the case.

The latest suit described Traverse Mountain as unique and a market in itself.

"It is the only location along the Wasatch Front where its homes are primarily located above the winter inversion and summer smog," the suit said. "As such, many homeowners have purchased in that area solely for the purpose of escaping health hazards caused by those conditions, creating a unique market which involves only this area."

The amount of damages sought were unspecified. However, a claim letter sent to the city of Draper said DJ Investment's losses were at least $40 million.

FTC Clears AIG Acquisition Of U.S. Ports (AP)

Federal Regulators Approve AIG Unit's Acquisition of U.S. Port Operations From Dubai Firm

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Federal antitrust regulators said Thursday they approved American International Group Inc.'s purchase of six U.S. port operations from Dubai Ports World.

DP World, which is owned by the government of Dubai, touched off a political firestorm over port security in early 2006 when it acquired the operations from a British firm.

The Federal Trade Commission cleared the transaction without requiring any changes to the deal.

AIG's Global Investment Group first announced it would buy DP World's U.S. port operations in December 2006. The deal stumbled earlier this month when the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which must consent to the sale, asked the two companies for tens of millions of dollars in cash and future infrastructure work at the Port Newark Container Terminal.

After Senators Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and Robert Menendez, D-N.J., pressured the Port Authority, it reached a deal with AIG Feb. 16.

AIG's shares fell 35 cents to close at $69.34 on the New York Stock Exchange.

EU Clears Private Equity Groups to Buy German TV Network ProSiebenSat.1

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- The European Commission on Thursday cleared the sale of Germany's biggest commercial TV broadcaster ProSiebenSat.1 Media AG to a consortium controlled by private equity groups, saying it found no antitrust problems.

U.S. fund Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and British-based Permira plan to merge ProSieben with their other broadcasting asset, Dutch-Scandinavian SBS, with the aim of overtaking European industry leader RTL Group SA, which is controlled by media conglomerate Bertelsmann AG. Permira also controls British TV rights manager All3Media.

An antitrust investigation found ProSiebenSat.1 and SBS were not direct rivals and All3Media's TV content sales in Germany were negligible.

"The Commission concluded that there was no risk that the proposed transaction would allow the new entity to drive competitors out of the market or to discriminate against them," it said.

ProSieben owns the Sat.1, ProSieben, kabel eins and N24 networks in Germany and controls about 45 percent of Germany's $5 billion television advertising market.

The consortium will pay German Media Partners 3.1 billion euros ($4 billion) cash for the 50.5 percent stake in the company that it acquired in 2003 and has launched an offer to acquire the publicly traded shares.

Separately, ProSieben said Thursday that its fourth-quarter profit rose by 17 percent thanks to increased advertising, but the figure was still short of analysts' expectations.

It earned 113.4 million euros ($149.1 million) in the fourth quarter, up from 96.9 million euros a year earlier.

Analysts polled by Dow Jones Newswires had expected 122 million euros ($160 million).

Sales rose 3 percent to 657 million euros ($863.6 million), below analysts' expectations of 670 million euros ($880.7 million).

Planned Merger Angers Black Farmers (JCL)

By Julie Goodman

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, February 23, 2007

Black farmers in Mississippi and around the country are bracing for a major seed company merger they say threatens to create a monopoly that will price them out of the farming business.

St. Louis-based Monsanto Co. is forging ahead with a plan to purchase Mississippi's Scott-based cottonseed company Delta and Pine Land, and a national black farmers group says its opposition to the deal has gotten lost in the mix.

"If this merger goes through, it's going to have a drastic effect on black farmers and small farmers around the country," said John Boyd Jr., president of the National Black Farmers Association.

"If this merger goes through, there is literally no competition for cottonseed, soybean seed and corn seed, genetically engineered."

The association represents 80,000 members around the country, primarily small producers, and has its biggest membership in Mississippi.

Delta and Pine Land operates the largest and longest-running private cottonseed breeding program in the world while Monsanto, one of the world's largest agricultural products companies, makes Roundup, the world's best-selling herbicide.

The deal, still awaiting U.S. Department of Justice approval, would mean a monopoly on the market, and seed prices would shoot up, Boyd said.

"It would be just like going to one supermarket and that supermarket sets the price for everything and we don't have any option but to go to that one supermarket."

Monsanto, which sells seeds and also licenses technology for insect protection and herbicide tolerance - one way farmers can help keep costs low - could not say whether prices would go up.

"It's difficult to speculate on pricing decisions in the future, but I would say that bottom line is, we've always looked to price our technologies based on the value the technology and the seed is delivering to the farmer," said company spokesman Lee Quarles.

Monsanto broadly licenses the technologies to other cottonseed companies so farmers can access the technologies in the seed brands they prefer to plant, he said.

A portion of the money the company makes is reinvested into new technology for farmers, including cotton farmers.

Quarles said a monopoly is not in the works, pointing to other companies farmers will have access to, including Stoneville, which Monsanto currently owns and could become an independent brand if the merger goes through.

"Just as we have announced that we would have a proposed merger with Delta and Pine Land, we've also announced that we would divest of the Stoneville business if that's required by the Department of Justice."

Boyd, who raises corn, soybeans and wheat, said he has asked Congress to hold hearings on the issue, but has not yet heard back on a decision.

One farmer in Mississippi, Rodalton Hart, fears he will go out of business if the merger goes through.

"You ain't got no control over it and with the cost of fertilizer and chemicals and everything that goes in to it, ain't no way anybody can survive," said Hart, 56, a cotton farmer in Lexington with 1,500 acres.

"They can go up as high as they want to go and you ain't got no control over it. It's just like the airlines. You can't control it," he said.

"You have to pay labor; you have to pay rent; you got to pay for seeds and chemicals ... equipment. It just goes on and on and on. I mean, everything comes out of the farmer's pocket."

The stakes are already high in farming, Hart said.

"Farming is risky. You're already on the edge. You're already on the verge ... Ain't no way you can survive," he said.

"Unless the government steps in and regulates the prices, we're just messed up."

Esmark: Deal For Weirton Is Dead (AP)

By Vicki Smith

AP, February 23, 2007

CHARLESTON, W.Va. - A deal to sell the Weirton division of Mittal Steel Co. to Illinois-based Esmark Inc. is dead, Esmark President Craig Bouchard told The Associated Press on Thursday.

To comply with a federal Justice Department decree, Mittal was ordered this week to sell its Sparrows Point mill in Maryland instead of the former Weirton Steel, across the Ohio River from Steubenville, Ohio, where workers had volunteered to be sold and where Esmark had already made an offer.

The government said selling the mill near Baltimore was the best way to prevent a monopoly on the eastern U.S. market for tin-plated steel. The decree did not prevent Mittal from making a separate deal to shed Weirton, but Bouchard said the company told him Wednesday night that it would keep the West Virginia operations for now.

"As of right now, our deal with Mittal for Weirton is dead," he said.

Mittal spokesman William Steers said a January memorandum of understanding with Esmark is no longer valid because it was conditioned on the Justice Department's acceptance of the sale as a remedy to the antitrust concerns.

"At this point in time, we're focused on developing a global packaging strategy, and Weirton will be part of that," Steers said. "We want to focus on seeing whether we can improve its profitability, retain that business and develop its prospects."

The 1,250-member Independent Steelworkers Union said it has been assured Mittal "remains committed" to keeping a mill in West Virginia.

"The ISU leadership will continue to explore all ideas and strategies that will benefit the union membership," said spokesman Dave Gossett. "The men and women of Weirton are survivors and the steel business, with the cooperation of Mittal Steel USA, will remain alive and well in Weirton."

Justice officials had initially ordered Netherlands-based Mittal to try to sell Dofasco Inc. of Canada to settle antitrust issues surrounding its merger with Luxembourg's Arcelor SA. But the Dutch trust that controls Dofasco rejected a plan to sell it to ThyssenKrupp AG of Germany.

That left Mittal with the choice of selling one of its two U.S. assets in the tin market, Sparrows Point or Weirton.

Justice ruled that Sparrows Point is "a profitable and diversified facility" with its own in-house supply of slab steel, while Weirton would have to develop new sources of slab after separating from Mittal.

Esmark, a steel supplier that has acquired 10 companies since its founding in 2003, is now looking at a possible deal for Sparrows Point, Bouchard said. Though the United Steelworkers has said it will fight any sale that is not in the best interest of its members, the union has a long-standing relationship with Esmark CEO James Bouchard.

The USW backed Esmark last fall when it led a successful proxy fight to seize control of Wheeling Pittsburgh Corp., rejecting the former management team's plan to merge with a Brazilian steelmaker.

The USW has the right to reject a potential change in ownership. However, the union cannot appeal the Justice Department ruling on behalf of its 2,100 union workers at Sparrows Point.

Mittal must sell the Maryland plant by May 21 or an appointed trustee will arrange a deal. That deadline could be extended by up to 60 days.

Mittal's $33 billion merger with Arcelor, which would create the world's largest steel company, cannot proceed without the sale of Sparrows Point.

Chief Financial Officer Aditya Mittal said this week he was disappointed he could not sell Weirton. So were the Bouchards, who set their sights on Weirton within hours of winning the battle for Wheeling-Pitt.

The independent union at Weirton wanted their mill to be sold because it had failed to thrive under Mittal's ownership, and Esmark saw the two West Virginia companies as a logical fit.

After years of deep losses, Weirton Steel filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in May 2003 and was sold twice in 18 months, first to International Steel Group, then to Mittal. Almost immediately, Mittal shut down the blast furnace, stopping the production of raw steel and cutting more than 800 jobs.

Gov. Joe Manchin remains hopeful that Esmark and Mittal will continue to discuss a possible deal, spokeswoman Lara Ramsburg said.

Esmark is a leader in the consolidation of U.S. steel service centers and is aiming to dominate the Midwest market for steel by buying up distribution companies, steelmakers and finishing facilities.

It buys more than 750,000 tons of steel products every year and can produce more than 350,000 tons of electrogalvanized steel annually.

Microsoft Hit With $1.52 Billion Verdict In MP3 Suit (WSJ)

By Robert A. Guth And Nick Wingfield

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

A federal jury ordered Microsoft Corp. to pay $1.52 billion to Alcatel-Lucent SA for infringing patents on a fundamental technology for digital music.

The decision found that Microsoft's Windows Media software had infringed two patents related to MP3, a software technology for recording and playing digital audio.

The patent verdict, one of the largest on record, could have broad repercussions because of the widespread use of the MP3 audio format in technology and electronics products. Devices that employ the technology include Apple Inc.'s iPod, software from Macromedia and Internet services from Yahoo Inc.

Daniel Harris, an intellectual-property attorney at Clifford Chance in Washington, D.C., said the decision "has great consequence for the industry as a whole, not to mention every company that implements MP3 technology."

The decision came from the U.S. District Court in San Diego. The battle began with a 2003 lawsuit filed by Lucent Technologies Inc., which was bought last year by Alcatel. The complaint alleged that Microsoft customers Dell Inc. and Gateway Inc. infringed 15 patents related to the MP3 technology for encoding and decoding audio files. Those companies sell personal computers that include Microsoft's player technology, which uses MP3.

'Declaratory Action'

Development of MP3 technology was led by engineers at Bell Laboratories and Fraunhofer Institute in Germany, drawing on patents Bell held on methods for compressing data. (Bell Labs later became a part of Lucent). Microsoft said it paid Fraunhofer $16 million to license the technology.

In April 2003, Microsoft joined the case through a "declaratory action," a suit against Lucent that asked for a ruling that Microsoft and its customers didn't infringe any claims and that the patents Lucent asserted weren't valid. The patents are being reviewed in six separate jury trials in San Diego. The decision yesterday was the first.

Tom Burt, Microsoft's deputy general counsel said the verdict is "completely unsupported by the law or the facts." He said Microsoft will respond by asking the court for relief to set aside all or some of this verdict. "If we don't get relief from the trial court then we will definitely appeal this verdict," Mr. Burt said.

· The News: A jury ordered Microsoft to pay $1.52 billion to Alcatel-Lucent for infringing patents on the MP3 format widely used for digital audio.

· The Background: Inventors of the MP3 format include Fraunhofer and Bell Laboratories, whose patents are now owned by Alcatel-Lucent.

· What's Next: Microsoft hopes to get the ruling overturned by the trial judge or an appeals court; Alcatel-Lucent could sue others using the technology.

Joan Campion, a spokeswoman for Alcatel-Lucent, said, "We have made strong arguments supporting our view and we are pleased with the court's decision."

Mr. Harris, the attorney with Clifford Chance, said the case is "long from being over" given the likelihood of a Microsoft appeal. He said 40% to 50% of patent verdicts are reversed on appeal. Mr. Harris predicts Alcatel will wait until its battle with Microsoft is done before taking action against other companies in the market.

Format Is Lingua Franca

"It wouldn't make sense to start suing everyone else until this case is resolved on the merits," he said. Alcatel's Ms. Campion declined to comment on whether Alcatel intends to pursue licensing talks with or litigation against other technology companies in the digital-audio market.

The jury verdict involves an audio format that has become the lingua franca of music in the digital era, used in products from iPods to car stereos to videogame consoles. MP3 -- the shorthand term for Moving Picture Experts Group 1 Audio Layer 3 -- is a technology for converting audio into digital form and compressing it into a file size that makes it easier to transmit over data networks.

In the late 1990s, MP3s became almost synonymous with pirated music because the format's broad support in music-playback software on PCs made it the choice for the original Napster, a song-sharing network that teemed with illicit copies of music.

The format remains widely supported in software and electronics products today such as the iPod, though Apple sells music in a different format that comes with technology to limit copying. French electronics company Thomson SA handles the licensing of MP3 patents on behalf of the Fraunhofer Institute of Germany.

Microsoft's Mr. Burt argued Alcatel-Lucent was "laying in the weeds" -- while Fraunhofer licensed and the MP3 industry developed -- before jumping in to assert its patents. "Lucent has been asserting these patents against the computer industry since the 1990s," said John Desmarais at the law firm Kirkland & Ellis LLP, which is representing Alcatel-Lucent in the case.

Several patent lawyers said the damages were some of the largest awarded in a patent case. The damages were calculated based on the average selling price of Windows PCs that were shipped world-wide between mid-2003 and 2005. Microsoft's Mr. Burt, meanwhile, argued the damages were "outrageous" given that Microsoft paid just $16 million to Fraunhofer to license the MP3 patents.

MP3 Patents In Upheaval After Verdict (NYT)

By Saul Hansell

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

Microsoft was ordered by a federal jury yesterday to pay $1.52 billion in a patent dispute over the MP3 format, the technology at the heart of the digital music boom. If upheld on appeal, it would be the largest patent judgment on record.

The ruling, in Federal District Court in San Diego, was a victory for Alcatel-Lucent, the big networking equipment company. Its forebears include Bell Laboratories, which was involved in the development of MP3 almost two decades ago.

At issue is the way the Windows Media Player software from Microsoft plays audio files using MP3, the most common method of distributing music on the Internet. If the ruling stands, Apple and hundreds of other companies that make products that play MP3 files, including portable players, computers and software, could also face demands to pay royalties to Alcatel.

Microsoft and others have licensed MP3 — not from Alcatel-Lucent, but from a consortium led by the Fraunhofer Institute, a large German research organization that was involved, along with the French electronics company Thomson and Bell Labs, in the format's development.

The current case turns on two patents that Alcatel claims were developed by Bell Labs before it joined with Fraunhofer to develop MP3.

"Intellectual property is a core asset of the company," said Joan Campion, a spokeswoman for Alcatel-Lucent. "We will continue to protect and defend that asset."

Thomas W. Burt, the deputy general counsel of Microsoft, said the company would most likely petition the judge in the San Diego case, Rudi M. Brewster, to set aside or reduce the judgment. If she does not, Microsoft will probably take the case to the federal appeals court in Washington, which hears patent cases.

Microsoft argued that one patent in question did not apply to its MP3 software and that the other was included in the Fraunhofer software that it paid to license.

Moreover, it argued that the damages sought by Alcatel were unreasonably high, pointing out that it paid Thomson, which represented the consortium in its dealings over the patent, a flat $16 million fee for the rights to the MP3 software.

"We think this is just plain wrong," Mr. Burt said. "They told the jury to measure damages, not on the value to Microsoft of one of the 10,000 features in Windows, but on the value of the entire computer."

Alcatel argued that the damages should be based on a royalty of 0.5 percent of the total value of Windows computers sold.

John M. Desmarais, a partner with Kirkland & Ellis who represented Alcatel, said the proposed damages were consistent with patent law. He said it was not appropriate to compare them with the $16 million Microsoft paid Thomson because the rights to the Bell Labs patents were far more valuable.

"It's like going to the supermarket and paying $1 for a bar of soap," he said. "That lets you use the soap. We were offering the equivalent of the right to make soap any way they wanted."

The jury supported Alcatel's arguments on every count except one. It deadlocked on the question of whether Microsoft willfully infringed on the Bell Labs patents. If the jury had found that it did, Microsoft would have had to pay triple damages.

"Microsoft has been and to some degree continues to be at a competitive disadvantage, as it did not file for patents for many, many, many years," said Jack Russo, a patent lawyer with Russo & Hale in Palo Alto, Calif.

That makes it harder, he said, to work out deals with other large companies in which they exchange the rights to each other's patents.

Large companies like AT&T and I.B.M. "have huge patent portfolios and that represents large and unpredictable risks for companies like Microsoft," he said.

The judgment is part of litigation by Alcatel to enforce claims related to Bell Labs patents. The case was initially brought against Dell and Gateway, which make computers using Microsoft software. Other trials are pending for technology related to speech recognition, user interfaces and video processing.

Microsoft has countered with a claim, filed with the International Trade Commission, that Alcatel is violating its patents related to messaging technology.

The largest award for a patent infringement case to date was the $909 million that Kodak was ordered to pay in 1990 to Polaroid for violating patents related to instant cameras. That case also forced Kodak to exit the instant photography market and recall its cameras.

Mr. Burt said the appeals process might take another year or two. He said he did not expect that the courts would force Microsoft to remove the MP3 functions from Windows.

Ms. Campion of Alcatel declined to comment on whether that company would pursue similar claims against makers of MP3 players, like Apple.

An Apple spokesman declined to comment. A Thomson spokesman did not return calls or e-mail messages requesting comment.

If the judgment is affirmed, the damages payment would make only a modest dent in Microsoft's cash hoard, which totaled almost $29 billion at the end of last year.

News of the ruling surfaced just before the regular close. Microsoft's shares closed at $29.39, up 4 cents, and fell 11 cents after hours.

Alcatel-Lucent American depository receipts, each representing one ordinary share, rose 7 cents, to $13.14, in regular trading, and 34 cents after hours.

Microsoft Ordered To Pay $1.5B To Alcatel (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, February 23, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — A federal jury Thursday ruled Microsoft must pay $1.5 billion in patent-infringement damages to telecom equipment maker Alcatel-Lucent in what patent attorneys call one of the biggest judgments ever.

Microsoft says the patents involve converting audio into digital MP3 files on PCs. It plans to appeal.

The news came before markets closed. Shares of Microsoft closed 4 cents higher at $29.39 on Thursday. Alcatel-Lucent's U.S. shares were up 7 cents to $13.14.

"This verdict is completely unsupported by the law or facts," Tom Burt, Microsoft's deputy general counsel, said in a phone interview.

In 2002 and 2003, Lucent, which was acquired by Alcatel last year, filed 15 patent claims against computer makers Gateway and Dell. Microsoft sued Lucent over the claims and was countersued by Lucent. A judge has tossed out two of Lucent's claims and set six trials to consider the remaining patent disputes.

Microsoft says it properly licensed the MP3 technology from Fraunhofer-Gesellschaft, a German research company, for $16 million, in 1997 and 2004.

"We are concerned that this decision opens the door for Alcatel-Lucent to pursue action against hundreds of other companies who purchased the rights to use MP3 technology from Fraunhofer, the industry-recognized rightful licensor," Burt said in an earlier statement.

"We made strong arguments supporting our view, and we are pleased with the court's decision," said Alcatel-Lucent spokeswoman Joan Campion. She declined to discuss details of the decision.

The software giant, meanwhile, says damages were determined by multiplying Windows sales and average PC sales prices worldwide since May 2003.

The same federal court in San Diego will consider the next of the patent lawsuits, this time covering speech coding, in March and April, Microsoft said. Also at issue is video coding on both Microsoft's Xbox video game console and the Windows interface.

"This case could bode ill for the other five patent cases still in the pipeline," says Charles King, principal analyst at Pund-IT.

While the verdict is a public-relations blow to Microsoft, it isn't necessarily a financial one, patent attorneys and software analysts say.

Large jury verdicts on patent-infringement cases are typically appealed, and damages can be reduced significantly or reversed, says Jeff Berkowitz, a software-patent attorney.

"This thing is far from over," says analyst Matt Rosoff of Directions on Microsoft. He notes Microsoft successfully appealed a $521 million patent-infringement award in 2003 for Eolas Technologies, which developed a Web-browser patent. The case is still in court.

Microsoft Loses Big In MP3 Patent Suit (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

A federal jury in San Diego yesterday ordered Microsoft to pay $1.52 billion to Alcatel-Lucent for violating two patents for a technology used by hundreds of companies that allows users to play digital music on computers, cellphones and other portable devices.

The judgment, which lawyers from both sides called the largest patent award ever, raised the prospect that scores of other companies could now be financially liable for using the popular MP3 format.

"Any of the companies that have licensed and implemented that technology have to have great concern about this verdict," said Thomas W. Burt, a Microsoft vice president and deputy general counsel.

Alcatel-Lucent argued that it held the rights to the technology because it was developed at Bell Laboratories, which later became part of Lucent. Alcatel bought Lucent last year. The company successfully argued that Microsoft infringed on the patents by including the digital music technology in its Windows operating system starting in 1998. The same technology later was used in Microsoft's Windows Media Player and is included in the Windows Vista operating system, which was released to the public last month.

Microsoft countered that it had properly licensed the technology from Germany's Fraunhofer Institute, which was involved with Bell Labs in developing aspects of the MP3 format. Only after Microsoft and other companies made licensing agreements with Fraunhofer did Alcatel-Lucent raise its claim, Microsoft argued.

"As a result of the verdict today, the jury determined the patents were developed by Bell Labs and not in conjunction" with Fraunhofer, said Joan Campion, a spokeswoman for Alcatel-Lucent. "We've made strong arguments supporting our view and we are pleased by the court's decision."

Alcatel-Lucent said it would ask for a larger judgment against Microsoft. The $1.52 billion in damages was determined by calculating 0.5 percent of all sales of computers equipped with Windows and lacking the proper licensing from mid-2003 through 2005. John Desmarais, Alcatel-Lucent's lead trial lawyer, said the company would ask that 2006 sales be included.

Burt said Microsoft not only would appeal the jury's findings of patent infringement but also would challenge the amount of the damages. He said it was improper to calculate damages based on the value of computer sales rather than the lesser value of sales of the Windows operating system. He also said that the jury improperly included overseas sales of computers in the calculations.

The issue of whether U.S. patent law can be extended to products made abroad figured prominently this week in arguments before the U.S. Supreme Court in a separate case pitting Microsoft against AT&T.

The verdict yesterday came in one of several patent lawsuits that Alcatel-Lucent brought against Microsoft. Others involve video-file, color graphics and computer interface technologies. Several billion dollars of additional damages could ride on the outcome of these suits, lawyers said.

The judgment surprised industry experts, who said they had not been following the case closely.

"Most of us thought this was going to go bye-bye," technology analyst Rob Enderle said. He said he expected Alcatel-Lucent to approach other companies using MP3 technology and use the verdict "like a club" to collect fees.

About 400 companies have similar licensing agreements with Fraunhofer, according to Thomson Technology, a San Diego company that identifies itself as the "licensing representative of MP3 patents and software of the Fraunhofer Institute." Those companies include Apple, Creative Technology, Real Networks, Palm and Samsung.

Alcatel-Lucent and its lawyers would not say whether they plan to target more companies, but Desmarais signaled that others using the audio-file technology could be vulnerable.

"For anyone who implements the standard, the same arguments would apply," he said.

Microsoft Hit By $1.5bn Award (FT)

By Richard Waters

Financial Times, February 23, 2007

Microsoft has been hit with a $1.52bn patent infringement award, one of the biggest on record, in a case that it warned would have sweeping implications for many technology companies involved in digital music.

The award was won on Thursday by Alcatel-Lucent after a jury in a US district court in San Diego agreed with its claim that the software giant had infringed two of its patents.

The dispute surrounded Microsoft's use of MP3 technology, a format for encoding and compressing digital music so that it can be transmitted over the internet.

Tom Burt, Microsoft's deputy general counsel, rejected the verdict as "completely unsupported by the law or the facts", and predicted the ruling would have implications for "hundreds of other companies who have licensed MP3 technology".

An Alcatel-Lucent spokesperson said there were no other lawsuits outstanding over the technology.

The large size of the award highlights the scale of the risk to Microsoft as it faces a series of other wide-ranging legal disputes with Alcatel-Lucent over some of the fundamental technology used in PCs and related devices.

Thursday's verdict, stemming from the use of audio coding technology in PCs, was the first of five due to be heard by the San Diego court in the coming months. The others relate to speech coding technology in Windows; user interface patents; technology in the Xbox games console; and video coding in other Microsoft software.

Given Microsoft's dominance of the desktop computing market, the potential losses are considerable. Thursday's award was calculated based on the number of Windows operating systems sold since May 2003, multiplied by the average selling price of a range of PCs.

Microsoft argued that it had licensed the necessary technology to use the MP3 format in its software from Fraunhofer Society, a German research concern, which was involved in the development of the format.

It paid just $16m for the privilege, but Mr Burt claimed it was "the industry-recognised rightful licensor".

Jury Finds Against Microsoft In $1.5 Billion Patent Dispute With Alcatel-Lucent (AP)

By Jessica Mintz, The Associated Press

AP, February 23, 2007

Microsoft Corp. must pay $1.5 billion in damages to telecommunications equipment maker Alcatel-Lucent SA for violating two patents related to digital music, a federal jury ruled Thursday.

The Redmond, Wash.-based software company said the patents in question govern the conversion of audio into the digital MP3 file format on personal computers.

In 2003, Lucent Technologies Inc., which last year was acquired by Alcatel, filed 15 patent claims against Gateway Inc. and Dell Inc. In April 2003, Microsoft added itself to the list of defendants, saying the patents were closely tied to its Windows operating system. The PC makers are still defendants.

Microsoft said a judge threw out two of the 2003 patent claims, and scheduled six separate trials to consider the remaining disputes. The case that was just decided went to trial in San Diego on Jan. 29.

"We think this verdict is completely unsupported by the law or the facts," said Tom Burt, a Microsoft deputy general counsel.

Microsoft disputed that Paris-based Alcatel-Lucent's patents govern its MP3 encoding and decoding tools, and said it licenses the MP3 software used by its Windows Media Player from Fraunhofer-Gesellschaft, a German company.

"We believe that we properly licensed MP3 technology from its industry recognized licenser -- Fraunhofer. The damages award seems particularly outrageous when you consider we paid Fraunhofer only $16 million to license this technology."

Microsoft said the damages were calculated by multiplying Windows sales volumes and PC sales prices worldwide since May 2003.

"We've made strong arguments supporting our view, and we are pleased with the court's decision," Alcatel-Lucent spokeswoman Mary Lou Ambrus said.

The court will consider the next of the patent suits, which relates to speech coding, in March or April, Microsoft said. Other areas in dispute include video coding on Microsoft's Xbox game console and Windows' user interface.

Shares of Microsoft slipped 3 cents to close at $29.32 on the Nasdaq Stock Market. Alcatel-Lucent's stock added 10 cents to end the day at $13.17 on the New York Stock Exchange.

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Talks Energy (HDD)

By Reggie Ponder

Henderson Daily Dispatch, February 23, 2007

FRANKLINTON - President George W. Bush promoted a major reduction in gasoline use during a visit Thursday to a Franklinton biotechnology facility doing cutting-edge research in the production of ethanol, one of the fuels at the heart of the plan.

Against a backdrop that read "Innovation Leads to Energy Security" and ?0 in 10," Bush told an audience at the Novozymes facility outside Franklinton Thursday that the company's role in ethanol production was a key to American energy independence.

The 20 in 10 initiative is a new Bush administration goal to reduce gasoline consumption in America by 20 percent over the next 10 years.

Bush said ethanol would allow Americans to be "better stewards of the environment" while reducing dependence on foreign oil.

Novozymes, which employs some 435 people in North Carolina, is not directly involved in ethanol manufacturing, but is developing an enzyme technology that the company says will enable manufacturers to produce ethanol from a wide variety of materials, including wood chips and switch grass, in a cost-effective manner.

Bush also plugged free trade by pointing out that Novozymes, a Danish firm, was providing good jobs for people in North Carolina as well as helping the country with renewable energy. He said that as he toured the Franklinton facility and spoke to employees he learned that "a lot of people have been here 20-plus years."

He said it was an example of how free trade could be good for the American economy.

"There are interests that we have in free and fair trade," he said.

The president acknowledged the presence of Democratic Rep. G.K. Butterfield, who represents North Carolina's District 1.

"He's from a neighboring district but he has enough interest in making sure that we succeed in alternative energy that he's here today," Bush said.

Bush heralded the Novozymes technology, and the ethanol industry generally, as a centerpiece of the plan for energy independence and also as a way to stimulate America's rural economy.

"I know it sounds like a pipe dream to some - there goes the optimistic president talking again," he said.

But he said he had experts on hand to back him up.

Those experts included Kevin Wenger, research and development manager with Novozymes; Mike Pacheco, director of the Bioenergy Center of the National Renewable Energy laboratory; Ratna Sharma, assistant professor of bioprocess engineering at N.C. State University; Ryan Adolphson, director of the Biomass Pilot Program at the University of Georgia; and Terry Ruse, chief operating officer of Agri-Ethanol Products.

"We've got PhDs surrounding the president," Bush said. "We've got a lot of brainpower."

Cutting-edge research is being done by Novozymes, he said.

"They are developing technologies that will enable us to convert wood chips into fuels that will run our automobiles," he said, adding that it was a proper use of taxpayer money to support research into innovative energy technologies.

Bush also briefly mentioned the importance of clean coal technology and nuclear power.

But ethanol- and battery-powered cars may be the most important of all, he said. "If you really want to reduce dependence on foreign oil, what you've really got to do is change gasoline usage in the United States."

Bush said Americans were now consuming seven billion gallons of ethanol a year made from corn. A lot of hog growers in North Carolina and around the country, and cattle producers in Texas and elsewhere, are worried about the effect of corn prices on their livelihood, he said.

He said making ethanol from wood chips and other materials would allow Americans to become less dependent on foreign oil "without breaking your hog raisers," though he acknowledged that "corn farmers happen to like" higher corn prices.

The push for energy independence combines national security concerns, energy security concerns, and environmental concerns, he said. "All these three concerns come together with technology as the solution,"

Bush acknowledged that a 20 percent reduction in gasoline consumption over the next 10 years was a challenge, but he was optimistic.

"I think it's possible to do it," he said.

The key, though, is to make ethanol more affordable, and the new technology can help with that, he said.

“Somebody's not going to fill up their car with ethanol if it costs a lot more than gasoline,” Bush said.

Agri-Ethanol's Ruse said the company was developing a plant in Aurora, with plans to gradually move into the wood chip conversion technology. He said it could provide a very good market for pulpwood growers.

“The role of the government is to stimulate thought and investment and to set goals,” Bush said. “I want to thank those of you who are on the front line of change.”

Butterfield, who has been critical of much of the president's domestic agenda and foreign policy, said during a visit to Henderson Tuesday that he appreciated Bush's commitment to biofuels.

“I believe the president is serious about this,” Butterfield said.

He said that in addition to its role in energy security, ethanol was a potential boost for America's rural economy. Butterfield said that was important to him as a representative of a largely rural district in eastern North Carolina.

Thursday's presidential visit indicates the importance of ethanol for America, Butterfield said, adding he hoped it would mark the beginning of a long-term commitment to biofuels.

At Novozymes Thursday, Butterfield said he was excited about the potential for the new ethanol technology to create manufacturing jobs in rural America.

How many jobs?

“Your imagination can just go wild,” he said.

Bush Stresses Fuel Technology (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

Washington Post, February 23, 2007

FRANKLINTON, N.C., Feb. 22 -- President Bush touted his plan Thursday to reduce the projected consumption of gasoline by 20 percent over the next decade, predicting that alternative fuels such as ethanol made from wood chips and switch grass will play a major role in powering the country's automobiles.

Bush said the goal, which he outlined last month in his State of the Union address, is vital to the nation's future. "We are on the verge of breakthroughs to allow a pile of wood chips to become the raw materials for fuels that'll run your car," Bush said during a visit to a plant here that makes enzymes critical to ethanol production.

Using more alternative fuels not only will be good for the environment, Bush said, but also will reduce the nation's dependence on oil from unfriendly nations and insulate the U.S. economy from the shocks caused by sudden increases in oil prices.

Bush wants the country to be using 35 billion gallons of renewable fuels annually by 2017, and he would like to raise mileage standards for automobiles -- efforts that he said would allow the nation to meet his goal for gasoline consumption.

"I know it sounds like a pipe dream to some," Bush said, adding that the technology for increasing ethanol production is at hand. He said ethanol will be powering many of the nation's cars in the near future.

Almost all of the 6 billion to 7 billion gallons of ethanol used annually in the country is produced from corn. While corn-based ethanol is becoming common, particularly in parts of the Midwest, it is causing corn prices to increase, affecting industries as diverse as tortilla production and hog farming.

Because of the fast-rising demand for corn, Bush said, the nation will soon have to rely on ethanol made from switch grass, wood chips and agricultural waste to produce a larger share of ethanol.

Before chairing a panel discussion on ethanol, Bush toured a plant run by Novozymes North America, which makes enzymes crucial to making corn-based ethanol. The company is researching ways to make the fuel from other materials. Bush said Novozymes received a federal grant that helped it develop processes that have dramatically reduced the price of enzymes used to make ethanol.

Wearing a white lab coat and safety glasses, Bush was led through a laboratory where researchers are developing enzymes. He also was taken to a production facility where the raw materials used for ethanol are fermented in vats. Bush peppered researchers with questions about potential bottlenecks in the production of cellulosic ethanol and seemed satisfied that the problems that remain will be ironed out.

At one point, Bush hoisted a beaker of the clear ethanol and joked, "I quit drinking in '86."

Bush's energy proposal is among the few items in his domestic agenda likely to receive support from Democrats in Congress. Although Bush has not submitted specific legislation, White House officials have said that they hope the principles he has laid out will guide lawmakers when they consider energy policy.

Bush Pushes His Energy Initiative At North Carolina Biofuel Plant (MCT)

McClatchy Newspapers, February 23, 2007

FRANKLINTON, N.C. - Enzymes culled from the microbial soups of the earth were mixed with plant scraps inside a laboratory here, fermented into a sugary liquid, dumped into a beaker and presented Thursday morning to the presidential nose.

"Would you like to smell it?" asked Novozymes laboratory technician Erin Quattrini.

President Bush, clad in a white lab coat and safety glasses, leaned over for a sniff. This, to his way of thinking, is the scent of progress.

Bush came to Novozymes in Franklinton on Thursday to tout his "20 in 10" proposal to reduce Americans' gasoline usage by 20 percent over the next decade. Landing amid a rotor wash of mowed corn stalks in a field on company property, he toured labs, posed for pictures with workers and led a panel discussion with scientists about new kinds of ethanol.

For Bush, it was another step in his tour across the country to pitch the priorities he outlined in his State of the Union address in January.

For Franklinton, the visit was a very big deal. Novozymes' CEO flew over from Denmark. The mayor was there, along with county commissioners. Sen. Richard Burr, R-N.C., Rep. G.K. Butterfield, D-N.C., and North Carolina Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler showed up. Signs around town welcomed the president, and a quartet of children on a nearby road manned a candy stand, hoping Bush might stop by for a $1 Snickers.

Alas, he arrived by helicopter.

Novozymes has become a leading supplier of the enzymes that help the United States create about 7 billion gallons a year of ethanol out of corn kernels.

But ethanol is pushing up corn prices, so Novozymes has created an enzyme cocktail that it says will significantly reduce the costs to mass-produce cellulosic ethanol, which is derived from tougher plant matters such as sawgrasses and wood chips. The ethanol can be blended with gasoline to run vehicles.

In the Novozymes laboratory, Bush moved from room to room to hear the process of how enzymes can be found, selected and converted. A man showed Bush a bottle of liquid in a glass bottle.

"Senator, don't drink this!" Bush hollered over his shoulder to Burr.

"I quit drinking in `86," Bush added. He would mention the date twice more in his tour through what is, essentially, a giant fermentation operation with the faint aroma of a brewery.

In a room of two-gallon containers holding liquid the color of amber beer, Bush picked up a jar of straw to show off to the crush of journalists tagging along.

"Straw!" he proclaimed. Cameras clicked and whirred.

"Someday, you're going to be using this in your car," he said.

He picked up another jar. "Spruce chips!" He picked up yet another vessel, this one containing clear ethanol, and took another sniff.

Bush has called for increases in funding for research on alternative fuels. His administration's farm bill proposal includes $2 billion for loans for plants producing cellulosic ethanol.

Bush also has called for modernizing the mileage requirements for cars and trucks. Outside the plant, Bush checked out a Formula One race car that runs on ethanol.

"It may be hard for you to believe," he said. "It may be hard for Americans to believe, but someday we'll be taking piles of woodchips and, using technology developed here, develop fuel for automobiles. And when that happens, that'll make us less dependent on foreign oil and better stewards of the environment."

Bush Makes A Pitch For Amber Waves Of Homegrown Fuel (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, February 23, 2007

FRANKLINTON, N.C., Feb. 22 — President Bush put on a white coat and visited a laboratory here Thursday to promote his goals for making alternative fuels from switch grass, woodchips and other plant waste.

After touring the laboratory, which is developing enzymes to make cellulosic ethanol, fuel distilled from plant byproducts, Mr. Bush spoke buoyantly about new technologies that may reduce the nation's thirst for foreign oil.

"Doesn't it make sense to be able to say to our farmers, grow what you can grow so we become less dependent on oil?" the president told an audience at Novozymes North America, the subsidiary of a Danish technology company. "I like the idea of a president being able to say, wow, the crop report is in, we're growing more corn than ever before, which means we're importing less oil from overseas."

After listening to company executives describe the role of enzymes in reducing the cost of ethanol, Mr. Bush jumped in to ask a layman's question: "So is this like a distillery?"

The trip is the latest event this week in which Mr. Bush has stepped away from grim questions about the war in Iraq to focus on domestic themes like energy and health care.

He has called for reducing the nation's projected gasoline consumption by 20 percent over the next 10 years, and he has proposed a mandatory, fivefold increase in the production of gasoline alternatives to about 35 billion gallons a year by 2017.

Corn-based ethanol is the primary substitute for gasoline, and output is about seven billion gallons a year. But industry experts and administration officials estimate that corn-based ethanol can at most supply only half the alternative fuel Mr. Bush has proposed.

The future, many experts say, lies in cellulosic ethanol, but it remains in the development stage, and is competing for research money with technologies like biodiesel fuel, hydrogen fuel cells and liquefied coal. The largest cellulosic ethanol plant is a demonstration-scale facility in Canada built by the Ontario-based Iogen Corporation, which produces about one million gallons a year.

A commercial-scale factory would need an annual capacity of 40 million gallons or more, said Robert Dineen, president of the Renewable Fuels Association, which represents ethanol producers.

The president has proposed significant increases in spending for alternative energy development, including about $50 million a year for bioenergy research, $15 million a year for grants on biomass projects and about $2.1 billion in loan guarantees for companies building cellulosic ethanol plants.

But Democrats in Congress have criticized Mr. Bush for spending far more money on coal-based technologies and nuclear power.

In his budget, Mr. Bush proposed spending $863 million on programs related to fossil fuels, a 33 percent increase over his request for 2007. That increase included more than $500 million for various forms of "clean-coal" technology.

Mr. Bush has also proposed spending $875 million for nuclear energy research and development, an increase of 38 percent. Of that, Mr. Bush has requested $405 million for his proposed Global Nuclear Energy Partnership, a plan to develop uranium enrichment with other countries. The administration's budget also calls for offering up to $9 billion in loan guarantees for a new generation of nuclear power plants.

Mr. Bush made almost no reference to global warming and climate change on Thursday, though his goal of reducing petroleum consumption is closely related to the reduction heat-trapping gases.

He kept his focus on the goal of energy security, and reiterated his support for more coal and nuclear power. "We've got about 250 years supply of coal in this country," he noted, adding that it "makes sense" to use it.

Some environmental groups complain about Mr. Bush's definition of alternative fuel including liquefied coal, which could produce even more heat-trapping gases than gasoline.

But the president appeared to show genuine enthusiasm for cellulosic ethanol, frequently interrupting Novozymes executives to boil down technical explanations into more simple sound bites.

At one point, Mr. Bush jumped in to explain that corn-based ethanol could not provide enough alternative fuel because ethanol demand was already outstripping supply.

"We got a lot of hog growers around the United States, and a lot of them here in North Carolina, who are beginning to feel the pinch as a result of high corn prices," he said. "The question, then, is how do you achieve your goal of less dependence on oil without breaking your farmers — without breaking your hog raisers?"

"Here's how: You develop new technologies that will enable you to make ethanol from wood chips, or stalk grass, or agricultural waste."

Bush Pushes Energy Initiative In N.C. (AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

Franklinton, N.C. (AP) -- Trying to draw attention to his domestic agenda, President Bush on Thursday extolled the science of turning grasses and wood chips into ethanol to lessen the U.S. thirst for foreign oil.

"If you really want to reduce the amount of oil that you consume, you have to reduce the amount of gasoline you use," Bush said on a road trip to push energy initiatives he announced last month in his State of the Union address.

Bush has proposed ramping up the production of alternative fuels such as ethanol made from something other than corn. The president wants to require the use of 35 billion gallons a year of ethanol and other alternative fuels, such as soybean-based biodiesel, by 2017 — a fivefold increase over current requirements.

The call for sharp increases in ethanol use will get bipartisan support in Congress. But production of ethanol from corn is expected to fall far short of meeting such an increase. So Bush envisions a major speedup of research into production of "cellulosic" ethanol made from wood chips, switchgrass and other feedstocks.

Each year, the United States consumes about 7 billion gallons of ethanol, made primarily from corn. The demand for corn for agricultural uses as well as energy, however, is causing corn prices to rise.

"The problem is we've got a lot of hog growers around the United States, and a lot of them in North Carolina, who are beginning to feel the pinch as a result of high corn prices," said Bush, who participated in a panel on cellulosic ethanol at Novozymes North America Inc., which is researching enzymes to break down crops such as corn waste and spruce chips to produce ethanol.

"The question, then, is how do you achieve your goal of less dependence on oil without breaking your ... hog farmers?" Bush said. "Here's how: You develop new technologies that will enable you to make ethanol from wood chips, or stalk grass or agriculture waste."

Bush also said that a lot of private money is being invested in new energy technologies, and the federal government is spending money to develop new battery technology that will allow motorists to drive short distances on battery power instead of gasoline.

"Someday you're going to be able to get in your car, particularly if you're a big city person, and drive 40 miles on a battery," he said. "And by the way, your car doesn't have to look like a golf cart. It could be a pickup truck.

"That technology is around the corner, and if we're able to drive the first 40 miles, or say 20 miles ... there are a lot of city folks who won't have to use a drop of gasoline on a daily basis."

Before the panel discussion, Bush toured laboratories at Novozymes. In one room, the president held up a beaker of nearly complete ethanol, sniffed it and laughed: "I quit drinking in 1986," he said.

Then he turned serious. "Someday you're going to be able to use this in your car," Bush said.

Outside, Bush was shown a blue and green stock car that runs on ethanol. He leaned down and fiddled with the wheel a couple times, but didn't climb down into the tiny driver's seat.

Bush Gets A Whiff Of Alternative Fuel (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

FRANKLINTON, N.C. — President Bush, who frequently jokes about his undistinguished record as a history major at Yale, is devoting considerable time these days to matters scientific.

Four weeks ago, he toured a chemical plant in Delaware. Earlier this month he visited a Virginia computer-chip manufacturer. On Wednesday, at a hospital in Tennessee, he watched a video of a surgical robot excising cancerous tissue, prompting his host to ask, "You OK with the blood?"

And Thursday, he studied what it would take to put cellulosic ethanol in your fuel tank. It's made when enzymes or bacteria break down agricultural waste, switch grass, wood chips and other forms of biomass. Scientists hope the process that turns plants into a burnable liquid can be harnessed to economically produce at least a partial substitute for fossil fuels.

The president has been talking about this technology for more than a year and has made it a centerpiece of his 2007 domestic policy agenda, built around proposals to reduce U.S. gasoline consumption by 20% in 10 years by developing renewable and alternative fuels and increasing reliance on nuclear energy.

His proposals would require drivers to use 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels by 2017, up from the current 5 billion gallons. It would be a key to trimming U.S. reliance on foreign oil, which Bush sees as a national security liability, and to reducing carbon emissions, which are released when oil products are burned and are blamed by most scientists as a factor in global warming.

"I know it sounds like a pipe dream to some — you know, there goes the optimistic president talking again," said Bush, describing himself as having been "just a history major."

But the scientists alongside him during his visit to Novozymes North America Inc. "are providing the brainpower necessary to help plants like this develop technologies that will enable us to convert wood chips into fuels that are running automobiles," he said.

Bush toured the laboratories and factory where enzymes are produced and used to quicken the transformation of plant starch into fermentable sugars, a key step in producing ethanol.

The Union of Concerned Scientists, a nonprofit organization that focuses on environmental and other issues and often disagrees with Bush, said its analysis indicated that if Bush's energy goals were met primarily by using ethanol, global warming pollution could be reduced by 160 million metric tons in 2017 — an amount it likened to taking nearly 24 million current-model cars and trucks off the roads.

In recent weeks, Bush has made stops across the country in an effort to put the media spotlight on his domestic policies — he discussed environmental issues in Shenandoah National Park in Virginia and his healthcare proposals in Tennessee, for example — instead of the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq. Here in North Carolina, he spent about an hour and a half immersed in the efforts to expand the use of biofuels.

Specifically, Bush focused on the potential, still under development, to use enzymes to help convert such agricultural waste as cornhusks and weed-like switch grass into cellulosic ethanol, rather than increasing the demand for corn.

"The demand for corn, because of agricultural use and now energy use, is causing corn prices to go up," he said, noting that hog farmers and cattle ranchers — both of whom use corn as feedstock — were feeling the pinch. "The question is, how do you achieve your goal of less dependence on oil without breaking … the people dependent on corn?"

The answer, he said, is the technology being developed at companies like Novozymes.

On his tour of the facilities, Bush said the fermentation smell and steel vats reminded him of a distillery.

As he held up a beaker of ethanol and sniffed it, he said with a laugh, "I quit drinking in 1986" — and then added: "Someday you're going to be able to use this in your car."

Bush Visits Franklinton Biotech (RNO)

Raleigh News & Observer, February 23, 2007

President Bush arrived at Novozymes, a biotechnology company about 20 miles north of Raleigh by helicopter this morning, landing in a mowed cornfield owned by the company.

Inside the company, he donned a white lab coat with his name and the company's name and went from room to room learning about how the company works to develop biotechnology.

Outside the building, he checked out of a life-size race car powered by ethanol, then made his way to a warehouse, where he led a panel discussion about alternative fuels and his "20 in 10" plan that urges every American to reduce fuel usage by 20 percent in 10 years.

In the audience were about 200 employees and guests in the company.

Afterward, he greeted people along the rope line and then boarded his helicopter just after 1 p.m.

A Presidential Pat On The Back (DHS)

By William West

Durham Herald-Sun, February 23, 2007

DURHAM -- Forgive Durham's Jamie Lathan if he feels humbled right now.

After all, it's not everyday someone gets to meet and chat briefly with the leader of the free world on the tarmac by Air Force One -- plus have President George W. Bush himself turn and wave to your mother, your father and your younger brother standing nearby in the crowd of spectators.

That's precisely what happened to Lathan, 28, a mentor who on Thursday joined an elite list of more than 500 people nationally who have received the President's Volunteer Service Award for making a difference in the lives of others.

Amid a morning burst of sunshine, Bush presented a ceremonial box containing a pin to Lathan moments before leaving Raleigh-Durham International Airport via helicopter to tour an alternative-energy plant in Franklinton.

"It was amazing. It was amazing," Lathan said immediately afterward, affixing the pin to the lapel of his dark suit jacket.

Lathan said Bush told him "America is what it is today because of people like me volunteering and giving their time and their efforts."

Lathan said he told the commander-in-chief he was praying for him.

Lathan is a mentor at the Youth Life Learning Center of Durham, an outreach program originally founded by King's Park International Church.

Lathan credited his parents, Arthur and Carrie Lathan; his younger brother, Ken Lathan; and the young people he serves.

He also praised all people who serve as volunteers.

"Words just can't express my feelings," Arthur Lathan said of Thursday's occasion.

"I'm absolutely elated -- elated," he father added, putting special emphasis on the word "elated." "We're just so excited and we're happy for him because he is just deserving of it."

"I am speechless, speechless," Carrie Lathan said. "I give God the glory."

She said a photo of Jamie Lathan with Bush is soon going to become a fixture in the family household.

Arthur Lathan, 59, was an engineer with the South Carolina Department of Transportation before retiring.

Carrie Lathan, 57, worked for a textile company before retiring.

The couple, who have been married 33 years, made the trip from their home in Winnsboro, S.C., north of Columbia.

Ken Lathan, 26, made the trip from the Atlanta area, where he works as a guidance counselor.

"It's one of those things," he said. "As young people say, 'It's cool' to actually see my older brother and the president of the United States waving at us. It's something."

On Tuesday, Jamie Lathan had just finished teaching a U.S. history class at the N.C. School of Science and Mathematics when he received word of the award from the White House.

Lathan has been a mentor for four years at the Youth Life Learning Center, which benefits children and families living in low-income environments through after-school programs and leadership clubs.

Each week, he mentors at-risk youth in academics and character education.

And he takes students to cultural arts performances and lectures on leadership at N.C. Central University.

Additionally, he helped establish the Teen Leadership Club, an outreach program for young men from the Cornwallis community.

Through the club, Lathan mentors young men about the importance of education, leadership and decision-making skills and challenges students to take responsibility for their families and communities.

Lathan has become a center of much news and official attention.

Earlier Thursday at RDU, he visited with U.S. Sen. Richard Burr, R-N.C.

Lathan told Burr he believes "we need adults who have made it" need to go back and guide the young.

The two talked by a parcel company building amid security so intense that law enforcement officers were using dogs to sniff nearby conveyor belts and a forklift for any dangerous materials, while heavily armed security personnel stood on the building's rooftop.

Helicopters soon landed on the tarmac, and Burr would ride in one of them with Bush to Franklinton.

"As I try to tell school kids when they ask me what it's like to go to the White House and meet the president, it's like going to the principal's office," Burr said before leaving RDU.

Then he added with a smile, "You know exactly where you're going. You just don't know what the topic is yet."

Where Bush Would Steer Energy R&D (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

Christian Science Monitor, February 23, 2007

Some critics question proposed federal spending hikes for nuclear research.

If new technology is a key answer to global warming and America's addiction to oil, then President Bush's proposal to boost federal spending on energy R&D – by no less than 30 percent in fiscal 2008 – would seem a welcome step.

In the new $2.7 billion budget plan, R&D dollars allotted to the US Department of Energy (DOE) continue a transition toward research that will help cut greenhouse gases.

But overall federal spending on energy research in real dollars is only one-third what it was at its 1978 peak, according to a Harvard University analysis. Some also question the administration's emphasis on nuclear research, saying other promising technologies could be applied sooner to climate and energy-security issues.

"The new DOE budget doesn't reflect the big increase in public concern about greenhouse gases," says energy expert Richard Newell, formerly a senior economist on the President's Council of Economic Advisers, now at Duke University in North Carolina.

Because the federal government remains the largest investor in energy R&D, its spending priorities are of keen interest to scientists, environmentalists, energy entrepreneurs, utilities, and the general public – especially as concerns rise about both climate change and energy security. As might be expected, the new budget proposal has a host of critics. Among the concerns:

·Next year's budget request would boost funding for biofuel, clean-coal, battery, and solar technologies. But it eliminates research for hydropower and geo-thermal, two renewable energy sources.

·Spending on energy-efficiency programs, which in the past led to low-power refrigerators and energy-saving compact fluorescent bulbs, would drop.

·There would be a fourfold increase from 2006 in spending for nuclear-fuel reprocessing, a practice that many experts say does little to replace oil and remains years from commercialization.

Taken together, the budget request breaks little new ground in terms of fighting global warming or the nation's reliance on foreign oil, many experts say.

"There simply is no new sense of urgency in this energy R&D budget," says Kelly Gallagher, director of the Energy Technology Innovation Project at Harvard University. "Growth for solar, biofuels, and clean-coal research is positive. But overall funding is not nearly equal to the challenge."

Resources devoted to climate change and energy security "are largely anemic," says Jason Grumet, executive director of the National Commission on Energy Policy, a group of energy experts that recommends doubling federal energy-research funding.

Energy Department officials disagree.

"This year's budget request supports the president's energy initiative to accelerate the deployment of renewable energy technology, such as biomass, hydrogen, and solar energy," says Megan Barnett, a DOE spokeswoman. The budget "builds on our commitment to strengthen global energy security by making investment to diversify our energy resources, expand our nation's scientific know-how, and continue to invest in energy that can reduce our carbon footprint," she says.

Is R&D government's job?

The overall decline in federal research dollars since the late 1970s is troubling to many, but not to everyone. Some argue that government is best left out of the energy research business because it's no good at picking winning technologies. The nation has received little in return for its massive investment in energy-technology research since 1978, these analysts say.

"If the utility industry wants clean coal, they can figure out themselves how to have cleaner coal," says Myron Ebell of the Competitive Enterprise Institute, a Washington think tank. "We don't think government-sponsored technology has a very good track record. Markets work better."

Others cite studies that indicate benefits to government involvement. A 2004 National Research Council (NRC) study calculated a historically good return on several categories of energy technology investment. Energy efficiency, for instance, showed a $30 billion return on investment of $7 billion – or $4 for every $1 invested in it since 1978, according to the report.

Innovations flowing from federal research include compact fluorescent light bulbs and refrigerators that use only one-third the electricity of earlier models. These and other gains have helped slash America's "energy intensity," the amount of energy spending per dollar of economic output, economists say.

Funding for energy-efficiency technology at DOE has seen a "substantial decline" during the Bush years, says Ms. Gallagher. Even renewable-energy funding has been only about flat, after inflation is considered, she says. She and others question whether funding for nuclear technology is robbing efficiency and renewable research budgets – and even funds for "clean" coal.

'Clean' coal's future

The ability to capture carbon dioxide (the major gas tied to global warming) from future coal-fired power plants and store it underground is critical to the future of using massive US coal reserves. If research doesn't reveal how CO2 can be held underground, then those reserves are at risk, experts say.

Even so, funding for "carbon sequestration" research is up a modest 7 percent since last year to $79 million. That's dwarfed by a $395 million budget request for nuclear-fuel reprocessing – a 400 percent jump from 2006. The request for nuclear-fusion research is up 34 percent from this year, to $428 million.

"There's no way fusion is going to be commercial even in decades – and we should not be robbing Peter to pay Paul," says Carol Werner of the Environmental and Energy Study Institute in Washington. "We should be deploying technology that can delivered now and over the next 15 years. Fusion is not one of those."

Still, she's glad to see clean-coal research getting more funding. DOE plans to build an almost-emissions-free "FutureGen" plant, a $1 billion coal-fired power plant, in Texas or Illinois by 2012. It would capture carbon dioxide – a precursor to storing the gas underground.

FutureGen would get $109 million, double last year's request. Likewise, funding for biomass research, which includes ethanol made from switchgrass and crops other than corn, would double since 2006, and solar funding would rise 80 percent. It's good, but it's not enough, say experts.

Federal R&D funding is vital for pilot projects for noncorn-based ethanol and carbon sequestration, in particular, says Robert Nordhaus, an expert on energy technology research at Van Ness Feldman, a Washington law firm. "We're ... betting on carbon sequestration for keeping coal going without really moving quickly ahead on the sequestration project," he says.

A major problem has been that priorities and funding levels change continually, "which makes it difficult to have a coherent technology program," Mr. Nordhaus says.

A report last week by the Electric Power Research Institute, the industry's research arm, cited the urgency of energy research to addressing global warming. CO2 emissions from the coal-burning US electric-utility sector could be cut to 1990 levels within 25 years, the report said. But that can happen only with "accelerated investment in electric technology R&D and aggressive deployment of the resulting technologies," the EPRI report states.

Car Mpg Ratings Going Down (USAT)

By James R. Healey

USA Today, February 23, 2007

Fuel-saving gasoline-electric hybrid cars don't save as much fuel as thought, according to new government fuel-economy ratings available to the public for the first time.

The new ratings go into effect beginning with 2008 models, a few of which will soon be on sale. But now it's possible to tell what rating 2007 and older models would get using the '08 standards.

The government's fuel-economy website has a program than makes the comparison. The site: www.fueleconomy.gov. Click on the button that says "Compare Old and New MPG Ratings." It shows that vehicles typically bought for their fuel efficiency use significantly more fuel than the previous ratings have said.

Toyota's Prius, the best-known and best-selling gas-electric car in the USA, drops to 48 miles per gallon in the city under the '08 testing procedure, from a 60 mpg rating under the current system — a 20% decline. Its highway mileage rating falls about 12%, to 45 mpg.

The Ford Escape hybrid, which uses a gasoline-electric drive system similar to Toyota's, goes down about 12%.

"What the cars get hasn't changed. It's just the numbers on the sticker," says Toyota spokesman Mike Michels. The lowered Prius rating is "probably more reflective of real-world experience," he says. "We hear people getting 46 to 50. I have one, and I get 48.

"If the (new) numbers contribute to customer satisfaction, that's a good thing," Michels says.

"I got near 60 (mpg) on the first tank, then never anywhere near that after," says Martha Ehrenfeld, a teacher who lives in San Francisco. The 48 mpg rating "makes me feel better, because that's about what I get. I was wondering what I was doing wrong. It's still better than most cars."

Tests the government has used for mileage estimates were created in the 1970s and haven't reflected today's driving environment. They have assumed, for instance, that people don't use air conditioning and don't drive more than about 60 mph.

After years of complaints from motorists and environmental activists that the Environmental Protection Agency estimates were too optimistic, the agency announced last year that it had come up with tests that include faster driving speeds, quicker acceleration, hotter and colder temperatures, and the use of air conditioning. It said it expected mileage numbers to drop about 10% when all types of vehicles and drivetrains were considered.

The change is good news for hybrid owners, says Bradley Berman, editor of HybridCars.com and owner of a 2006 Prius and 2003 Civic hybrid.

"It's great that consumers will have a better sense of what they may expect on the road," he says. Berman says he gets gas mileage in the 40s on his Prius in short city drives near his Berkeley, Calif., home and a bit less on his Civic.

City To Pay $1.5 Million In Coal Gas Site Agreement (LMDS)

By Jolene Stevens

Le Mars (IA) Daily Sentinel, February 23, 2007

Le Mars City Council members Tuesday approved an agreement with the U.S. Justice Department on the nearly five-year-old dispute centering on clean-up of contamination at the former Le Mars Coal Gas site.

The agreement, as outlined by City Attorney Joe Flannery, calls for the city to pay $1.5 million in clean-up response costs plus additional interest. Payments are to be made in three increments, the first $500,000 to be paid on or before July 31, 2007.

(Advertisement)

Two additional $500,000 payments will be made, upon final federal acceptance of the pact, by April 22, 2008 and April 22, 2008. MidAmerican Energy has agreed to pay $3.1 million in response cost stemming from the clean-up. The coal gas site is located at the northwest corner of the intersection of Fourth Avenue and First Street Northeast where currently the Le Mars street department building sits.

The agreement, after publication in the Federal Register, will then be ruled on in Federal Court in Sioux City. Councilman John Rexwinkle, a MidAmerican employee, emphasized during Tuesday's meeting that he had excused himself from any and all discussions that have taken place on the agreement talks.

Flannery told the council that had members not approved the agreement which stops all future costs, the city of Le Mars' could well "be pretty much out on a limb" with regard to future liability and costs The liability, he said, could well be expected to reach the $6 to $7 million dollar range with future court battles likely. At the same time, he said, the probability would also exist that MidAmerican would ask for the $3.5 million that is its share of the settlement.

Councilman Rex Knapp noted that some $6 to $7 million has already been spent by contractors in the clean-up, a figure paid in one way or another by citizens through either property tax, income tax or rising MidAmerican rates.

Responding to a question from Councilman Ken Nelson, Flannery said it was his opinion that should the city make future plans to remove a structure on the coal gas site, the property could most likely use the area for a green site if no invasive site work was performed there. However, Flannery added, if anything invasive was undertaken, officials of the DNR and EPA would have to be on hand and assume responsibility for the work.

BP Employee Deleted Files From Computer (FT)

By Sheila McNulty

Financial Times, February 23, 2007

A BP employee has admitted destroying documents after plaintiffs' lawyers subpoenaed her laptop on an anonymous tip that she had information useful in the lawsuits against the UK oil company arising from its fatal refinery explosion.

Court records show that on November 3 2006, plaintiffs' lawyers subpoenaed Susan Moore, BP regulatory affairs manager, requesting certain documents and the laptop she has used for the past two to three years in her work for BP.

The subpoena specifically instructed BP: "You are urged not to destroy or attempt to destroy, delete, erase, or otherwise alter any of the electronic data, data files, meta data, media, records, charts, forms, or other documents stored on Ms Moore's hard drive.''

When plaintiffs' lawyers questioned Ms Moore on January 26 2007, a transcript revealed, she said BP had not shown her the subpoena until earlier in the week, and that she had deleted e-mails in the two months after the subpoena.

She did not know if she had deleted text files, did not think she had deleted folders but did not recall whether she had wiped presentations.

"I can't speculate on why someone might think my laptop would be useful,'' Ms Moore said. "To the best of my knowledge, I have not deleted information relative to this case.''

Yet Joseph Gourrier, the plaintiffs' attorney questioning Ms Moore, responded, "It's not up to you to determine what would be relevant to this case.''

The case was filed against BP by plaintiffs' lawyers on behalf of the 15 people killed and 500 injured when BP's Texas City refinery exploded in 2005.

Brent Coon, the lead plaintiffs' lawyer in the case, said judges had a tremendous amount of discretion in determining if there had been abuse of process.

Once a subpoena has been served, deleting documents created an inference that they were prejudicial, and the burden shifted to BP to prove the deleted files were irrelevant to the litigation.

Judge Susan Criss ruled that BP had to produce the deleted documents by Friday.

"We have agreed to deliver Ms Moore's hard drive to a third-party expert who will determine what has been deleted,'' said BP spokesman Ronnie Chappell. "If we find anything relevant to the case, we will turn it over to plaintiffs counsel or the court.''

"No one at BP has been instructed to delete relevant documents,'' he said, adding, "We have made it clear that staff are to preserve relevant documents, including relevant e-mails.''

GAO: Fuel Tank Cleanup Could Cost $12B (AP)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

It will cost at least $12 billion to clean up contamination from tens of thousands of gasoline storage tanks that are leaking underground, congressional auditors say.

That is far more than the $72 million that Congress and the Bush administration have provided each year, according to the report Thursday from the General Accountability Office.

The Environmental Protection Agency, which oversees the cleanups, has already spent more than $10 billion to reduce the contamination over the past 20 years caused by hundreds of thousands of leaking tanks, many of them found at gas stations and convenience stores.

Yet some 117,000 faulty tanks still await cleanups, according to the latest figures current as of September 2005.

The GAO's $12 billion estimate would pay to remove 54,000 leaks from underground storage tanks that are either abandoned or no one can be held accountable for cleaning up. Another 63,000 leaking tanks would be paid for by pump stations, store owners or other operators of the leaking tanks, along with insurers and state funds, according to the GAO.

The problem is growing, however. Forty-three states said they expect to find 16,700 new leaks in the next five years, many requiring at least some federal money for the cleanups.

The lag in cleanups isn't necessarily due to lack of money, according to the GAO.

Every time a motorist pays for a gallon of gas, a tenth of a penny goes into a trust fund to remove the contamination. The fund now has about $2.6 billion and is expected to reach $3 billion before the end of 2008. Congress created the trust fund in 1986 because of concerns about contamination from leaking tanks at gas stations, but annually only a small fraction has been appropriated for cleanups. Most has sat in the Treasury to help counter federal budget deficits.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who chairs the House Energy and Commerce Committee and who released the GAO report on Thursday, called the situation an "inexplicable failure to use available resources to speed the cleanup of pollution that is likely to spread."

The failure to clean up the tank waste is "contaminating our water supplies with MTBE and other carcinogens, unnecessarily risking public health," said Rep. Hilda Solis, D-Calif., who along with Dingell had requested the report.

Leaking underground gasoline tanks for years have been blamed for much of the MTBE — or methyl tertiary-butyl ether — found in drinking water supplies in at least 36 states. More than 150 lawsuits have been filed seeking damages because of problems with MTBE, which until recently has been a widespread gasoline additive that helped curb air pollution.

The GAO report found some states' financial assurance funds lack the money to pay for timely tank cleanups. It said tank owners covered under the state programs usually pay only a small deductible when tanks leak, with the government picking up most of the tab.

The Energy Policy Act of 2005 required underground storage tanks to be inspected every three years. The EPA is drafting guidelines for how the agency and states should comply with the new inspection requirements, said Susan Parker Bodine, head of EPA's Office of Solid Waste and Emergency Response, in a written response to the GAO report.

Only about one-third of states currently assure the EPA they are checking to see if tank owners are covered by insurance, the GAO said. Bodine said the agency also will consider studying better ways to distribute money from the trust fund and whether the state funds and insurance are effective enough.

A Conservative Conservationist? (WP)

By Mark Sanford

Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Why the Right Needs to Get Invested in the Search for Climate Change Solutions

When George W. Bush, The Post and the insurance giant Lloyd's of London agree on something, it's obvious a new wind is blowing. The climate change debate is here to stay, and as America warms to the idea of environmental conservation on a grander scale, it's vital that conservatives change the debate before government regulation expands yet again and personal freedom is pushed closer toward extinction.

The fact is, I'm a conservative and a conservationist -- and that's okay.

For the past 20 years, I have seen the ever-so-gradual effects of rising sea levels at our farm on the South Carolina coast. I've had to watch once-thriving pine trees die in that fragile zone between uplands and salt marshes. I know the climate change debate isn't over, but I believe human activity is having a measurable effect on the environment.

The real "inconvenient truth" about climate change is that some people are losing their rights and freedoms because of the actions of others -- in either the quality of the air they breathe, the geography they hold dear, the insurance costs they bear or the future environment of the children they love.

But like a polar bear searching for solid ice, many people seem ready to dig into the first solution offered to slow or reverse climate change. Cue former vice president Al Gore -- the politician turned screen star who could take home an Academy Award this weekend and a Nobel Peace Prize later this year -- whose call for greater government intervention is resonating with administrations in this country and across the globe: California may soon ban incandescent light bulbs; France wants to force the Kyoto-less United States to pay carbon taxes on exports; and the European Union is pushing automobile emission standards that would cost carmakers such as Volvo roughly $3,200 more per vehicle.

Make no mistake, the issue of environmental conservation sits squarely on the battle line between government and liberty. From light bulbs to automobiles, government will gladly expand its regulatory reach even if the result is a hamstrung economy and curtailed individual freedoms. Yet conservatives have remained largely absent from this debate, and by pulling back from the environmental battle they have conceded the high ground to those on the far left.

I believe conservatives have a window of opportunity, but that window is closing fast.

First, conservatives must reframe the environmental discussion by replacing the political left's scare tactics with conservative principles such as responsibility and stewardship. Stewardship -- the idea that we need to take care of what we've been given -- simply makes sense. It makes dollars as well, for the simple reason that our economy is founded on natural resources, from tourism and manufacturing to real estate and agriculture. Here in South Carolina, conservation easements are springing up across the state as landowners see the dual benefit of preserving the environment and protecting their pocketbooks.

Second, conservatives must reclaim lost ground from far-left interest groups by showing how environmental conservation is as much about expanding economic opportunity as it is about saving whales or replanting rain forests. When corporations such as BP and Shell America pursue alternative energy sources, they not only cut carbon emissions but help cut our petroleum dependency on OPEC nations. When South Carolina restaurants recycle their oyster shells, they not only restore shellfish habitat but take a job off local governments' plates and ensure continuing revenue streams for local fishermen.

Third, conservatives must respond to climate change with innovation, not regulation. This means encouraging private research and implementation of more eco-friendly construction, more energy-efficient workplaces and more sustainable ways of going about life -- all of which cuts costs and protects God's creation. It means looking past the question of whether your car's exhaust melts polar ice caps and instead treating our environment as an investment our future depends on.

South Carolina is creating an advisory group that will study the effects of climate change on commerce and vice versa, with an eye toward crafting a plan that balances the needs of the business and environmental communities.

I am a conservative conservationist who worries that sea levels and government intervention may end up rising together. My earnest hope going forward is that we can find conservative solutions to the climate change problem -- ecologically responsible solutions based on free-market principles that both improve our quality of life and safeguard our freedoms.

For if conservatives cannot reframe, reclaim and respond to climate change with our principles intact, government will undoubtedly provide a solution, no matter how taxing it may be.

The writer, a Republican, is governor of South Carolina.

Colorless Green Ideas (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The factual debate about whether global warming is real is, or at least should be, over. The question now is what to do about it.

Aside from a few dead-enders on the political right, climate change skeptics seem to be making a seamless transition from denial to fatalism. In the past, they rejected the science. Now, with the scientific evidence pretty much irrefutable, they insist that it doesn't matter because any serious attempt to curb greenhouse gas emissions is politically and economically impossible.

Behind this claim lies the assumption, explicit or implicit, that any substantial cut in energy use would require a drastic change in the way we live. To be fair, some people in the conservation movement seem to share that assumption.

But the assumption is false. Let me tell you about a real-world counterexample: an advanced economy that has managed to combine rising living standards with a substantial decline in per capita energy consumption, and managed to keep total carbon dioxide emissions more or less flat for two decades, even as both its economy and its population grew rapidly. And it achieved all this without fundamentally changing a lifestyle centered on automobiles and single-family houses.

The name of the economy? California.

There's nothing heroic about California's energy policy — but that's precisely the point. Over the years the state has adopted a series of conservation measures that are anything but splashy. They're the kind of drab, colorless stuff that excites only real policy wonks. Yet the cumulative effect has been impressive, if still well short of what we really need to do.

The energy divergence between California and the rest of the United States dates from the 1970s. Both the nation and the state initially engaged in significant energy conservation after that decade's energy crisis. But conservation in most of America soon stalled: after a decade of rapid progress, improvements in auto mileage came to an end, while electricity consumption continued to rise rapidly, driven by the growing size of houses, the increasing use of air-conditioning and the proliferation of appliances.

In California, by contrast, the state continued to push policies designed to encourage conservation, especially of electricity. And these policies worked.

People in California have always used a bit less energy than other Americans because of the mild climate. But the difference has grown much larger since the 1970s. Today, the average Californian uses about a third less total energy than the average American, uses less than 60 percent as much electricity, and is responsible for emitting only about 55 percent as much carbon dioxide.

How did the state do it? In some cases conservation was mandated directly, through energy efficiency standards for appliances and rules governing new construction. Also, regulated power companies were given new incentives to promote conservation, via rule changes that "decoupled" their profits from the amount of electricity they sold.

And yes, a variety of state actions had the effect of raising energy prices. In the early 1970s, the price of electricity in California was close to the national average. Today, it's about 50 percent higher.

Incidentally, since someone is bound to mention it: the California energy crisis of 2000-2001 has nothing to do with this story. That crisis was caused by market manipulation — we've got it on tape — made possible by ill-conceived deregulation, not conservation.

Back to California's success. As the higher price of power indicates, conservation didn't come free. Still, it's striking how invisible California's energy policy remains. It's easy to see why New York has much lower per capita energy consumption than, say, Georgia: it's a matter of high-rises versus sprawl, mass transit versus driving alone. It's less obvious that Los Angeles is a much greener city than Atlanta. But it is.

So is California a role model for climate policy? No and yes. Even if America as a whole had matched California's conservation efforts, we'd still be emitting about as much carbon dioxide now as we were in 1990. That's too much.

But California's experience shows that serious conservation is a lot less disruptive, imposes much less of a burden, than the skeptics would have it. And the fact that a state government, with far more limited powers than those at Washington's disposal, has been able to achieve so much is a good omen for our ability to do a lot to limit climate change, if and when we find the political will.

Detroit Dealer Gets 30 Years In Two Fentanyl Deaths (DN)

Detroit News, February 23, 2007

A Detroit man who admitted selling a fentanyl-laced drug cocktail that killed two people was sentenced Thursday to more than 30 years in prison.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence P. Zatkoff, sitting in Port Huron, sentenced James Edgar Coleman to 365 months in federal prison. That sentence was at the top of the sentencing guideline range for Coleman, who has previous convictions for drug trafficking.

Coleman, 36, admitted to selling the fentanyl-laced heroin that killed Lauren Jolly, a 17-year-old Bloomfield Township high school student, and Daniel McElmurry, 30, of Madison Heights, last year.

The charge against Coleman was the first charge of selling a controlled substance causing death related to fentanyl-laced heroin and cocaine that killed an estimated 133 people in Metro Detroit in 2005-06.

Coleman had pleaded guilty and expressed remorse at his sentencing, lawyer Warren Harris said.

"He was not the person who mixed the drugs," Harris said. "Mr. Coleman would not know fentanyl right now if he saw it."

U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy credited the work of the Drug Enforcement Agency and Oakland County.

"This significant sentence is the result of a robust federal response to the rash of overdose deaths caused by fentanyl-laced heroin," Murphy said.

Drug Dealer Gets 30 Years In Fentanyl Case (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, February 23, 2007

A 37-year-old Detroit man who sold the fentanyl-laced heroin that killed a Birmingham high school junior and a Madison Heights man last May was sentenced Thursday to 30 1/2 years in prison.

The sentence imposed on James E. Coleman by U.S. District Judge Lawrence Zatkoff was at the top of the federal sentencing guidelines.

Coleman -- accused of selling the drugs that killed 17-year-old Lauren Jolly and 30-year-old Daniel McElmurry -- pleaded guilty in November to avoid a possible life sentence.

Coleman's lawyer, former Detroit police narcotics unit Cmdr. Warren Harris, urged Zatkoff to show leniency, saying Coleman had no idea that the drugs he sold contained fentanyl.

Fentanyl has been blamed for more than 100 deaths in metro Detroit since late 2005.

"I think the sentence was too severe," Harris said after the 10-minute hearing. Harris said Coleman grew up in a drug-infested neighborhood, was introduced to drug trafficking by family members and, despite prior drug convictions, wasn't a violent predator.

"He's not the villain who was the source of all of the fentanyl problem, and putting him away will not solve the fentanyl problem," Harris said. "In the total scheme of things, James Coleman is a small fry."

Detroit Drug Enforcement Administration Chief Robert Corso said, "Today's sentencing reflects a substantial sentence for a substantial violator" and should send a message to Detroit-area drug dealers.

Jolly's mother, Beth Jolly, declined to comment.

Jolly, a student at Birmingham Groves, and McElmurry bought drugs from Coleman's drug house in Detroit.

Seller Of Lethal Drug Cocktail Sentenced (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

(AP) A man who pleaded guilty to selling heroin laced with a powerful painkiller that killed two people was sentenced Thursday to more than 30 years in prison.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence P. Zatkoff sentenced James Edgar Coleman, 36, to 365 months in federal prison. The sentence was the maximum possible penalty for Coleman, who has previous convictions for drug trafficking.

Coleman, of Detroit, admitted he sold the drug cocktail with fentanyl that last year killed Lauren Jolly, 17, and Daniel McElmurry, 30.

Coleman's plea to two counts of delivering a controlled substance resulting in death was the first related to fentanyl-laced heroin and cocaine that killed more than 100 people in metropolitan Detroit in 2005 and 2006, U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said.

Coleman expressed remorse at his sentencing, defense attorney Warren Harris told The Detroit News.

"He was not the person who mixed the drugs," Harris said. "Mr. Coleman would not know fentanyl right now if he saw it."

Official: 4 Officers Arrested In Sting (NSDY/AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 23, 2007

MIAMI -- Four police officers in Hollywood, Fla., have been arrested on suspicion of providing protection and running drugs and money for an organized crime group that was really an FBI sting operation, a law enforcement official said Thursday.

The source, who is familiar with the case, spoke on condition of anonymity because the matter is sealed until Friday. The source would not provide further details.

Police Chief Jim Scarberry said the officers are veterans, but he declined to comment further.

An FBI spokesman in Miami did not immediately return calls seeking comment.

The four officers were expected to appear Friday in federal court in Fort Lauderdale.

Four Hollywood Cops Face Charges In FBI Sting (MH)

By Todd Wright

The Miami Herald, February 23, 2007

Four Hollywood police officers were arrested by federal agents Thursday, accused of providing protection and running drugs and money for what they thought was an organized crime group but was instead an FBI sting operation, a law enforcement source said.

It is unclear whether Kevin Companion, Jeff Courtney, Steve Harrison and Tom Simcox, all veterans of the police force, were being held in federal prison Thursday night, but word of the arrests sent shock waves through the department and City Hall.

"It's been really tough on all of us. Some of us just can't believe it," police spokesman Capt. Tony Rode said. ``It's really crazy."

Few details were released on the investigation or the charges, but City Manager Cameron Benson said he was told the FBI had been running the sting for about two years.

Mayor Mara Giulianti first heard of the investigation several weeks ago and said there was "pretty convincing and strong evidence" that the officers had been involved in wrongdoing.

The FBI has scheduled a press conference at 11 a.m. today in front of the federal courthouse in downtown Fort Lauderdale, where officials are expected to give more details on the case.

"The four individuals dishonored themselves and their colleagues," Giulianti said. ``This is going to be an embarrassment to the men and women that serve our city. This is very, very painful."

The on-duty FBI spokesman did not immediately return calls seeking comment.

Broward County Police Benevolent Association president Dick Brickman said he had heard about the arrests Thursday evening from other officers.

Brickman said he didn't know what the specific charges are but said they are unrelated to the officers' jobs and therefore they would not get union representation.

"From what I understand it's serious charges," Brickman said. ``It's a very, very touchy situation right now."

The alleged corruption in the police department comes as the city is dealing with similar accusations in City Hall.

Suspended Commissioner Keith Wasserstrom is facing five felony corruption charges stemming from his role in helping a sludge processing firm win an $18 million city contract in 2004. State prosecutors recently opened two more investigations of his business dealings.

A woman who answered the phone at Courtney's home Thursday night hung up after a caller identified himself as a Miami Herald reporter. Phone calls to Companion's house were not returned.

Harrison, 46, and Simcox, 50, could not be reached.

The Hollywood Police Department is no stranger to scandal.

The city's street crimes unit was disbanded in 1997 by then-Chief Rick Stone after officers were accused of brutality, making false arrests and sexual battery.

In 1998, a Miami Herald investigation found abuse in the system of off-duty shift assignments. As many as 500 times in a year, Hollywood officers scheduled themselves to work two or more off-duty jobs at the same time and could have been paid for working off-duty during their regular police shifts.

Several of the officers in question also have dealt with charges before.

Simcox, a 24-year veteran, was suspended without pay for four weeks in May 1997 after a complaint that he slapped a 9-year-old at a Palm Beach County day-care center while off-duty and fractured the child's jaw.

Articles in the Herald in 1995 and 1996 questioned the department's 1991 hiring of Courtney, 51, who had been arrested in the 1970s for issuing bad checks and driving while intoxicated.

At the time, he blamed the arrests on immaturity and a messy divorce.

Mothers Against Drunk Driving named him Officer of the Year in 1995.

Companion, who joined the force in 1986, was investigated several years ago after a Miami Herald investigation found that he was scheduled to work off-duty at multiple sites in a single day on as many as 111 dates.

Companion also was one of several people named in a 1994 sexual harassment lawsuit filed by a former Hollywood police officer.

"It looks bad. The news hit me like a ton of bricks, but I still think we have one of the best police departments in the state," Benson said.

``I was sick to my stomach honestly."

Medical Marijuana Activists Cite Little-known Law In Suit (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, February 22, 2007

Medical marijuana advocates tried a new approach Wednesday in their tug-of-war with the federal government, filing suit under a law that requires the government to correct its own misstatements -- including, the advocates say, the assertion that marijuana has no medical value.

"Citizens have a right to expect the government to use the best available information for policy decisions," said Alan Morrison, a Stanford Law School lecturer and an attorney in the lawsuit by Americans for Safe Access.

The suit was filed in federal court in San Francisco under the Data Quality Act, a little-known statute signed by President Bush in 2001. It directs federal agencies to allow members of the public to "seek and obtain correction" of false or misleading government information that affects them.

Morrison said the law was originally pushed by businesses that objected to government statements taking dim views of products or entire industries, notably Clinton administration reports that listed industrial activities among the causes of global warming. He said he knew of only two lawsuits filed under the statute, neither of them successful.

Americans for Safe Access invoked the 2001 law in a complaint to the Department of Health and Human Services in October 2004, saying its members included seriously ill people who had been discouraged from using marijuana by the department's position that the drug has "no currently accepted medical use."

The federal government classifies marijuana among the most dangerous drugs and has won court rulings allowing it to prosecute suppliers and patients in California, where medical marijuana was legalized by a 1996 initiative.

The lawsuit said the agency was ignoring scientific studies, including a 1999 report by the National Academy of Sciences' Institute of Medicine that found that the active ingredients in marijuana could help relieve pain, nausea and loss of appetite associated with illnesses, though it cautioned that smoking marijuana can be harmful.

More recently, researchers reported last week that HIV-positive patients at San Francisco General Hospital experienced relief of searing pain in their hands and feet after smoking marijuana cigarettes in a state-funded study.

The suit said the department's only responses to the 2004 complaint have been perfunctory denials, in 2005 and 2006. Those responses did not address the scientific evidence and instead noted that the Drug Enforcement Administration was considering a separate request to reclassify marijuana, the suit said.

Morrison said the department could have complied with the law by explaining its current position and posting links to the medical studies on its Web site to promote public debate. The suit accuses the department of violating the law and seeks court orders requiring the department to stop asserting that marijuana has no medical value and to make "appropriate corrections" to past statements.

Health and Human Services spokeswoman Christina Pearson declined to comment on the suit. She referred a reporter to the Food and Drug Administration's April 2006 statement that federal evaluations have found "no sound scientific studies supported medical use of marijuana."

Advocacy Group's Suit Calls On U.S. To Acknowledge Pot's Medicinal Value (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

SACRAMENTO — A patient advocacy group sued the federal government Wednesday to try to force U.S. health agencies to acknowledge that marijuana has merit as a medicine.

The lawsuit by Americans for Safe Access follows a two-year effort to reverse what it calls a "misinformation campaign" by U.S. health agencies.

Americans for Safe Access is suing under the Data Quality Act, a little-known statute that lets citizens challenge the accuracy of government-disseminated information.

The Oakland-based group filed a petition in October 2004 asking the United States to reverse its staunch opposition to pot as medicine. After months of delays, the government rejected the petition.

A spokeswoman for the Department of Health and Human Services said the agency could not comment because of the litigation.

For years, U.S. regulators have said marijuana has no accepted medicinal value.

Such statements are "false and misleading," Americans for Safe Access said in its lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Oakland. The group cited peer-reviewed studies suggesting cannabis can be effective for AIDS wasting, muscle spasticity and chronic pain.

The government's stance ignores its own studies, activists say.

A 1999 report by the Institute of Medicine declared that marijuana showed medicinal promise and advocated the development of cannabis-based drugs.

Since then, the University of California has begun several rigorous studies to test marijuana's medical efficacy. Last week, a UC San Francisco researcher announced that clinical trials found marijuana helped treat HIV pain.

Meanwhile, British drug company GW Pharmaceuticals won Canadian approval for a marijuana spray for multiple sclerosis. The firm hopes to eventually market Sativex in the United States.

Federal Charges In Home Pot-growing Operation (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, February 22, 2007

SACRAMENTO -- Five suspects who allegedly grew marijuana in specially-outfitted homes in Oakland - including one across the street from an elementary school -- are facing federal charges for producing plants with a street value of $6 million, court records show.

Van Hung Vi, 42; his brother, Van Dat Vi, 57; Ivy Tran, 27; Tommy Ly, 23; and Van Hy Vi, 55, a relative of the Vi brothers, appeared Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Sacramento on a federal complaint charging them with manufacturing marijuana and conspiracy to manufacture marijuana.

The suspects were arrested Feb. 7 in Oakland and San Francisco by police and members of the Yolo County Narcotic Enforcement Team, a branch of the state Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement.

Authorities seized 1,500 marijuana plants during raids of homes in Oakland and West Sacramento, where the investigation began several months ago.

Each plant had a high content of the active ingredient THC and was capable of producing a pound of the drug, said Roy Giorgi, commander of the Yolo County team.

Acting on a tip, agents initially began watching a home in West Sacramento, Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent James Sheeran wrote in a 30-page affidavit.

Agents saw Ly, Van Hung Vi and Tran at the home and identified them during traffic stops, checks of license plates or, in one case, an unspecified "ruse," Sheeran wrote.

Agents learned that Van Hung Vi and his brother lived at 3735 Lincoln Ave., across from Sequoia Elementary School, in Oakland. A search of that home uncovered 533 plants and 4 pounds of processed marijuana, the affidavit said, and authorities arrested the Vi brothers.

The narcotic agents' search led to another home, also associated with the Vi brothers, at 701 MacArthur Blvd. in Oakland. There, investigators found that every room had been converted to grow marijuana and seized 681 plants, the affidavit said.

Van Hy Vi was arrested at a home at 2514 Ninth Avenue in Oakland.

Tran, the ex-girlfriend of Van Hung Vi, was taken into custody at her place of business on Ninth Street in Oakland's Chinatown, Giorgi said.

Ly was arrested at an apartment on Pacific Street in San Francisco.

Authorities also found evidence of a marijuana-growing operation -- but no drugs -- at a home on the 1700 block of 11th Avenue in Oakland, Giorgi said.

Van Hung Vi was sent to the California Youth Authority in 1983 for manslaughter, and Van Hy Vi has a conspiracy conviction for a state Fish and Game violation relating to abalone, the affidavit said.

U.S. Drug Czar Urges Canada To Crack Down On Pot Claims American Measures Have Lowered Drug Use In Teens (CP)

Canadian Press, February 22, 2007

OTTAWA — U.S. drug czar John Walters is in Ottawa touting America's anti-drug policy as a model for Canada.

Walters says a blend of treatment, prevention and tough law-and-order measures have lowered drug use among American teens.

But critics aren't buying it.

Lawyers, academics and a Liberal senator warned against a U.S.-style approach in Canada, saying it's hugely expensive and ineffective.

They say the Conservatives should reconsider any drug crackdown that focuses more on prison terms than prevention or treatment.

Walters says cross-border marijuana trafficking is still a major problem, but that the Tory government has eased tensions with Washington since taking power.

The Liberals had planned to decriminalize possession of small amounts of pot — a plan that has been scrapped by the Conservatives.

Canada Must Not Follow The U.S. On Drug Policy (OC)

By Ethan Nadelmann

Ottawa Citizen, February 22, 2007

The U.S. drug czar, John Walters, is in Ottawa today, trying his best to put a positive spin on one of the greatest disasters in U.S. foreign and domestic policy. Part of his agenda is to persuade Canada to follow in U.S. footsteps, which can only happen if Canadians ignore science, compassion, health and human rights.

The United States ranks first in the world in per-capita incarceration, with roughly five per cent of the earth's population but 25 per cent of the total incarcerated population. Russia and China simply can't keep up. Among the 2.2 million people behind bars today in the United States, roughly half a million are locked up for drug-law violations, and hundreds of thousands more for other "drug-related" offences. The U.S. "war on drugs" costs at least $40 billion U.S. a year in direct costs, and tens of billions more in indirect costs.

It's all useful information for Canadians to keep in mind when being encouraged to further toughen their drug laws to bring them in line with those of the United States.

What's most remarkable about U.S. drug policy is the way it endures despite persistent evidence that it is ineffective, costly and counterproductive. One report after another -- by the U.S. General Accountability Office, the National Academy of Sciences, independent agencies and even the Bush administration itself -- consistently fault federal drug-control programs for failing to achieve their objectives.

But funding nonetheless persists. The DARE (Drug Abuse Resistance Education) program, which relies on police to "educate" young people about drugs, keeps being funded despite an impressive run of studies demonstrating no effect on adolescent drug use. Ditto for the government's border interdiction and anti-drug ad campaigns, and its funding of federal-state anti-drug task forces, and much else.

Drug-policy reformers in the United States have been cheered by Canada's willingness -- at least until now -- to look to Europe rather than the United States for drug-control models. When HIV/AIDS started spreading a generation ago among people who inject drugs, both Europe and Canada were quick to implement needle exchanges and other harm-reduction programs, even as the United States opted instead to allow hundreds of thousands to become infected and die needlessly.

Heroin-prescription trials are now underway in Montreal and Vancouver, trying to determine whether what worked so well in Switzerland, Germany, The Netherlands and other countries can also work in Canada. The same is true of supervised injection sites, which have proven effective in reducing fatal overdoses, transmission of infectious diseases and drug-related nuisance. And most recently, Vancouver's mayor, Sam Sullivan, has broken new ground by proposing that cocaine and methamphetamine addicts be prescribed legal substitutes.

But I wonder whether Canada just can't help following in U.S. footsteps. DARE survives in Canada too, notwithstanding evidence of its lack of efficacy. Almost three quarters of Canadian federal drug-strategy spending is for law-enforcement initiatives, few of which demonstrate any success in reducing drug problems. "While harm-reduction interventions supported through the drug strategy are being held to an extraordinary standard of proof," the director of the B.C. Centre for Excellence in HIV/AIDS, Dr. Julio Montaner, recently observed, "those receiving the greatest proportion of funding remain under-evaluated or have already proven to be ineffective."

The survival of Vancouver's supervised-injection facility is currently at risk, for reasons having everything to do with politics and nothing with science or health, while federal drug-enforcement authorities know that all they need to do to preserve funding is make arrests and avoid scandal.

What matters most to U.S. drug czar John Walters, though, is cannabis, which he occasionally, and absurdly, describes as the most dangerous of all drugs. Seventy per cent of Americans say cannabis should be legal for medical purposes, and one study after another points to its efficacy and safety as a medicine. A similar percentage also think personal possession of marijuana should be decriminalized (i.e., resulting in fines rather than arrest and incarceration) and 40 per cent say it should be taxed, controlled and regulated, more or less like alcohol.

But Mr. Walters will have none of it. He travels the country, railing against cannabis and urging schools to drug test all students, without cause -- and without any scientific evidence that testing will work. And when he visits or talks about Canada, it's typically to complain -- erroneously -- that Canada is a major supplier of marijuana for the U.S., never mind the fact that Americans now produce most of the marijuana consumed in the United States.

Canada needs to lead, not follow, the United States when it comes to dealing sensibly with drugs. Mr. Walters's Canadian hosts today should remind him of the 2002 report of the Canadian Senate Special Committee on Illegal Drugs, chaired by Conservative Senator Pierre-Claude Nolin.

It's probably the best, most comprehensive, most evidence-based report on drug policy produced by any government in the past 30 years. And its recommendations are all about dealing with drugs as if politics were an afterthought, and all that mattered were reducing the harms associated with both drug use and failed drug policies. Imagine that.

Former Federal Agents Suing City, Charge Police Corruption (AP)

By Mike Robinson, The Associated Press

AP, February 23, 2007

CHICAGO - A jury awarded a husband and wife $9.75 million in damages Thursday for a smear and terror campaign aimed at them after they accused a police officer of corruption while working as federal agents.

Diane Klipfel and Michael Casali hugged and kissed their friends and their attorney after the jury delivered its verdict in the civil trial.

"I'm relieved that the ordeal is finally over and justice is served," Casali, an agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, told reporters.

City Law Department spokeswoman Jennifer Hoyle said officials were disappointed and were reviewing appeals options.

The verdict ended a five-week trial focusing on Joseph Miedzianowski, sometimes described as Chicago's most corrupt police officer.

Miedzianowski was convicted in April 2001 of masterminding a Chicago-to-Miami cocaine pipeline and supplying guns and ammunition to the very street gangs he was supposed to be investigating. He is serving a life sentence at a federal prison in California.

Klipfel is a retired ATF agent and Casali still is an agent. They say Miedzianowski smeared them with misconduct allegations and terrified them with threats after they leveled corruption charges against him in 1992 while working in the Chicago ATF office. They say they were so frightened, their children slept in a closet in the interior of the house in case shots were fired through the walls.

Jurors leaving the court scoffed at city officials' claim that they conducted an 18-month investigation of Miedzianowski but never interviewed Klipfel and Casali, and were unable to uncover evidence of corruption at the time.

"You run an investigation and never interview the main person who made the complaint?" juror Joe Karl said. He and other jurors also said they gave greater credence to testimony that Miedzianowski frightened people after seeing a tape of a deposition at his California prison.

"Joe Miedzianowski is a scary, scary guy, a frightening guy with a winning personality," said Sally H. Saltzberg, the lead attorney for Klipfel and Casali. She said he was able to use his personality to manipulate public officials and get away with corruption for 14 years.

Witnesses who testified during the trial included Chicago police Superintendent Phil Cline, who was once Miedzianowski's supervisor, and other police officials.

Cline testified that he suspected Miedzianowski of stealing police documents twice in the early 1990s. He said evidence of the second instance became part of the federal indictment against the officer.

"Joe Miedzianowski was an aberration in this department and a disgrace to his star," Cline testified.

The jury awarded Klipfel $7.75 million for violation of her rights by both Miedzianowski and the city. It awarded her $1 million for defamation of character by Miedzianowski while acting in his role as a city employee.

It also awarded Casali $1 million for Miedzianowski's violation of his rights while acting as a city employee.

Saltzberg said the city would have to pay the entire $9.75 million because Miedzianowski is believed to have no money. She said the couple's attorneys would ask the court to award them fees in the $1 million range.

ATF Agents Faced Cop Retaliation, Jury Rules (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 23, 2007

Jurors awarded nearly $10 million in damages Thursday to a couple who said the Chicago Police Department retaliated against them after they tried to report corrupt former Officer Joseph Miedzianowski in 1992.

Diane Klipfel, a former agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, and her husband, Michael Casali, a current agent, charged in their lawsuit that Miedzianowski turned internal probes against them and trashed their reputations after they came forward with allegations that the officer was stealing from drug dealers.

Juror Megan Cox said the key to the case was the Chicago Police Department's "incompetent, lazy and overall negligent" internal investigation into the corrupt officer.

The plaintiffs had argued that Miedzianowski was allowed to select witnesses and bring them in for questioning himself and that Klipfel wasn't interviewed.

Juror Joe Karl said that was especially outrageous given that the corruption was reported by a federal agent.

"How do you run an investigation and not interview the person making the complaint?" Karl said.

The largest part of the $9.75 million award came for the jury's decision that the city and Miedzianowski violated Klipfel's civil rights. Klipfel had testified she was forced from ATF after the Police Department retaliated against her and that she moved her children out of state at times, fearing for their safety.

Sally Saltzberg, lawyer for the couple, said she was happy the jury accepted her argument.

"This was not an investigation, it was a coverup," she said.

It was not until years later, in 2001, that Miedzianowski finally was convicted in federal court of running a Chicago-to-Miami drug ring and was sentenced to life in prison.

Miedzianowski was arrested a few months after federal investigators had tapped his home telephone. The probe captured a 1998 conversation between Miedzianowski and Raymond Risley, who was the head of the police internal affairs division when Miedzianowski was being investigated.

Jurors had listened this month as Risley spoke of Klipfel's suit and dismissed her allegations as the "ranting of a lunatic." He also could be heard telling Miedzianowski that he had kept evidence.

A videotaped deposition of Miedzianowski also was compelling, jurors said, adding that they saw an intense man who was prone to explosive anger.

The city is expected to pay the entire award, as the panel found that even as an individual, Miedzianowski was acting within the scope of his city employment.

Jennifer Hoyle of the city's Law Department said the city is disappointed by the jury's verdict.

"We are reviewing all of our appellate options," Hoyle said.

City lawyers had argued that Klipfel had her own woes at ATF and said a police internal affairs officer brought information to federal authorities that brought Miedzianowski down.

Klipfel and Casali said they are glad to have the trial behind them.

Klipfel said all she ever wanted was for Miedzianowski to be investigated and for police who were supposed to stop him to be held accountable.

"I never dreamed Mike and I would not be believed," she said. "And that they could do to us what they did."

City Man Guilty Of 27 Crimes, All Violent (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 23, 2007

A Philadelphia man secretly recorded on tape talking about a plot to detonate pipe bombs inside the Gallery at Market East mall was convicted yesterday of 27 unrelated violent crimes that are likely to send him to prison for life.

The verdicts against Andre L. Henry are significant, federal authorities said, because they represent a brazen case of a felon using women with clean records to make straw gun purchases, then using the weapons in a crime spree.

The jury found that shortly after the women helped Henry buy assault rifles, shotguns and handguns in 2003, he robbed two banks and seven fast-food restaurants, fired shots at a Philadelphia police officer and solicited the murder of grand-jury witnesses.

Henry, 29, also faces two decade-old state murder charges. He spent much of his federal trial wearing an electronic stun belt after U.S. marshals said they caught him trying to sneak a seven-inch homemade knife into the courtroom.

Near the end of the two-week trial, Henry testified that the person who confessed to the 27 crimes on a secret recording is actually his twin brother. Assistant U.S. Attorneys Michelle Rotella and Susan Fields presented evidence that Henry does not have a twin brother.

"His story is just absurd," Rotella told jurors.

U.S. District Judge Jan E. Dubois scheduled sentencing for May 24. Under the advisory federal guidelines, Henry probably faces life imprisonment.

Henry, who quietly stroked his chin as the verdicts were read, plans to appeal, said his attorney, Christopher Warren. As Henry was escorted from court, he said: "I'll be back."

John Hageman, a spokesman for the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms, said that the Henry case "truly exhibits the danger and violence brought to Philadelphia by these illegally purchased firearms."

"This case also shows that this is a regional problem," Hageman said. "All of the guns were purchased in Montgomery County."

Jurors in the federal case were not told directly about the alleged 2003 Gallery bombing plot because Henry was not charged with such a crime.

However, Henry brought it up unexpectedly on cross-examination. He made vague references to the Gallery and "domestic terrorism."

Henry's cellmate secretly taped Henry talking about a plot to set off pipe bombs in the food-court area of the Gallery during rush hour.

According to a portion of the transcript of the conversation in the cell - a portion not played for jurors - Henry said he was working with an unidentified man.

Henry: "He thought it was a good idea to plant the explosives, so I did some recon and scoped them out."

Williams: "Do you know where the explosives was gonna be placed?"

Henry: "Yeah... the Gallery. Around three o'clock and see how see how busy it is because he said that might be a good target."

The alleged Gallery plot was first disclosed in an Inquirer article published Wednesday. Information in the article was based on transcripts of the Henry-Williams recording and of a grand jury proceeding. Neither transcript was used during the trial, but the transcripts had been part of the public case file. Yesterday, in response to The Inquirer report, the judge sealed both transcripts.

Henry was arrested in October 2003 for a parole violation, shortly after ATF agents conducted a compliance inspection at Abington Gun Sports Inc. and noticed that a young woman had purchased two 12-gauge shotguns and three rifles, including an AK-47, in one month's time. The woman acknowledged that she bought them for Henry, who could not lawfully buy them because he had a felony criminal record.

Soon after, federal and state authorities searched Henry's home, found the weapons and more: a Point Blank bulletproof vest, $14,000 in pink dye-stained cash and photos of Henry and others holding weapons.

Williams, who was serving time for a parole violation at the same state prison as Henry, wrote to ATF agents and offered to wear the wire.

Under the guise of helping Henry prepare his legal case, the cellmate got Henry to talk about his crimes. Besides speaking about the alleged Gallery plot, Henry was recorded speaking about other crimes.

"The robberies of the fast food joints was to buy the guns... so we can actually pull off the bank robberies," Henry said on the tape. "The purpose of the bank robberies was to buy fake identification to leave the country, after we were gonna set the explosives."

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Hearing To Push Bush On Immigration (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy will hold a hearing next week that he hopes will get the Bush administration to confirm publicly that it wants "comprehensive immigration reform" this year.

"Chairman Leahy is looking for the Bush administration to walk the walk on comprehensive immigration reform," Tracy Schmaler, spokeswoman for the Vermont Democrat, said yesterday. "President Bush has publicly indicated his support for comprehensive reforms that would provide a realistic solution to bringing millions out of shadows, improve internal and border security and meet the pressing needs of employers for willing workers."

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff will testify at the Wednesday hearing.

The White House yesterday said Mr. Bush remains committed to comprehensive reform, which many Republicans fear will contain some sort of amnesty for illegal aliens and usher millions of new foreign workers into the country.

"In his State of the Union address, the president called on Congress to pass comprehensive immigration reform that will secure our borders, enhance interior and work-site enforcement, create a temporary-worker program and resolve -- without amnesty or animosity -- the status of illegal immigrants already here," Bush spokesman Scott Stanzel said.

"The president would like Congress to address immigration reform as soon as possible, as the issue is not getting any less complicated with the passage of time," he said.

Last year, Mr. Bush supported legislation that the Senate approved but was rejected by the Republican-led House. That bill offered a direct path to citizenship for most of the 12 million aliens in the country.

With Democrats now controlling both chambers and Mr. Bush sharing their views on immigration, conservatives worry about what will come of legislation this year. But Democrats have been adamant that Mr. Bush take an active role in the immigration debate so that he will share equally any criticism over the legislation.

"As the Senate begins the process of considering bipartisan legislation, Chairman Leahy believes it is important for the committee to hear from administration officials, in clear and unequivocal terms, their commitment to passing comprehensive immigration reform this year," Miss Schmaler said.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, plans to introduce a major bill sometime after next week, his office said yesterday.

Mr. Kennedy's staff has kept the administration informed on the developments of drafting the bill, according to Mr. Kennedy's office. And, after a Jan. 8 meeting at the White House on another matter, Mr. Bush pulled Mr. Kennedy aside to reiterate his support for comprehensive immigration reform this year.

Several Republicans on Capitol Hill who supported last year's comprehensive reform, however, now complain that they have been left out of negotiations. As a consequence, they and others worry that the bill is being pushed further to the left than last year's final bill.

Among those who complain of being left out of negotiations is Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican who supported last year's legislation and is running for his party's presidential nomination.

But Senate aides said yesterday that Mr. Brownback has skipped or canceled meetings at which he was invited to discuss the bill with Mr. Kennedy and Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican and co-author of the bill.

"He's chosen not to be involved and canceled meeting after meeting," said one Senate staffer with knowledge of negotiations. "He's chosen to distance himself from a bill that he was an original co-sponsor of because of presidential politics."

Smugglers Raise Stakes In Fight Over Border Rule (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

Rival alien and drug smugglers on the U.S.-Mexico border are targeting each other in a wave of escalating violence to win control of smuggling corridors into the United States, with at least four recent killings tied to efforts to kidnap migrants for ransom.

Three of the killings took place Feb. 8 north of Tucson, Ariz., in what federal and state law-enforcement authorities have described as one of the nation's most popular alien- and drug-smuggling corridors. Another occurred Jan. 28, south of Tucson.

Authorities said gang members are kidnapping illegal aliens being guided into the United States, demanding ransoms of up to $2,500 a person and killing the illegals, along with gang rivals, who resist. The kidnappings save the gangs the cost of recruiting migrants in Mexico and hiring guides, or "coyotes," to bring them across the border.

They also said some gang members are thought to have targeted "stash houses" in Phoenix, where illegal aliens are taken to await transportation to cities across the country.

Violence on the U.S.-Mexico border has risen dramatically over the past three years in what U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) has called "an unprecedented surge." ICE has established intelligence and investigative operations along the border to combat the increased brutality.

In a recent report, ICE said the border gangs, which collect hundreds of millions of dollars annually in illicit profits, are becoming increasingly ruthless -- against their victims, rivals and federal, state and local police.

Much of that violence has targeted U.S. Border Patrol agents, who have seen a spike in incidents as the agency continues its efforts to bring larger areas of the border under operational control. Violence directed at agents has included physical and vehicle assaults, and shooting incidents.

Gunfire has become commonplace along the border, authorities said, particularly in the alien- and drug-smuggling corridors of southern Arizona. They said about 90 percent of the migrants headed north out of Mexico have hired a coyote to guide them into the United States.

T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, which represents all 11,000 of the agency's non-supervisory agents, said violence by gangs battling for control of smuggling routes into the United States has increased dramatically, and is now spilling over into some U.S. communities.

Mr. Bonner said that while much of the violence is directed at rival gang members, there is what he called an "inevitable spillover that touches innocent civilians and law-enforcement officials on both sides of the border." He noted that the number of assaults against Border Patrol agents has more than doubled over the past two years.

"Cartels are far more inclined to utilize violence as a means of achieving their goal of successfully smuggling contraband and people," he said.

In the Feb. 8 incident, three Guatemalan nationals in a truck carrying illegal aliens were killed and three others wounded. One man, identified as a coyote, was killed in the Jan. 28 ambush as he drove across the desert with a load of 15 to 20 illegals, who fled.

The February incident followed by a day the attack of illegal aliens being led out of Mexico near Sasabe, Ariz., about 70 miles southwest of Tucson, by four men carrying assault weapons and wearing ski masks. The aliens were robbed, but none was reported injured.

Men armed with assault rifles also approached a National Guard site on the border near Sasabe on Jan. 3. The armed guardsmen were ordered to relocate to a safer location. They called the Border Patrol, which responded 16 minutes later, but the intruders had fled. No shots were fired, and no one was injured. The armed men have not been identified.

State and local law-enforcement officials on the border have said they are outgunned and outmanned by drug- and alien-smugglers armed with automatic weapons, grenade launchers, bazookas, improvised explosive devices, and state-of-the-art communications and tracking systems.

The rising border violence also has been attributed by authorities to efforts by the street gang Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13, to win control of drug- and alien-smuggling routes into the United States. The Border Patrol's field-intelligence center said MS-13 has aligned with drug cartels in Mexico and Colombia, and seeks unfettered access to smuggling corridors.

The intelligence center said the MS-13 presence has increased competition between rival gangs that must vie for areas where they can ply their trade. The result, it said, has been an increase in violence as rival gangs struggle for domination.

MS-13 members also reportedly have accepted contracts to assassinate Border Patrol agents to intimidate and frighten agents away from the border.

Homeland Security Strategy Hits Executives, Illegal Workers (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Pressing ahead with its new strategy to "attack the economic engine" that fuels most illegal migration into the U.S., Homeland Security agents arrested three top executives of a national cleaning service for allegedly employing illegal immigrants and defrauding the government. The sweep also netted nearly 200 employees believed to be illegal immigrants.

Nevada-based Rosenbaum-Cunningham International Inc., or RCI, provided cleaning and maintenance services to popular hospitality venues and restaurants like Hard Rock Cafe, ESPN Zone and House of Blues, taking in more than $54.3 million between 2001 and 2005, Homeland Security officials said yesterday .

According to a 23-count indictment unsealed yesterday, the company knowingly hired illegal immigrants, intentionally failed to withhold taxes and created shell accounts to line the pockets of top executives. RCI co-owners Richard M. Rosenbaum and Edward Scott Cunningham and firm controller Christina Flocken face criminal fraud, immigration and tax charges.

Another 195 people working for RCI as cleaners were arrested on illegal-immigration charges in raids in 17 states and Washington, D.C. A message on an answering machine for RCI in Florida said it had ceased operations as of yesterday. The government said its investigation was ongoing.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, part of the Department of Homeland Security, began the investigation 20 months ago over concerns about cleaning crews at the Grand Traverse Resort in northwestern Michigan.

Janitorial companies competing for lucrative chain-store and office-building cleaning contracts are often magnets for undocumented workers. In 2003, federal agents rounded up 250 illegal immigrants working as cleaning crews in 61 Wal-Marts across 21 states. Twelve federal agents also descended on Wal-Mart Stores Inc. offices in Bentonville, Ark. Brandishing a search warrant, they made off with 18 boxes of documents from the company's operations department, mostly records related to cleaning contractors dating back to March 2000. In the end, Wal-Mart wasn't criminally charged for using the contractors companies but agreed to pay $11 million in fines in 2005.

More recently, DHS has decided to target company executives who may know about, and benefit from, illegal hiring practices.

"We know that targeting unscrupulous employers is crucial to deterring illegal immigration," Julie Myers, assistant secretary of homeland security in charge of ICE, said in a statement announcing the arrests. "Today's charges against RCI executives reflect the federal government's commitment to addressing the employment magnet for illegal immigration and ensuring businesses comply with our laws."

Earlier this month, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff promised that there would be more work-site enforcement arrests and promised to bring high-impact criminal cases against employers who systematically violate immigration laws.

He said that in 2006, DHS set a new record, in terms of work-site enforcement cases, with 716 criminal arrests and more than 3,600 administrative apprehensions. That was a 700% increase since 2002, before the department was created.

Janitor-service Chiefs Charged In Illegals Ring (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

Three top executives at a nationwide cleaning service were named in a federal grand jury indictment unsealed yesterday, charged with conspiracy, fraud and tax crimes in an ongoing investigation that has netted more than 200 illegal aliens who worked as janitors.

The illegal aliens, all of whom were employed by Florida-based cleaning contractor Rosenbaum-Cunningham International Inc. (RCI), were arrested in 17 states at 63 locations -- including the Hard Rock Cafe, ESPN Zone, Planet Hollywood, Dave & Busters and the House of Blues restaurants.

Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers, who heads U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), said RCI co-owners Richard M. Rosenbaum, 60, of Longwood, Fla., and Edward Scott Cunningham, 43, of West Palm Beach, Fla., and the firm's controller, Christina Flocken, 59, also of Longwood, were named in the 23-count indictment unsealed in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids, Mich.

The indictment and arrests were the latest in a series of high-profile efforts by the Bush administration to strengthen its immigration-enforcement credentials as Congress and the White House begin debate on a new round of immigration legislation.

Much of that effort has been aimed at work-site enforcement, targeting and bringing administrative sanctions against employers who hire illegal aliens.

In the past 10 months, ICE and other federal agencies have raided, among others, Swift & Co., arresting 1,300 illegal aliens in six states and finding that 30 percent of the company's work force used fraudulent documents to be hired. Also, at IFCO Systems North America, seven company managers were charged with harboring illegal aliens for financial gain and 1,200 illegals were apprehended at 40 locations nationwide.

Cecilia Munoz, a senior vice president at the National Council of La Raza, which has called on the Bush administration to root out unscrupulous employers who hire and exploit migrant workers, applauded the government's targeting of the RCI officials, saying it was "the kind of immigration enforcement" the country needed.

"By the sound of it, these employers were taking outrageous advantage of these workers," she said.

The ICE-led investigation began 20 months ago, when agents focused on cleaning crews at the Grand Traverse Resort in northwestern Michigan.

"We know that targeting unscrupulous employers is crucial to deterring illegal immigration," Mrs. Myers said.

According to the indictment, RCI, which is licensed in Nevada, operated a cleaning and grounds-maintenance service that contracted with theme restaurant chains and hospitality venues throughout the United States, most of which were predominantly staffed by illegal aliens.

The indictment said that the restaurant chains and hospitality venues paid RCI more than $54.3 million for janitorial services from 2001 to 2005 and that by failing to collect and pay federal income, Social Security, Medicare and federal employment taxes on the wages it paid to its work force, RCI was able to evade payment of more than $18.6 million in employment taxes.

Mr. Rosenbaum, Mr. Cunningham and Mrs. Flocken, according to the indictment, spent about $34 million of the firm's revenue to operate RCI and divided the remainder, about $20 million, among themselves. It said they disguised the true nature of their activities and obstructed the Internal Revenue Service by creating several shell companies and bank accounts to hide their excess funds.

The excess funds, according to U.S. Attorney Margaret M. Chiara in Michigan, were used by Mr. Rosenbaum, Mr. Cunningham and Mrs. Flocken to pay personal expenses for items such as luxury boats, vehicles, lavish homes and racehorses.

If convicted, the RCI officials face 15 years in prison and $18 million in restitution fees.

"This case is an excellent example of the cooperative efforts of federal law-enforcement agencies," Mrs. Chiara said.

RCI officials were not available yesterday. A message on the company's answering machine said it had ceased operations.

In addition to the indictment, ICE arrested more than 200 illegal aliens Wednesday night and yesterday morning as part of the ongoing operation.

The indictment is part of a continuing criminal prosecution against the principals and certain employees of RCI.

Santiago Echaniz, an ex-RCI supervisor, pleaded guilty to charges of harboring illegal aliens and making a false statement on a tax return. Former RCI employees Ofmara Maltos-Trevino and Miguel Martinez-Garcia pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting the unlawful employment of aliens, and Juanita Schlagel pleaded guilty to a two-count indictment charging trafficking in means of identification.

Janitorial Service Officials Charged In Sweep Of Illegal Immigrants (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Three top executives of a janitorial service used by such national restaurant chains as Hard Rock Cafe and ESPN Zone face charges of tax evasion, fraud and harboring illegal immigrants, U.S. officials announced yesterday, after overnight raids in 18 states netted about 200 undocumented workers.

Authorities unsealed a 23-count indictment returned Feb. 15 by a grand jury in Grand Rapids, Mich., against co-owners Richard M. Rosenbaum, 60, and Edward Scott Cunningham, 43, and controller Christina A. Flocken, 59, of Rosenbaum-Cunningham International Inc., of Palm Beach, Fla.

The trio allegedly failed to pay $18.6 million in federal employment taxes on $54 million in custodial and grounds-keeping contracts between 2001 and 2005 at the chains, which also included House of Blues, Planet Hollywood, Dave and Busters, Yard House and China Grill, U.S. officials said. The restaurants' parent companies were not charged.

Raids targeted 63 locations in 17 states and the District of Columbia, from California to Florida and New York, including ESPN Zone restaurants in Washington and Baltimore, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials said. Illegal workers face administrative charges and deportation.

The case marked the latest wrinkle in a renewed campaign by the Bush administration to crack down on employers as Congress debates an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. ICE arrested 716 individuals on criminal charges last year, up from a few dozen in recent years.

The government lost a criminal case against Tyson Foods employees in 2003, ended a criminal investigation against Wal-Mart in 2005 after negotiating an $11 million civil fine, and charged workers but not managers in raids against meatpacker Swift & Co. last year, but it continued to target smaller companies with criminal probes. Subjects included a California fence-building company, a Kentucky home-building firm, a Texas-based transportation pallet firm, and a temporary labor service in Ohio.

Commercial cleaning services are a $100 billion U.S. industry employing nearly 1 million workers across the private sector. According to prosecutors, RCI supervisors and about 155 on-site managers allegedly hired hundreds of workers since 1997 without job applications, W-4 tax withholding or I-9 employment eligibility forms, or W-2 wage and tax statements. The company recruited through word of mouth and advertisements at job fairs, festivals and in Spanish-language newspapers. In one case, an employee allegedly bought 20 phony green cards.

The trio allegedly paid workers in cash and set up shell companies, with such names as Ricurt Inc., Monker and Sunchaser Service Corp., to hide assets from the Internal Revenue Service, the indictment said. Dividing nearly $7 million, defendants allegedly purchased "racehorses, fancy boats and lavish homes" in Florida and California, said Department of Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers. Assistant U.S. Attorney Hagen Frank said Rosenbaum was arrested in central Florida. Cunningham and Flocken are expected to surrender to officials soon, an ICE spokesman said.

John Vandevelde and Jeffrey Rutherford, attorneys for Cunningham, released a statement noting that the use of undocumented workers "pervades many industries throughout the United States," and added that his client was cooperating fully and "expects to resolve this matter to everyone's satisfaction."

Vincent J. Marella and Evan Jenness, attorneys for Rosenbaum and Flocken, respectively, did not respond to requests for comment.

The investigation began 20 months ago after tips by a cleaning crew at the Grand Traverse Resort in Michigan. Earlier, a former RCI supervisor, two ex-employees and a state of Michigan employee pleaded guilty to related charges.

Cleaning Executives Indicted In $18 Million Fraud (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

CHICAGO, Feb. 22 — Three executives of a national cleaning and maintenance company were indicted on Thursday on charges of defrauding the federal government of more than $18 million in employment taxes owed on behalf of hundreds of illegal immigrant workers.

The company, Rosenbaum-Cunningham International, performed janitorial services for theme-restaurant chains like the House of Blues, Hard Rock Cafe and Dave & Busters, as well as for the Grand Traverse Resort and Spa in Acme, Mich.

Nearly 200 immigrant workers at some of the restaurants were arrested early Thursday in 17 states and the District of Columbia as part of the investigation of the company, which is being conducted by United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Internal Revenue Service.

The indictment says the executives hired illegal immigrants, primarily from Mexico, Honduras and Guatemala, and then constructed an elaborate scheme of shell companies, bank accounts and cash-only payroll procedures to avoid paying millions of dollars in federal taxes on the workers' wages from 1999 until today.

The executives are the company president, Richard M. Rosenbaum; its vice president, Edward Scott Cunningham; and its controller, Christina A. Flocken. The 23-count indictment was unsealed on Thursday in Federal District Court in Grand Rapids, Mich.

Mr. Rosenbaum, 60, of Longwood, Fla., was arrested on Thursday in Florida and was held in federal custody there. Mr. Cunningham, 43, of West Palm Beach, Fla., and Ms. Flocken, 59, also of Longwood, were issued subpoenas and are expected to appear voluntarily in Federal District Court in Western Michigan. No court dates have been set.

The company is incorporated in Nevada but operates primarily out of West Palm Beach.

From 2001 to 2005, the government says, Rosenbaum-Cunningham International received gross payments from its various clients of $54,327,845.

By failing to pay taxes on their employees' income, Social Security and Medicare, the three executives cheated the government of $18,640,345 and used about a third of the excess money to finance the "extravagant lifestyle costs" of lavish houses, luxury boats, racehorses and college tuition, the indictment said.

Cleaning Company Executives Accused Of Employing Illegal Workers (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

WASHINGTON — The president of a nationwide cleaning company that counts Hard Rock Cafe and Planet Hollywood theme restaurants among its customers was arrested Thursday for allegedly hiring hundreds of illegal workers.

Federal agents arrested 195 allegedly illegal workers at 63 businesses in 17 states and Washington, D.C., as part of the investigation into RCI International, a janitorial contracting company owned by Richard Rosenbaum, 60, of Longwood, Fla.

An indictment made public Thursday charges Rosenbaum with conspiracy to defraud the United States, harboring illegal immigrants and evading employment taxes.

Also charged in the indictment filed in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids, Mich., were company Vice President Edward Scott Cunningham, 43, of West Palm Beach, Fla., and Controller Christina Flocken, 59, also of Longwood.

Attorneys representing Rosenbaum, Cunningham and Flocken did not return phone messages left at their offices Thursday.

RCI allegedly hired hundreds of illegal workers from Mexico, Honduras, Guatemala and Haiti and, in some cases, provided them with false immigration papers, the indictment said. The laborers were allegedly paid in cash to avoid reporting the income to the IRS, court papers say.

Prosecutors say the business failed to pay more than $18 million in employment taxes. RCI had contracts to clean the Grand Traverse Resort & Spa in Acme, Mich., and theme restaurants, including House of Blues, Planet Hollywood, Hard Rock Cafe, Dave and Busters, Yard House, ESPN Zone and China Grill, the indictment said.

Rosenbaum, Cunningham and Flocken allegedly skimmed money from the company to finance a luxurious lifestyle that included multiple houses in Florida and California, race horses and boats, the indictment said.

"They were able to do this because these employees were basically off the books," federal prosecutor Hagen Frank said. "They became millionaires."

The investigation began two years ago when police in Grand Rapids arrested a man who provided fraudulent documents. That arrest led Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents to 23 other illegal laborers working at the Grand Traverse Resort & Spa, which had contracted more than $3 million in RCI cleaning services from June 1997 to March 2006, ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers said Thursday.

When the resort demanded proof that RCI employed legal workers, Rosenbaum authorized his site manager to acquire fake immigration papers, Myers said. The site manager paid $3,460 for the cards and was reimbursed and paid a $1,000 bonus by Flocken from company accounts, the indictment said.

Arrests were made in Arizona, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas and Washington, D.C.

Cleaning Service Owners Charged In Sweep Of Illegal Immigrants (AP)

By James Prichard, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

(AP) - GRAND RAPIDS, Michigan-An investigation of cleaning crews working at a Michigan resort has led to federal fraud and tax charges being filed against three top officials at a U.S. janitorial service and the arrest of more than 200 illegal immigrants around the country, government officials said.

The detainees - mostly Mexican nationals - who were rounded up early Thursday were working as janitors for Rosenbaum-Cunningham International Inc., or RCI, a Florida-based cleaning contractor.

RCI co-owners Richard M. Rosenbaum, 60, and Edward Scott Cunningham, 43, and firm controller Christina A. Flocken, 59, all of Florida, face criminal fraud, immigration and tax charges in a 23-count indictment unsealed Thursday in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids.

"This is not a case of bad bookkeeping or skirting the rules," said Brian M. Moskowitz, special agent in charge of the Detroit office of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. "It involved flagrant criminal behavior."

Moskowitz said during a news conference in Grand Rapids that federal agents arrested Rosenbaum in Longwood earlier in the day. Cunningham and Flocken were expected to soon turn themselves in to federal authorities in Grand Rapids, where the case will be tried, he said.

Their practice of paying cash wages to their workers deprived the U.S. government of about $18.6 million (â,¬14.2 million) in employment taxes, according to the indictment.

"In this particular investigation, these defendants took advantage of illegal workers in order to enrich themselves by violating the internal revenue laws that were created specifically to protect the legitimate work force, all at a cost to taxpayers of approximately $18 million (â,¬13.73 million), all so that they could live a very lavish lifestyle and live the high life," said Sandra L. Carter, special agent in charge of the Internal Revenue Service office in Detroit.

About 203 illegal immigrants who worked for RCI were arrested and expected to be deported, Moskowitz said. Agents took them into custody at 63 business locations in 17 states and the District of Columbia.

An outgoing telephone message from RCI's headquarters in Palm Beach, Florida, said the company had "ceased operations" effective Thursday.

There was no home phone listing in Longwood for Rosenbaum and calls could not be completed to West Palm Beach homes listed under Cunningham's name. A woman who identified herself as Flocken hung up on a reporter who called her at home.

The joint ICE-IRS investigation began 20 months ago at the Grand Traverse Resort in Acme in Michigan's northwestern Lower Peninsula.

RCI contracted with the resort between June 1997 and March 2006, according to the indictment. Between 2002 and 2006 alone, Grand Traverse paid RCI more than $3 million (â,¬2.29 million) for grounds and maintenance services, kitchen cleaning and housekeeping duties.

Not only did RCI fail to pay employment taxes on its nationwide operations - its clients included such venues as Planet Hollywood, Hard Rock Cafe and ESPN Zone - but its top officials also had its supervisors procure and maintain a work force of illegal immigrants and authorized managers to provide them with fake resident cards, or green cards, according to the indictment.

Planet Hollywood founder and owner Robert Earl said Thursday evening that his restaurants never used RCI for cleaning. The company did contract with an earlier janitor firm that was operated by the RCI officials, but ended that relationship by 2001, Earl said in an interview with The Associated Press. He denied that janitors at any of his restaurants were included in the sting.

"I have phoned all the restaurants, and we have had no (federal) visits, and do not employ this company," Earl said in a telephone interview from Orlando, Florida.

Spokespeople with the U.S. Attorneys' office in Grand Rapids, Michigan, and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement could not immediately clarify whether Planet Hollywood was linked to the illegal activity.

The three company officials facing charges also set up shell companies to hide excess assets, the indictment says.

Although the case is being prosecuted in Grand Rapids, none of the illegal immigrants picked up Thursday was arrested in Michigan. 2007-02-22T16:12:11Z

Judge Dismisses Posada's Bid To Be Freed (AP)

By ALICIA A. CALDWELL, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

(AP) - EL PASO, Texas-A federal judge on Wednesday denied a request by an anti-Fidel Castro activist to be released from jail while immigration officials figure out where to deport him to.

U.S. District Judge Philip R. Martinez threw out Luis Posada Carriles' lawsuit after federal prosecutors said immigration officials could not release him because he is in the custody of the U.S. Marshals Service.

Posada, an ex-CIA operative who is suspected of bombing a Cuban jet 31 years ago, left Department of Homeland Security custody after his indictment last month on suspicion of lying in a citizenship application.

Posada, 79, was arrested two years ago on an immigration violation after he reported paying a smuggler to sneak him into Texas from Mexico.

An immigration judge later ordered that Posada be deported but ruled that he could not be sent to Cuba, where he was born, or Venezuela, where he is a naturalized citizen.

Several countries, including Mexico, have declined to allow Posada in. He sued last year, arguing that the U.S. government cannot hold him indefinitely while they look for a country willing to let him move there.

Governments of both countries want Posada sent to Venezuela to stand trial on charges that he was in Caracas when he plotted the deadly 1976 bombing.

Posada, who had a role in the failed Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba, has denied any wrongdoing. 2007-02-22T01:31:53Z

13 Charged With Fraud Over Tobacco Sales Taxes (MINNST)

By Rochelle Olson And Pam Louwagie

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 23, 2007

They concealed more than $2.5 million in revenue from the state, the federal indictment says.

Thirteen people face federal charges of defrauding the state of more than $2.5 million in sales tax by concealing revenues from cigarette sales, according to a federal indictment unsealed Thursday.

The indictment, which according to attorneys in the case was unsealed by a U.S. District Court magistrate judge, cites numerous attempts to conceal earnings and wealth through fraudulent bookkeeping and tax returns, as well as property transfers and large cash transactions.

One defendant is accused of stashing $1 million cash in his ceiling, and another allegedly bought a BMW car with $20 and $50 bills.

Scott Tilsen, a federal public defender, said it is too early to know the full extent of what the government claims or what it can prove.

"They've charged a form of tax evasion over a four-year period involving a large number of individuals named and unnamed," Tilsen said. "Traditionally, there's always a few tax prosecutions brought ... as we approach April 15."

The case, the result of a joint investigation by the FBI and the Internal Revenue Service, includes one conspiracy count, 13 mail fraud counts and 26 wire fraud counts.

In addition to conspiracy charges, 11 of the defendants are accused of mail and wire fraud involving false or incomplete sales tax payments or filings.

All but one of the 13 defendants uses or has used the last name Wazwaz.

The defendants own 52 Twin Cities-area tobacco stores, including Wholey Smokes in Blaine, Coon Rapids and Minnetonka, and Mr. Discount Tobacco I in Fridley and II in Roseville.

Transactions date to 1996

The 58-page indictment alleges that the dozens of transactions date from 1996 through the present and details numerous transactions involving thousands of dollars.

The defendants also are accused of transferring nearly $1 million to Jordan, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories through checks, currency and wire transfers backed by the tobacco store proceeds.

An unindicted co-conspirator was caught at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport in March 2003 with six cashier's checks worth $108,030 destined for Lebanon, the indictment said.

"There's millions of Americans who send funds to relatives overseas," Tilsen said, noting that the money can add up over time. He represents Yousef Mahmoud Wazwaz, also known as Joseph Mahmoud.

The indictment alleges that the defendants, in order to conceal their worth, transferred the ownership of the tobacco stores rapidly back and forth to "conceal from the United States the true owner of and who benefited from the stores."

Despite substantial cash receipts in the stores, the defendants did not deposit a significant portion in their bank accounts but rather "used the cash to pay employees, to acquire inventory, to pay personal expenses or to hoard."

In 2000, the indictment claims, Tawfiq Othman Wazwaz stored $1 million in cash in the "suspended ceiling in the basement of his residence."

Another defendant, Raed Yassin Wazwaz, is alleged to have paid $32,825 in cash for a BMW in 2001, using $20 and $50 bills.

In April 2004, an unindicted coconspirator identified as B.W. "transported $17,500 in currency generated by stores under his control." The owner of Stillwater Tobacco also wrote a check to B.W. for $35,000 in May 2002, claiming it was a "gift," the indictment said.

Some defendants owned homes and cars in the names of others to impede calculation of their income, the indictment said.

Groups of brothers

Most of the defendants belong to four groups of brothers identified by their names: Othman, Mohamed, Yassin and Mahmoud.

They own tobacco stores in the Twin Cities and concealed the revenue and expenses of those stores or the identities of the people deriving economic benefit from their operation, according to the indictment.

At least two of the defendants already have pleaded guilty to federal charges in connection with cigarette sales.

Zuhair Wazwaz, also known as Anthony Stallone, pleaded guilty in 2004 to mail and wire fraud. Adel Salem pleaded guilty that same year to mail fraud. They pleaded guilty to ordering nearly $1 million in cigarettes with no intention of paying for them.

The other defendants are Houd Othman Wazwaz, Fares Othman Wazwaz, Taleb Mohamed Wazwaz, Kennedy Mohamed Wazwaz, Sabry Mohamed Wazwaz and Ziad Mahmoud Wazwaz.

Othman Majed Wazwaz and Kamil Madfoun Al-Esawi are charged only with conspiracy.

Defendant 'shocked'

Defense attorney Richard Kyle said his client Kamil Madfoun Al-Esawi simply worked as a cashier at one of the stores.

"My client is shocked that he's named in this indictment," Kyle said. "He's not a member of this Wazwaz family. ... He has no involvement. He's named in one of the 40 counts. We just don't get it."

Kyle said Al-Esawi had hired him during the investigation.

"Quite frankly, I thought, I was very surprised that he'd ever be named in an indictment."

Corporate Owners Hide Assets, Identities (USAT)

By Kevin McCoy

Roughly four miles from the famed Las Vegas casino strip, ABC Equity's corporate office is registered in a modest business suite located off West Sahara Avenue.

Great Fortune 600 is registered in the same suite. So are DK Financial, Hill 99, Stock Savant, ZZYZX Holdings — and more than 1,000 other corporations.

They share something in common besides their business address. Each lists the same man as its sole corporate officer in Nevada incorporation records. He is William Reed, a businessman with a suspended law license and the target of a Federal Trade Commission lawsuit that alleges he and a convicted felon teamed in a business that promoted forming Nevada corporations to shield assets "from 'capricious federal judges and any government agency.' "

A USA TODAY computer-aided review shows that the two men and their business, Asset Protection Group, are part of a thriving mini-industry that has capitalized on real or perceived gaps in domestic incorporation laws and virtually non-existent government oversight to promote some U.S. states as secrecy rivals of offshore havens.

A multi-agency U.S. Money Laundering Threat Assessment issued in 2005 cited Nevada, Wyoming and Delaware as the states with laws most conducive to anonymous corporate ownership. USA TODAY's review, which examined databases of all Nevada and Wyoming incorporations but was unable to obtain comprehensive data for Delaware, found:

·A Florida man who served a federal prison term for an international currency trading scam used his secret ownership of a Nevada corporation to launch a similar fraud after he was released. More than 120 victims lost $8 million.

·Interpol or other international investigators probing suspected crimes overseas have contacted the Wyoming Secretary of State's office about corporations registered by a businessman whose Internet-based venture advertised using Wyoming firms to shield assets.

·The sole publicly listed officer for nearly 100 firms incorporated in Wyoming is a woman whose listed address is a postal box in the Republic of Seychelles, an Indian Ocean nation that has been the focus of corporate secrecy concerns.

USA TODAY's findings buttressed the money laundering report's warning that a "race to the bottom" among states vying to set minimal corporate information requirements has enabled companies to hide the identities of their owners, thereby making it harder for law enforcement agencies to track suspected tax evasion, money laundering and other crimes.

"The purpose of corporations originally was to provide limited liability, not anonymity," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., chairman of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which held a recent hearing on the issue. "Now they're providing both limited liability and anonymity, and the law enforcement folks … are very upset. They want to know who it is that's behind these corporations."

Concern about camouflaged corporate ownership prompted the IRS to list the tactic this week in its 2007 "Dirty Dozen" tax scams. The IRS said anonymous entities are facilitating "underreporting of income, non-filing of tax returns … money laundering, financial crimes and possibly terrorist financing."

Most states don't require companies to provide ownership information when they incorporate. And they exercise virtually no oversight on the corporations' internal operations. In part, that's because most corporations operate legally, generate new jobs and fuel economic expansion, plus registration fees.

Nevada and Wyoming officials said their laws encourage legitimate businesses with reasonable registration requirements. "The law isn't unscrupulous. It's the individuals that use it in an improper manner," said Tom Cowan, head of the securities division in the Wyoming Secretary of State's office.

But law enforcement officials say relaxed state requirements let the mini-industry facilitate formation of shell companies that have no employees, exist chiefly on paper, yet conduct financial transactions.

Most states require companies to list the names of their officers in incorporation filings. However, a 2006 Government Accountability Office report showed most states do not bar the use of nominee officers, who may be straw men who camouflage the identities and activities of the real owners.

Secrecy marketers in the mini-industry provide nominee officers for Nevada and Wyoming corporations for an annual fee. They also tout the use of so-called bearer shares, an ownership system in which controlling shares may be physically transferred from one person to another in secret.

Referring to corporations whose owners are shielded by nominee officers, bearer shares and other tactics, the money laundering report said "Delaware, Nevada and Wyoming are often cited as the most accommodating jurisdictions in the United States for the organization of these legal entities."

The Nevada Secretary of State's website even proclaims: "No IRS Information Sharing Agreement."

Secretary of State officials in Nevada and Wyoming said in interviews that while they cooperate with law enforcement agencies, current laws in most cases don't let them challenge or investigate incorporations. "We're a filing office, and we don't make the law," said Nevada Deputy Secretary of State Scott Anderson, head of the Commercial Recordings Division.

Nonetheless, the officials said their state legislatures are expected to respond to law enforcement concerns by enacting changes as early as this year to close real or perceived loopholes.

That's welcome news for John Colledge, head of the Reno office of Immigration and Customs Enforcement. He complained that corporate anonymity, a "large stumbling block," thwarted him in 2004 when he checked a bank's tip about a Swiss man who had formed two Nevada corporations.

The man had flown from Zurich to Reno and opened corporate accounts that received thousands of euros and quickly redirected the funds overseas, Colledge said. Although he suspected that the funds were being laundered, Colledge said he could not get enough information to determine for sure.

"To fly from Zurich to Reno for a long weekend is a very unusual sort of thing. I think most of us (in law enforcement) who have some experience in this international area historically would look at somebody flying from Reno to Switzerland to do something in reverse," said Colledge.

The operations of Asset Protection Group demonstrate the level of anonymous activity available under some states' incorporation laws. The firm attracted clients in part with a promotional video in which actor Robert Wagner warned that without asset protection, "You could lose everything you've worked so hard for, in a flash."

Wagner publicist Alan Nierob called the video "a one-shot deal," and said his client didn't endorse Asset Protection Group.

USA TODAY's analysis found that more than 1,000 Nevada corporations list William Reed, a 56-year-old executive identified in the Federal Trade Commission lawsuit as Asset Protection Group's operator, as the sole officer. Each corporation listed the firm's office address as its own.

A Colorado Supreme Court disciplinary panel suspended Reed's law license in 1997 for "dishonest" conduct in transferring purported ownership interests to employees of his former law firm, a court record shows. Reed did not seek reinstatement. Separately, under questioning in an October deposition for the Federal Trade Commission case, Reed said he was under IRS investigation.

Government lawyers in the case allege that Reed teamed with Richard Neiswonger, 55, who headed Asset Protection Group's marketing affiliate. Court records show Neiswonger was sentenced to 18 months in federal prison in 1998 after pleading guilty to money laundering and wire fraud charges. The case involved misleading marketing claims in a previous business.

The Federal Trade Commission lawsuit alleges Reed, Neiswonger and Asset Protection Group used misleading income projections to defraud scores of consultants who paid $9,800 each in hope of marketing the firm's privacy tactics.

Defense attorneys said Reed, Neiswonger and Asset Protection Group did nothing wrong. They have asked U.S. District Judge Stephen Limbaugh to dismiss the lawsuit. Limbaugh named a receiver to administer Asset Protection Group pending the outcome of the case.

The receiver, Robb Evans & Associates, alleged in court filings that Asset Protection Group may have facilitated money laundering by a suspected crime ring thousands of miles away. Police in Fairfax County, Va., notified Asset Protection Group in May that suspects in a string of identity thefts had used the company "to set up multiple corporations and open bank accounts," the receiver reported in a court filing.

"I have reviewed bank statements for two of the corporations, and over $500,000 in apparently stolen funds (from the suspected Virginia identity thefts) was deposited in these accounts," M. Val Miller, an attorney working with the court receiver, wrote.

Fairfax police said no arrests had been made in the case. Miller said detectives told the receiver's office the suspects were believed to have fled the country.

Anderson, the Nevada deputy secretary of state, said the agency did not know about the federal allegations against Reed, Neiswonger and Asset Protection group.

The Secretary of State's office became aware of another Nevada corporation, Par Three Financial, in 2005 after the Securities and Exchange Commission filed a federal court complaint that accused the firm and its secret owner of using a pyramid scheme to scam investors. In such a scheme, money from newly recruited investors is used to pay those who invested earlier.

Nevada records show Par Three was based in Las Vegas and at various times listed a Carson City businessman or a Nevada attorney as its sole publicly listed officer. But, the SEC lawsuit alleged, the company was secretly controlled by Melvin Ruth, a Florida felon who served nearly three years in federal prison after he pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud in a scam involving stolen investments.

In November 2003, shortly after he was released from prison, Ruth allegedly used Par Three to mount a similar scam. The firm offered potential investors a monthly return of at least 2% on loans to check-cashing stores, company and court records show. Par Three raised at least $8 million from more than 120 investors who were unaware of Ruth's role, the SEC alleged.

In December 2005, the SEC got a court judgment that permanently restrained Ruth and anyone working with him from violating securities laws. The judgment ordered Ruth to pay a civil penalty and give up ill-gotten gains, with interest. Ruth died last year of cancer complications amid efforts to recover Par Three assets that could repay investors, said his lawyer, Carl Schoeppl.

USA TODAY's review of incorporations found that Wyoming, like Nevada, has multiple examples where a single person is the sole officer for a string of companies.

Guillermo Jalil, for instance, runs AssetProfile.com, which sells Wyoming corporations and provides nominee officers. State records list him as an officer of more than 100 corporations, from A+ Shadow Systems to Yokohama Technologies.

Investigators from Interpol, the international law enforcement agency, have contacted the Wyoming Secretary of State's office about several of the corporations registered by Jalil, said Cowan, the securities division chief. None of the inquiries directly involved Jalil, who operates legally and sells corporations that typically may be used outside the USA, Cowan said.

In a recent interview, Jalil said he had not been contacted by Interpol and knew nothing about the inquiries to the Secretary of State. He said he conducts background checks on anyone seeking nominee officers for a corporation.

Jalil contended that the IRS and law enforcement investigators can check on any company by examining bank records. Claiming that corporation secrecy laws can block investigators "doesn't sound like reality to me," Jalil said.

But the internal workings of some corporations prove particularly resistant to transparency. Wyoming incorporation records show that at least 90 companies created since 2002 list Stella Port-Louis as the sole listed officer. Many of the firms, such as Export Deutschland AG and Motorcomsa S.A., have foreign corporate names.

The only address for Port-Louis listed in the records is a postal box in the Republic of Seychelles. A USA TODAY interview request mailed in January to Port-Louis' postal box could not be delivered. Port-Louis did not respond to a message relayed via Registered Agency Services, the Cheyenne company that is the local agent for the corporations that list her as an officer.

JoLyn Jordan, an official of Registered Agency Services, a firm that files incorporations, said she believed Port-Louis was a nominee for owners outside the USA. "I don't know who she is, or if she's for real," said Jordan. Asked how to determine if they were shell firms created for crime, Jordan said, "You don't know."

Jack Blum, an international tax expert and former special counsel to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said money laundering investigations have historically focused on the Seychelles. While saying he had no information about the Port-Louis firms, he said the filings seemed designed to frustrate.

"Whoever's trying to research it will go batty," said Blum.

Bill Clinton's AMT Bomb (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

As tax season nears, Democrats in Congress are discovering they have an urgent political bomb to defuse -- the alternative minimum tax. The AMT already hits four million Americans, and without new legislation this year it will explode in the pocketbooks of 23 million taxpayers come April 15, 2008.

What's amazing is that many Democrats and reporters are trying to blame this looming tax increase on the 2001-2003 tax cuts. See if you can follow their argument: Taxpayers are obliged to pay the higher of their tax bill under either the regular IRS code or the AMT. And because the tax cuts reduced the regular income tax of the average family by $2,000 a year, more middle-class families are being bounced to the AMT system. Ergo, it's all President Bush's fault.

This logic requires overlooking that a taxpayer's bill under the AMT is still lower than it would have been without the tax cuts. But never mind: The political game here is to use the AMT as an excuse to justify repealing the Bush tax cuts.

In reality, the AMT is one more liberal monster that was created in the name of soaking the rich but has now come back to swallow the middle class. Democrats created the AMT in 1969, amid a political frenzy to capture a mere 21 millionaires who had paid nothing. And the politician most responsible for the AMT's relentless expansion in recent years is none other than William Jefferson Clinton.

Remember the 1993 tax hike that was supposed to fall only on the rich? In addition to raising gas taxes and Medicare payroll taxes and income tax rates, the Democratic Congress that year also raised the AMT: from a 24% flat rate to a dual tax rate of 26% on AMT income up to $175,000 and 28% on AMT income above that amount.

It's true that the 1993 bill slightly increased the AMT's family income exemption, but Democrats refused to index those exemptions for inflation. So the combination of the higher rates and the failure to index for inflation has caught more and more middle-class taxpayers in the AMT's maw. From 1992 to 2002, this Clinton stealth tax hike increased sixfold the number of filers paying the AMT, to nearly two million from 300,000.

A Joint Tax Committee (JTC) analysis requested last year by Senator Charles Grassley of Iowa shows that about 11 million more Americans will have to pay the AMT next year thanks to the higher post-1993 AMT rates. The House Ways and Means Committee calculates that if you live in a high-tax state (such as California or New York) and have two or more kids, you're very likely to be hit with the AMT this year even if your income is as low as $75,000.

All of which means that if Democrats really want to spare Joe Lunchbucket from the AMT, the cleanest solution is to repeal the Clinton AMT rate hikes. The nearby chart, prepared by the American Shareholders Association based on Joint Tax data, compares the number of filers who will be hit by the AMT under current law and what would happen if the AMT rate was moved back to the pre-Clinton 24% and the exemption was indexed for inflation at the 2005 level of $40,250 ($58,000 for a joint return). Going back to the pre-Clinton rates would leave only about 2.6 million tax filers subject to an AMT penalty next year instead of 23 million under current law.

The estimated "cost" of this fix to the Treasury over 10 years would be some $632 billion, which is money Democrats in Congress would prefer to spend. But as Senator Grassley notes: "This tax was never meant to tax the middle class, so why should we count it as a revenue loss when we make sure they don't have to pay it?"

There's a larger policy lesson to keep in mind as the debate unfolds over both the AMT and the looming expiration of the Bush tax cuts in 2010: Beware politicians who say they only want to tax the rich. Sooner or later their tax schemes will soak the middle class because that's where the real money is. Regarding the AMT, Democrats are now saying they'll be glad to provide AMT relief for the middle class but they'll have to raise taxes on CEOs and other high-income Americans to do it. Where have we heard that one before?

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Walter Reed Stories Factual But Unfair, Medical Chief Says (WP)

By Steve Vogel, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

The Army's surgeon general yesterday criticized stories in The Washington Post disclosing problems at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, saying the series unfairly characterized the living conditions and care for soldiers recuperating from wounds at the hospital's facilities.

"I'm not sure it was an accurate representation," Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, chief of the Army Medical Command, told reporters during a news conference. "It was a one-sided representation."

The Medical Command oversees Walter Reed and all Army health care.

Until now, the Army had not challenged any aspect of the Post series. Army and Defense Department leaders have promised to eliminate squalid conditions in Building 18, a former hotel outside the Walter Reed gate where 76 wounded soldiers live as outpatients. They have also promised to address bureaucratic problems in the handling of wounded soldiers.

The two-part newspaper series reported that many soldiers spend 18 months or more at Walter Reed. It quoted many patients and their families describing a bureaucratic indifference to medical needs. And it described rooms in Building 18 with mold, leaky plumbing and holes in ceilings.

While acknowledging "pretty distressing" conditions in some rooms at Building 18, Kiley said the problems were neither widespread nor symptoms of a system that allows soldiers to languish. The building is not "emblematic of a process of Walter Reed that has abandoned soldiers and their families," said Kiley, who was commander at the hospital before becoming surgeon general in 2004.

"I want to reset the thinking . . .," Kiley said. "While we have some issues here, this is not a horrific, catastrophic failure at Walter Reed."

Asked to elaborate on his comments after the news conference at the facility, Kiley said he does not dispute the facts in the Post stories. "It's not the accuracy I question, it's the characterization," he said.

Kiley said the Army is beginning to study ways to streamline the medical bureaucracy, including the process by which soldiers are evaluated and either discharged or returned to active duty. "That's going to take more than a couple of weeks, but we're going to get at it," he said.

Kiley's comments came at the end of a media tour during which reporters and television camera crews were escorted through Building 18 to view conditions and repairs. Rooms had been painted, plumbing repaired and floors disinfected.

"It's not the Ritz-Carlton at Pentagon City, I'll grant you that," Kiley said, surveying the cleaned, repaired and repainted room where until recently Army Spec. Jeremy Duncan lived with black mold and a hole in the ceiling above the shower.

Duncan, who broke his neck while on patrol in Iraq last year, was moved to a new room after the Post story described his living conditions. He said he has not suffered any reprisals. "Believe it or not, people were actually happy about the fact that someone spoke up," Duncan said.

Kiley said that while repairs to Building 18 are nearly complete, the aging facility needs a top-to-bottom renovation. "That's tough to do while you're trying to take care of soldiers," he said.

In another development yesterday, the White House announced that President Bush plans to nominate S. Ward Casscells to replace William Winkenwerder as assistant defense secretary for health affairs. The Pentagon said Winkenwerder's departure was already planned and is not related to problems at Walter Reed.

Painting Over The Problems At Walter Reed's Building 18 (WP)

By Dana Milbank

It's not every day one gets to witness a whitewash in action, but Walter Reed Army Medical Center provided just such an opportunity yesterday.

In Sunday's Washington Post, Dana Priest and Anne Hull described the woeful conditions of Room 205 in Walter Reed's Building 18: "Behind the door of Army Spec. Jeremy Duncan's room, part of the wall is torn and hangs in the air, weighted down with black mold. When the wounded combat engineer stands in his shower and looks up, he can see the bathtub on the floor above through a rotted hole."

The Army mobilized. Painters were deployed to cover the offending wall with a fresh coat of white semigloss. And television crews were invited in to inspect the result.

"Some of the paint is still wet against that wall, so be careful," Walter Reed public affairs officer Donald Vandrey, standing on the bed in his socks, advised the film crews. "They just finished repainting it about 10 minutes ago."

Mission accomplished?

Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley thought so. After the media tour of Building 18, the Army's surgeon general gave a news conference. "I do not consider Building 18 to be substandard," he said of a facility Priest and Hull found full of "mouse droppings, belly-up cockroaches, stained carpets, cheap mattresses" and other delights. "We needed to do a better job on some of those rooms, and those of you that got in today saw that we frankly have fixed all of those problems. They weren't serious, and there weren't a lot of them."

Kiley might have had a stronger case if men wearing Tyvek hazmat suits and gas masks hadn't walked through the lobby while the camera crews waited for the tour to start, or if he hadn't acknowledged, moments later, that the entire building would have to be closed for a complete renovation. The general also seemed to miss a larger point identified by other officials: Walter Reed's problem isn't of mice and mold but a bureaucracy that has impeded the recovery of wounded soldiers.

The Army's vice chief of staff, only 24 hours earlier, decried "a breakdown in leadership" for the conditions in the place. And Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.) noted that "you could put all the wounded soldiers in the Ritz-Carlton, and it wouldn't fix the personnel management and recordkeeping problems that keep them languishing in outpatient limbo out there for months."

"We're not letting soldiers languish," came Kiley's reply.

For all the stagecraft, there was still broken glass in the driveway of Building 18 yesterday, a banana peel on the steps and an empty Budweiser can in the shrubbery. There were signs of hasty repairs: a plumber's truck outside, dust masks and spray cleaners on window sills, rat poison outside the dumpster, and a discarded box proclaiming "Emergency Exit Lighting Fixture." Construction workers came and went.

The base's public-affairs crew arrived 25 minutes late for the tour but got right to work. "Some of these people are not on our list and are not coming in," announced Lori Calvillo, Walter Reed's chief spokeswoman. "C-SPAN, you're not on the list. You're not coming in." She then attempted to evict a Washington Post reporter, who appealed, loudly, to Kiley.

The tour began in the game room, where soldiers shot pool and watched a plasma TV. From there, the tourists climbed a stairwell smelling of chlorine bleach to a floor smelling of fresh paint.

"In the next room, there's a little water drop on the ceiling; you can get a nice shot of it," Kiley joked. Inside Room 416, there was indeed some rainwater dripping into a wastebasket, a missing lampshade, some loose wallpaper and a mirror on the floor -- but neither rodents nor fungus were visible.

Then it was down to Room 205, crammed with Tilex, sealant, paint rollers, a dropcloth and ceramic tiles. Spokesman Vandrey spoke like a real estate agent: "There was no plumbing leakage in the bathroom. That was all condensation." Outside the room, a man spoke urgently into his cellphone: "The drywall has to dry before they can paint."

A few doors down was Spec. Duncan, in his new room. "Unfortunately, I had to stand up and tell them, 'Hey, the room is messed up,' " he told a Voice of America camera. "I got my point across."

He sure did -- and that's why Kiley, who was the commander at Walter Reed before assuming his current role in 2004, found himself staring into a bank of 12 cameras yesterday. Missing was Maj. Gen. George Weightman, the current Walter Reed commander -- "called away to important business," Kiley explained.

At times, Kiley appeared to acknowledge a systemic problem. He promised to "go at this thing soup to nuts," adding: "We're gonna get at it real quickly." But then he quibbled with the scope of the problem. "Some of this bureaucracy, as much as it frustrates us, I'm not sure that's a breakdown in leadership," he reasoned.

He then attacked the "one-sided representation" of the Post reporting. "I do not think that Building 8" -- he apparently meant 18 -- "is emblematic of a process of Walter Reed that has abandoned soldiers and their families," Kiley said. "I want to reset the thinking that while we have some issues here, this is not a horrific, catastrophic failure at Walter Reed."

Back in Room 205, the whitewash was almost dry.

Damaged And Adrift In The Shadows (NYT)

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

When the Senate next debates whether to debate the Iraq war, members would do well to visit Walter Reed Army Medical Center, just five miles to the north. There they can run a stark reality check on how the country is failing the war's wounded despite all those Capitol orations about unstinting support of our fighting troops.

As fine as the surgery wards have been through a five-year torrent of battle casualties, Walter Reed has seen the shameful growth of a parallel village of almost 700 traumatized and maimed outpatients. Far too many of these souls wait lost and wasted, abandoned by the post's and the Army's shambling bureaucracy.

This outpatient world has become a holding ground for desperation and dysfunction, according to a Washington Post investigative report. Some drift away unnoticed, AWOL, while others huddle in their rooms, depressed and forgotten. The scenes uncovered by The Post range from slumlord conditions in one residential building to drug abuse and suicide among desperate patients caught in a Catch-22, where psychologically damaged veterans are put in charge of fellow sufferers.

A staff sergeant who had his eye and skull shattered in Iraq stumbled about after his release from a surgical recovery room. He was handed a map and ordered to find his way across the sprawling post to the outpatient unit. After he found his room he sat for weeks like some accidental tourist, with no doctor appointments nor official concern. "Shouldn't they contact me?" he wondered.

The Army is promising to rush repairs and extra personnel. But the shameful neglect at Walter Reed is more proof of how America's leaders — despite all the rhetoric about unlimited support for the troops — are failing the nation's warriors in this disastrous war.

Senate Effort To Pass Intelligence Legislation Stalls Again (WT)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The annual legislation that governs the 16 U.S. intelligence agencies and their new boss, the director of national intelligence, is stalled again in the Senate, where efforts to pass it in the past two years also died.

"We're still working it," said a senior staffer from the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, which voted the bill out 12-3 last month, adding that the new committee chairman, Sen. John D. Rockefeller, West Virginia Democrat, continued to hope the bill could be passed after the Presidents Day recess.

The staffer, who was authorized to speak only on the condition of anonymity, said committee members were working on a unanimous-consent agreement -- a procedural measure whereby noncontentious bills are brought to the floor of the Senate and voted on without time-consuming debate.

"It's cleared on our side," said the staffer of the committee majority, adding that a provision in the bill temporarily suspending some federal privacy protections would be removed as part of the deal. Democratic Sens. Ron Wyden of Oregon and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, said in additional views submitted with the bill that they believed this provision "merit[ed] further study and debate" before being passed into law.

The staffer said other Democrats had been prevailed upon not to force the issue of congressional access to the presidential daily briefings about pre-Iraq war intelligence.

But a unanimous consent agreement, as its name implies, can be halted by any objection, and the Senate's arcane rules allow the objector to remain anonymous.

In the previous two years, under the chairmanship of Sen. Pat Roberts, Kansas Republican, the committee's efforts to move the bill have been blocked by holds from Republican senators.

The same issues are behind the holdup this year, according to sources from both sides of the aisle: There is concern about what some Republican senators see as the bill's excessive reporting requirements, both on intelligence agencies about their detention and interrogation of terror suspects, and on the administration as a whole. The new law would require much wider congressional notifications about the most secret oversight briefings of all.

The staffer said the committee leadership hoped to address those concerns by "tweaking the language" in a couple of parts of the bill "to make clear that sources and methods will be protected."

"Our Republican colleagues [on the committee] are working on" overcoming Republican objections, said the staffer. The committee's senior Republican, Sen. Christopher S. Bond of Missouri, was traveling in East Asia this week and could not be reached. His staff declined comment.

Although U.S. intelligence activities are funded from a special secret annex of the vast defense appropriations act, the authorization law is the only vehicle for public legislative oversight and guidance to the sprawling and sometimes fractious collection of agencies dubbed by insiders as the "U.S. intelligence community."

The hiatus in the legislation has meant, for instance, that lawmakers have not yet been able to make a series of fixes and adjustments to the new intelligence structure they put into place in the huge 2004 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act.

The 2007 authorization bill contains additional clarified budget re-programming authority for the new director of national intelligence and creates an inspector general for his office.

Pentagon Abandons Big Bomb Test (AP)

By Jennifer Talhelm, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

Facing stiff opposition from two Western states, the Pentagon on Thursday scrapped plans for a 700-ton non-nuclear test blast that would have produced the first mushroom cloud of dust over the Nevada desert in decades.

The Defense Department said it would find other ways to test the nation's ability to penetrate underground bunkers that produce and store weapons of mass destruction.

The cloud may have reached an altitude of 10,000 feet over the site about 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas, an eerie echo of long-ago open-air nuclear testing.

Originally scheduled for last June 2, the test blast — called Divine Strake — had been postponed indefinitely until the Defense Threat Reduction Agency finally canceled it.

"I have become convinced that it's time to look at alternative methods that obviate the need for this type of large-scale test," he said in a statement.

The decision was not based on any technical information that indicated the test would harm workers, the public or the environment, according to James Tegnelia, director of the Pentagon unit that works on technical aspects of how to destroy deeply buried enemy weapons.

It was in March 2006 that he had likened the spectacle of a test explosion to a mushroom cloud.

"I don't want to sound glib here, but it is the first time in Nevada that you'll see a mushroom cloud over Las Vegas since we stopped testing nuclear weapons," Tegnelia said at the time to reporters.

The United States stopped conducting aboveground nuclear tests in 1963.

In Nevada and Utah, there was concern that the blast would scatter decades-old radioactive material from previous Cold War-era tests. Other critics contended the explosion would mark a step toward new tests to develop "bunker buster" nuclear weapons.

Two months ago, the agency released a new environmental report that confirmed there is radioactive material about a mile from the blast site. Officials insisted any harm would be "extremely unlikely."

The agency said in a statement it would develop other ways to gather the kind of data that Divine Strake would have provided. "Such methods to assess capabilities to defeat underground facilities do not currently exist," it said.

The agency is committed "to help develop non-nuclear means to defeat underground targets. I am optimistic that we will succeed," Tegnelia said.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and other lawmakers said they understood the need for tests to develop defense strategies.

But, Reid said, "there were still many questions left unanswered, including the possible environmental effects."

The loudest critics said the plan revived bitter memories of government "lies" during Cold War-era tests, when officials said there would be no danger.

Thousands of people who lived near the Nevada Test Site — called downwinders — were exposed to cancer-causing radiation from weapons tests.

Residents feared Divine Strake would spread more radioactive material or lead to further nuclear experiments there.

"If this announcement truly signals the end of Divine Strake, my hope is that DTRA would instead spend time and money on developing a conventional weapon that would actually be useful to our military in destroying deeply buried terrorist targets," said Rep. Jim Matheson, D-Utah.

John Wells, a Las Vegas carpenter and regional representative to the Western Shoshone National Council, said the blast would "compound wrongs" for the American Indian tribe.

The tribe fought the test in court and long has contested the government over the test site, now contaminated from years of nuclear tests.

Agency Scraps Plan For Explosives Test (NYT)

New York Times, February 23, 2007

A federal agency announced yesterday that it had canceled a plan to detonate 700 tons of conventional explosives in the Nevada desert as part of a study of ways to target underground weapons facilities or bunkers.

The test, known as Divine Strake, at the Nevada Test Site would have been conducted near a place used for decades for atomic testing. Opponents said the explosion would create a two-mile-high mushroom cloud and release radioactive dust from long-undisturbed radioactive material.

Utah's Congressional delegation and thousands of Utah residents have written to the Defense Threat Reduction Agency of their opposition to the test. The agency said yesterday that it would look at alternative means of testing. A news release from the Department of Defense, which is seeking alternatives, said the decision "was not based on any technical information that indicates the test would produce harm to workers, the general public, or the environment."

McCain Raps Extraneous Pentagon Spending Requests (POL)

By Christian Lowe

Politico.com, February 23, 2007

Quarreling with Pentagon spending requests, Sen. John McCain has chided Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Air Force Secretary Michael Wynne for seeking three experimental aircraft in the Pentagon's emergency wartime funding bill.

The $93 billion funding request for military operations yet this year in Iraq, Afghanistan and other hot spots includes nearly $14 billion for two F-35 Lightning II fighter jets and a CV-22 Osprey tilt-rotor transport to replace aircraft lost in overseas combat operations. Both aircraft are still in development and years from being fielded.

"In an emergency supplemental, you are proposing to replace combat loss with unproven platforms that not only are not yet operational but will also ultimately cost a lot more than they do now," the Arizona Republican told Gates and Wynne in a Feb. 13 letter obtained by Politico.

McCain, the ranking member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, is a staunch supporter of President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops into Iraq. But he's also often criticized the military for slipping costly extraneous programs into emergency wartime spending bills.

The F-35, also known as the Joint Strike Fighter, has only recently begun test flights. The Air Force asked for two of the small, stealthy planes to replace an F-16 Falcon and an F-15 Eagle fighter lost during combat operations. The Air Force argues that neither fighter is being produced for the U.S. military anymore and that the F-35 is the only viable replacement option.

But the F-35 isn't in large-scale production either, McCain noted, and the replacements wouldn't reach the Air Force until 2013.

The CV-22, with a shaky safety record, is still in testing as well.

"Both the JSF and Osprey are controversial, next-generation programs that require considerable congressional oversight," McCain wrote. "Your including the requests to procure both aircraft types in an emergency supplemental effectively insulates these programs from this committee's routine oversight. This is inappropriate."

McCain's salvo was buttressed Thursday by the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee's Air and Land Forces Subcommittee, Rep. Neil Abercrombie, D-Hawaii, who fired off a news release outlining what he sees as additional inappropriate spending requests.

Abercrombie challenged the Army's request for $14 billion in tanks, transports and other armored vehicles that are not intended to replace combat losses. The vehicles are largely part of the Army's reorganization effort to carve "modular" brigades out of Cold War-era divisions. The smaller brigades are easier to deploy, but come with logistics and combat support requiring dozens of new vehicles.

"What they're trying to do here is a budget trick where they hide the spending 'pea' under the 'shell' of support for the troops," Abercrombie said in an interview. "This has to stop."

In his release, Abercrombie complained that such purchases should be considered part of the annual Pentagon appropriations request subject to congressional oversight. His critique is his answer to a request by House Defense Appropriations Subcommittee Chairman John P. Murtha, D-Pa., for a list of items deemed inappropriate for consideration in the wartime funding bill.

Abercrombie said he found nearly 40 items in the emergency bill that could be cut or modified, representing a savings of about $4 billion.

Labor Seeks Boost From Pro-Union Measure (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — Organized labor is fighting for a pro-union bill as if its life depended on it.

Some labor experts say the union movement's ability to reverse its slide could in fact hinge on its winning passage of the bill, which would make it easier for workers to join unions.

The United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Retail Federation and more than a dozen other business groups are mounting a fierce campaign to stop the bill, inundating Congress with more than 10,000 e-mail messages and letters. At the same time, labor unions are sponsoring demonstrations, conferences and meetings in 99 cities this month to push for the legislation. The two sides have also squared off with newspaper advertisements.

"The business community thinks the labor movement is at death's door, and they want to make sure they keep this bill from passing," said Charles Craver, a professor of labor law at George Washington University. "If it passes, it will give labor a big boost."

Labor unions represent only 7.4 percent of the nation's private-sector workers, down from 35 percent in the 1950s. That helps explain why labor's campaign for the bill, the Employee Free Choice Act, represents its biggest legislative push in 30 years.

Legislative aides say they expect the bill to be approved next Thursday in the House, where it has 234 sponsors, including seven Republicans.

Business lobbyists voice confidence that they can block the bill in the Senate, where opponents say a filibuster is likely. Vice President Dick Cheney said last week that President Bush would veto the bill.

"It's a huge issue," said Randel Johnson, vice president for labor policy at the United States Chamber of Commerce. "We've targeted this as our No. 1 or No. 2 priority to defeat."

The bill would give employees at a workplace the right to unionize as soon as a majority sign cards saying they want a union, a process known as a card check or majority signup. Under current law, employers can insist on a secret-ballot election to determine whether a majority of employees favors a union.

Last summer Unite Here, the union representing apparel, hotel and laundry workers, used a card check to organize 300 housekeepers and other workers at the Marriott Downtown Los Angeles. Unite Here's previous efforts to organize the hotel's workers through a secret-ballot election faltered in the late 1980s and in the 1990s in the face of an aggressive management campaign.

"It didn't take very long for us to get 70 percent of the workers to sign cards saying they wanted a union," said Bruce Raynor, Unite Here's president.

With card checks, unions can often win unionization drives in two to four weeks.

With secret-ballot elections, unionization efforts can drag on for months, often delayed by litigation. Unions also say that many corporations break the law during election campaigns by firing, intimidating and spying on union supporters.

"Secret-ballot elections often occur in an environment that is so poisoned by the anti-union campaign that they can't possibly be considered a free choice," said Bill Samuel, the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s legislative director.

Mr. Samuel pointed to a National Labor Relations Board report that 31,358 workers received back pay in 2005 after their employers were accused of illegally retaliating against them for supporting a union.

Business lobbyists say the Employee Free Choice Act is antidemocratic and would deprive workers of their right to a secret ballot. They say union organizers will bully workers into signing pro-union cards.

"This debate is not about free choice," said Jason Straczewski, director of human resources policy for the National Association of Manufacturers. "It's about a quick fix for union membership on the decline."

Business groups argue that if secret-ballot elections are good enough for American voters, they should be good enough for union members.

Joseph A. McInerney, chief executive of the American Hotel and Lodging Association, said, "It's simply un-American."

Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao has also denounced the bill, saying, "A worker's right to a secret ballot election is an intrinsic right in our democracy that should not be legislated away at the behest of special interest groups."

Mary Beth Maxwell, executive director of American Rights at Work, a pro-union group, said it was surprising that corporations were defending workers' rights. "The notion that corporate lobbying coalitions and front groups are the new champions of workers' rights and democracy is laughable," Ms. Maxwell said.

Fairfax Schools Could Lose Millions For Defying 'No Child' (WP)

By Maria Glod

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

The U.S. Education Department threatened yesterday to withhold more than $17 million from Fairfax County schools if the system continues to defy a federal mandate to give reading tests to thousands of immigrant children.

Other Virginia school systems would also be in jeopardy if they refuse to comply with the federal No Child Left Behind Act, and the state could lose $2 million in administrative funds.

The possible loss of millions of dollars raises the stakes in a months-long standoff between the federal government and a growing group of Virginia educators over the best way to test immigrant students learning English.

The dispute started last summer when federal officials rejected the test Virginia uses to measure the progress of many immigrant children. The exam shows how well students learn to read, write and speak English. But it doesn't, as the No Child law requires, test students on their understanding of grade-level reading material, which can include comprehension and such concepts as similes and metaphors.

The Fairfax County School Board passed a resolution last month to defy the mandate, saying it is unfair to give such an exam to students just beginning to grasp the nuances of English. School boards in Arlington County, the city of Fairfax and Harrisonburg passed similar measures. The rebellion appears to be intensifying, with Loudoun County school officials also considering such a step.

"The resolutions say we will do the fair and right thing," said Allen C. Griffith, vice chairman of the Fairfax City School Board. But he said the threat of sanctions means that school systems will have to make difficult decisions.

The Education Department has "got the hammer, and they've got the big stick," Griffith said. "I suppose they can force these districts to bend to their will. . . . But how have the children gained anything?"

Chad Colby, an Education Department spokesman, said that under the No Child law, systems must show that all students, including children learning English, are making academic progress. He said the federal government needs to know that the funds it distributes are being used wisely.

"If you don't assess students, you don't know which students need the most help and how to direct those resources," Colby said. "Prior to No Child Left Behind, we spent . . . and there was no accountability."

The rift in Virginia mirrors a nationwide debate over how to ensure that English-language learners, a fast-growing population in schools, are making progress. When the Education Department rejected Virginia's test, it also found problems with the way 17 other states test English-language learners. Testing programs in Maryland and the District have withstood federal scrutiny.

Federal education officials note that students who are in the country less than a year are exempt from the reading test. Other language learners are allowed accommodations, such as more time or use of a bilingual dictionary.

Virginia educators, who say it takes far longer than a year for most children to comprehend grade-level reading work, had asked for permission to use the old test this spring and develop an alternative for next year. That request was denied.

Of the approximately 10,200 Virginia students affected by the testing dispute, about 4,000 are in Fairfax. Thousands more immigrant students who have made enough progress take the same reading tests as their native-speaking peers.

But in a meeting yesterday with state Superintendent of Public Instruction Billy K. Cannaday Jr., U.S. officials indicated that there probably will be a third alternative for Virginia schools. Federal officials said they expect to approve a state request to use a portfolio of a student's work over time instead of a test.

Fairfax County School Board member Stuart D. Gibson (Hunter Mill) yesterday said he does not think there is enough time to train teachers on the portfolio assessment and to collect assignments that show a student has mastered the material before the spring testing season.

Virginia Schools May Lose Funding (WT/AP)

By Zinie Chen Sampson, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

RICHMOND -- A top U.S. Department of Education official said yesterday that Virginia school divisions will lose federal funding if they do not comply with a federal law that requires children struggling to learn English take the same reading tests as their native-speaking peers.

Deputy Education Secretary Raymond Simon met with Superintendent of Public Instruction Billy K. Cannaday and other state education officials to discuss the provision of the No Child Left Behind law targeting those who are the least proficient in English. The Virginia Department of Education had unsuccessfully sought an exemption for another year, contending the rule is unfair.

Mr. Cannaday said after yesterday's meeting that he wanted school divisions to be aware that "no one is operating under the illusion that there will not be consequences for noncompliance," and that he expected school divisions to comply with the law "even though they question whether the tests are appropriate and the accommodations are adequate."

Immigrant-rich Fairfax County, the state's largest school division, stands to lose about $17 million, Mr. Cannaday said in a conference call with reporters. Officials have asked Mr. Simon to provide the state Board of Education figures on how much federal Title I funding school divisions stand to lose if they do not follow the law's provision.

Title I schools receive federal funds to serve children from low-income families and are the focus of most of NCLB's accountability measures.

School boards in Harrisonburg, Frederick, King and Queen and Amherst counties, and the D.C. suburbs of Fairfax, Prince William and Arlington counties recently signaled their intent to defy the NCLB mandates. Others are considering following suit.

Those boards have passed resolutions saying they will continue to evaluate all students' reading proficiency, but will only administer the state's grade-level Standards of Learning tests to students with an adequate grasp of English. Several school divisions said they wanted to continue using an alternative test to measure progress in nonnative English speakers.

Donald J. Ford, Harrisonburg's school superintendent, said yesterday that Harrisonburg's resolution stands, and the school board's next step is to determine how much Title I money the division could lose.

"Our school board isn't seeking to defy anything -- we're trying to determine how we can best meet the needs of children. It's simply unfair to proceed as we're being mandated to do," Mr. Ford said in a telephone interview.

"Whether there will come a time at all over the next month or six weeks that someone in authority at the U.S. Department of Education realizes how unfair and inappropriate their decision is something we're still looking for," he said.

While he empathized with local school divisions, Mr. Cannaday said the state can't risk losing money that will benefit more than just children who are learning English.

Mr. Cannaday also said the federal education department signaled it could let school divisions use the Virginia Grade-Level Assessment -- a portfolio of a student's work -- to measure the skills of low-English proficiency students. He also said state officials and Mr. Simon discussed the possibility of an option under a reauthorized NCLB that would give schools credit for making progress if they don't meet academic benchmarks solely because of the performance of English-language learners.

The issue is part of a larger debate over the law, which seeks to have all students, regardless of race, poverty or disability, proficient in reading and mathematics by 2014. It calls for students to be tested in math and reading in the third through eighth grades and once in high school, and it requires schools to show annual progress in test scores.

If schools fail to show yearly progress by each of numerous student subgroups -- including children who have limited English proficiency -- they face being labeled failing.

Those schools can lose funding.

Bush's Budget May Stifle Students' Loans (WT)

By Tom Ramstack

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

President Bush is trying to "right-size" the student loan industry with a proposed budget that would cut subsidies and drive out many private lenders by reducing their profits, the head of student loan giant Sallie Mae said yesterday.

"He put together something that would more than likely eliminate many of the players in the FFELP [Federal Family Education Loan Program student loan] industry," Tom Fitzpatrick, chief executive officer of SLM Corp., known as Sallie Mae, said during a meeting with editors and reporters at The Washington Times.

The Bush administration's proposed fiscal 2008 budget would reduce education subsidies for special programs, such as student loans, to $6.6 billion, from $9.7 billion this year. Lender subsidies would fall by 0.5 percentage points.

The White House said the $12.4 billion saved over five years by cutting subsidies would be used to increase the number of Pell Grants, which are given to the poorest college students. The grants do not need to be repaid.

Mr. Fitzpatrick's warnings about the Bush administration proposals were echoed by Prudential Equity Group financial analyst Charles Gabriel, who called the budget cuts a "shocker" in a research note to investors. The administration "may be doing the equivalent of throwing the student loan industry under the bus," the note said.

Meanwhile, the Senate is considering three bills on student loans. The proposals would create financial incentives for schools to participate in the government loan program by returning fees to them that otherwise would be paid to private lending institutions.

About 80 percent of student loans are given out by private lenders, while 20 percent are through the federal government, according to Sallie Mae, the nation's biggest provider of student loans.

The Reston company was formed as a government-sponsored enterprise in 1972 but completed a privatization in 2004.

Sallie Mae says giving the government more control over student loans would create a bloated bureaucracy and reduce competition among lenders to serve students and their families.

"The indicators are that the program actually costs the taxpayers money" by reducing competition among lenders, Mr. Fitzpatrick said.

A House bill approved Jan. 17 would cut interest rates on student loans in half, from 6.8 percent to 3.4 percent, over five years.

An estimated 5.5 million students who take out need-based federal loans would benefit from the lower interest rate.

Mr. Fitzpatrick said the 5.5 million students are about 27 percent of borrowers, but cutting rates would do little to reduce their college expenses. He called the idea of reducing interest rates "frivolous" and said it creates nothing more than a "headline sensation."

Mr. Fitzpatrick said he expects increases in Pell Grants to be approved, but that reduced interest rates on loans face a struggle in Congress.

The government pays interest on subsidized loans while students are in college. Afterward, the students pick up the payments.

The House proposal would cost the taxpayers nearly $6 billion, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

The costs would be offset by reducing the yield lenders can receive from the loans and cutting the guaranteed return banks receive when students default. Banks also would have to pay higher fees.

Mr. Fitzpatrick said just a small reduction in the money banks earn from student lending would mean "no one makes enough money to even service these loans."

He also said, "The margin on these loans have been, and are, razor thin."

Sallie Mae Chairman Albert Lord faces an investigation after he sold 400,000 shares of Sallie Mae stock on Feb. 2, three days before President Bush announced his budget proposal. The company's stock fell nearly 9 percent the day the budget was announced.

DOJ_NMG_0135891

Mr. Lord saved about $1.4 million by selling the stock, which prompted calls by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and other members of Congress for a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation.

"I would say it's unfortunate timing," Mr. Fitzpatrick said. He added that Mr. Lord notified the board of directors Jan. 25 that he would sell some of his shares.

SLM Corp.'s stock, SLM on the New York Stock Exchange, closed yesterday at $44.04 a share, down 7 cents, or less than 1 percent, from Wednesday's closing price.

For Energy, A Budget Not Without Merit (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Bonuses are back at the Energy Department.

The department got caught in a budget squeeze late last year when Congress failed to complete the annual spending bills funding the government on time. Worried that they would not be able to make ends meet and might even have to lay off employees, officials suspended bonuses normally paid at year's end until Congress wrapped up the fiscal 2007 budget.

Last week, President Bush signed a budget bill that included funds for Energy, and Secretary Samuel W. Bodman sent a memo to the workforce saying "this new law has allowed us to lift the 'hold' on performance-based awards and discretionary pay adjustments."

In his announcement Bodman called the matter "a subject I know has been on the minds of many."

The secretary thanked employees for their patience "while we steered our way through this budget process."

The hold on bonuses caused some stir in the department. The National Treasury Employees Union, which represents about 1,700 Energy employees, had filed two grievances over the matter. Yesterday, union president Colleen M. Kelley said she was pleased that the bonuses were back on track.

Energy was not the only agency concerned about funding this year. The Social Security Administration had cautioned Congress that it might have to send employees home without pay for up to 10 days if funding fell short. In the end, Congress cobbled together a big budget bill that averted temporary layoffs in government.

Bodman said Energy's funding "puts us in a solid position to achieve our goals this year," but the department will be operating more or less on the same footing as last year. The new budget provides $23.6 billion for the department, slightly more than the $23.5 billion in the 2006 budget.

Craig Stevens, the department's spokesman, said senior officials are reviewing programs and will make recommendations on their funding requirements to Bodman by mid-March. Even though Energy has not settled on program priorities for this year, Stevens said "there is enough money to support the bonuses."

He noted, "We did our best to be upfront and forthright with employees."Rally Time

Several hundred union activists will gather in Washington next week to attend annual legislative conferences sponsored by the American Federation of Government Employees and the National Treasury Employees Union.

AFGE's three-day conference begins on Sunday and features an address by former North Carolina senator John Edwards, a Democratic presidential candidate.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) will address the NTEU conference on its opening day, Tuesday. The three-day conference will conclude with a luncheon address by Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Both unions will ask their members to make visits to senators and House members to discuss issues important to federal employees, union officials said.Management Conference

The Federal Financial Management Conference, featuring Bush administration officials and a series of panel discussions, will be held in Washington on March 13.

Speakers include Clay Johnson III, deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget; Linda Combs~, controller at OMB; Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management; and David M. Walker, head of the Government Accountability Office.

The conference is sponsored by the Joint Financial Management Improvement Program, the General Services Administration's Financial Systems Integration Office and the Graduate School, USDA. For details, go to http://www.fsio.gov/fsio.Talk Shows

Margaret Baptiste, president of the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association, and the association's legislative aides, Dan Adcock and Jill Crissman, will be the guests on "FedTalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Profiteering Colleges (NYT)

The Democratic leadership in Congress plans to make college affordability a central theme of this legislative session. The pending bills that would increase federal aid to low-income students and lower the costs of student loans are good, as far as they go. But Congress must do more to ensure that scarce federal aid dollars are legitimately spent and not gobbled up by for-profit diploma mills that bilk the government and students alike.

Legitimate, well-run commercial colleges provide a crucial service for poorly prepared students who do not qualify for admission to traditional colleges. But not all schools are up to the job. Some rake in state and federal aid by recruiting marginally literate students who have no hope of ever graduating. Students who exhaust their aid find themselves burdened with debt and no closer to the degrees or the better lives they had hoped for.

The full scope of the problem is not yet known. But Congress got a glimpse of it two years ago, when the Office of the Inspector General at the United States Education Department reported that nearly three-quarters of its investigations had focused on problems at profit-making schools.

These problems have been especially evident in the state of New York, which has the most generous need-based student aid program in the nation. Faced with documented cases of student exploitation, the State Board of Regents declared a temporary moratorium last year on the opening of any more for-profit colleges, then beefed up the regulations governing their operation.

The Regents have closed down one commercial college and sanctioned three others, which could be closed if they do not meet performance targets. They are now scrutinizing the University of Phoenix, the for-profit giant that has been trying for years to enter the lucrative New York market. At issue are questions about academic quality, graduation rates and a pending federal lawsuit that charges the university with fraudulently obtaining hundreds of millions of dollars in aid.

New York's Board of Regents is right to keep a close eye on these schools. And as Congress prepares to reauthorize the Higher Education Act, it needs to take a harder look at for-profit colleges to make sure that students and the government are getting what they pay for.

Trapped On An Airplane (NYT)

JetBlue's horrendous performance during the recent ice storms that paralyzed New York City's airports has reinvigorated calls for a "passengers' bill of rights" to protect air travelers against what can only be deemed abusive treatment. JetBlue has moved rapidly to make amends, but its shocking failures and those of other airlines in recent months make a federal law the best solution.

At the storm's worst, JetBlue had nine planes sitting on the tarmac at Kennedy Airport for six to 10 hours while passengers were trapped in sweltering cabins with only snacks for food and stinking toilets. The company's first big mistake was betting that the weather would quickly improve. It failed to cancel outgoing fights that were unable to take off while it allowed incoming flights to keep landing — creating gridlock at its gates. Meanwhile, some planes' wheels froze to the ground along with the equipment that moves and de-ices them.

The same lean organization that has allowed JetBlue to keep fares low collapsed under the strain. The airline ended up with large numbers of pilots and flight attendants far from where they were needed. Crew members who tried to call in failed to get through an overwhelmed communications system. The understaffed reservations system could not handle the flood of calls from passengers trying to figure out whether to go to the airport.

JetBlue seems desperately eager to make amends before it loses a huge chunk of its customers. It has said it will add staff members and improve training. It has also issued a "Customer Bill of Rights," which would compensate passengers kept waiting by the airline's own mistakes (including those affected by the recent ice storm) and allow passengers to get off planes if grounded for more than five hours.

That's a start but not enough. The code is voluntary and applies only to JetBlue, whereas other airlines have also treated passengers abusively. Last December, American Airlines kept passengers trapped aboard a diverted plane for more than eight hours — an incident of such notoriety that American now pledges to let passengers off after four hours.

Senators Barbara Boxer, a California Democrat, and Olympia Snowe, Republican of Maine, have introduced a bill that would require that passengers be provided with adequate food and water and sanitary bathrooms while delayed on the ground and be allowed to leave the plane after three hours. Representative Mike Thompson, also a California Democrat, will introduce a bill that would also require airlines to update passengers frequently on the cause and timing of delays. Both proposals would be strengthened if they required the Transportation Department to impose suitable fines or passenger compensation should an airline fail to comply.

Although the airline industry continues to oppose government intervention, Congress needs to ensure that passengers have the right to escape involuntary confinement, to be adequately fed and cared for, and to receive timely and accurate information about their prospects for taking off. These needs seem so basic it is hard to see why they should not be mandatory.

A Visit Worth The Time And Money (NYT)

If government had a department of irony, the mammoth, ever more expensive and still uncompleted Capitol Visitor Center would be renamed the People's Debt and Deficit Walk-Through Memorial.

The three-story subterranean center being built (for nearly seven years) under the Capitol's East Plaza will have a 600-seat cafeteria, an interactive museum about the glories of democracy and the latest in security to screen out potential malefactors among the throngs who currently gather in snaking outdoor lines for tours.

The center will also have a grand waiting hall — appropriately enough — since it handily missed its planned opening for President Bush's second inaugural. Official optimism has undergone annual readjustments, with Congress now informed that the center won't open this fall (as promised last year) but for sure will open in summer of 2008. Meanwhile, the cost has doubled, steadily rising somewhere "north of $600 million," as one government expert told lawmakers.

Congress put its thumb on the scale, ordering up extra hideaways — second offices for members who want more time to themselves — along with more conference rooms and an emergency debating auditorium. The 9/11 attacks have inevitably been cited as the cause for delays and additional costs as designers built in increased security. But specialists estimate that the project schedule continues to slip by two weeks every month.

The American taxpayers, who will pay for the project for generations to come, deserve to be treated to candor. And what better way than by turning the center into a teaching museum on the hyperbolic plans and procrastination of Washington life?

Why not add exhibits saluting other grand cost overruns? The Top 10 list includes the still dysfunctional "Star Wars" missile defense, with a current estimated price tag of $130 billion-plus. And, of course, the Iraq war, consuming an estimated $10 billion in military expenses each month.

No need to rush, but there's still time to make an honest sow's ear out of this silk purse. Parents and kids alike will enjoy the tour.

U.S. Economy Leaving Record Numbers In Severe Poverty (MCT)

By Tony Pugh

McClatchy Newspapers, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - The percentage of poor Americans who are living in severe poverty has reached a 32-year high, millions of working Americans are falling closer to the poverty line and the gulf between the nation's "haves" and "have-nots" continues to widen.

A McClatchy Newspapers analysis of 2005 census figures, the latest available, found that nearly 16 million Americans are living in deep or severe poverty. A family of four with two children and an annual income of less than $9,903 - half the federal poverty line - was considered severely poor in 2005. So were individuals who made less than $5,080 a year.

The McClatchy analysis found that the number of severely poor Americans grew by 26 percent from 2000 to 2005. That's 56 percent faster than the overall poverty population grew in the same period. McClatchy's review also found statistically significant increases in the percentage of the population in severe poverty in 65 of 215 large U.S. counties, and similar increases in 28 states. The review also suggested that the rise in severely poor residents isn't confined to large urban counties but extends to suburban and rural areas.

The plight of the severely poor is a distressing sidebar to an unusual economic expansion. Worker productivity has increased dramatically since the brief recession of 2001, but wages and job growth have lagged behind. At the same time, the share of national income going to corporate profits has dwarfed the amount going to wages and salaries. That helps explain why the median household income of working-age families, adjusted for inflation, has fallen for five straight years.

These and other factors have helped push 43 percent of the nation's 37 million poor people into deep poverty - the highest rate since at least 1975.

The share of poor Americans in deep poverty has climbed slowly but steadily over the last three decades. But since 2000, the number of severely poor has grown "more than any other segment of the population," according to a recent study in the American Journal of Preventive Medicine.

"That was the exact opposite of what we anticipated when we began," said Dr. Steven Woolf of Virginia Commonwealth University, who co-authored the study. "We're not seeing as much moderate poverty as a proportion of the population. What we're seeing is a dramatic growth of severe poverty."

The growth spurt, which leveled off in 2005, in part reflects how hard it is for low-skilled workers to earn their way out of poverty in an unstable job market that favors skilled and educated workers. It also suggests that social programs aren't as effective as they once were at catching those who fall into economic despair.

About one in three severely poor people are under age 17, and nearly two out of three are female. Female-headed families with children account for a large share of the severely poor.

Nearly two out of three people (10.3 million) in severe poverty are white, but blacks (4.3 million) and Hispanics of any race (3.7 million) make up disproportionate shares. Blacks are nearly three times as likely as non-Hispanic whites to be in deep poverty, while Hispanics are roughly twice as likely.

Washington, D.C., the nation's capital, has a higher concentration of severely poor people - 10.8 percent in 2005 - than any of the 50 states, topping even hurricane-ravaged Mississippi and Louisiana, with 9.3 percent and 8.3 percent, respectively. Nearly six of 10 poor District residents are in extreme poverty.

'I DON'T ASK FOR NOTHING'

A few miles from the Capitol Building, 60-year-old John Treece pondered his life in deep poverty as he left a local food pantry with two bags of free groceries.

Plagued by arthritis, back problems and myriad ailments from years of manual labor, Treece has been unable to work full time for 15 years. He's tried unsuccessfully to get benefits from the Social Security Administration, which he said disputes his injuries and work history.

In 2006, an extremely poor individual earned less than $5,244 a year, according to federal poverty guidelines. Treece said he earned about that much in 2006 doing odd jobs.

Wearing shoes with holes, a tattered plaid jacket and a battered baseball cap, Treece lives hand-to-mouth in a $450-a-month room in a nondescript boarding house in a high-crime neighborhood. Thanks to food stamps, the food pantry and help from relatives, Treece said he never goes hungry. But toothpaste, soap, toilet paper and other items that require cash are tougher to come by.

"Sometimes it makes you want to do the wrong thing, you know," Treece said, referring to crime. "But I ain't a kid no more. I can't do no time. At this point, I ain't got a lotta years left."

Treece remains positive and humble despite his circumstances.

"I don't ask for nothing," he said. "I just thank the Lord for this day and ask that tomorrow be just as blessed."

Like Treece, many who did physical labor during their peak earning years have watched their job prospects dim as their bodies gave out.

David Jones, the president of the Community Service Society of New York City, an advocacy group for the poor, testified before the House Ways and Means Committee last month that he was shocked to discover how pervasive the problem was.

"You have this whole cohort of, particularly African-Americans of limited skills, men, who can't participate in the workforce because they don't have skills to do anything but heavy labor," he said.

'A PERMANENT UNDERCLASS'

Severe poverty is worst near the Mexican border and in some areas of the South, where 6.5 million severely poor residents are struggling to find work as manufacturing jobs in the textile, apparel and furniture-making industries disappear. The Midwestern Rust Belt and areas of the Northeast also have been hard hit as economic restructuring and foreign competition have forced numerous plant closings.

At the same time, low-skilled immigrants with impoverished family members are increasingly drawn to the South and Midwest to work in the meatpacking, food processing and agricultural industries.

These and other factors such as increased fluctuations in family incomes and illegal immigration have helped push 43 percent of the nation's 37 million poor people into deep poverty - the highest rate in at least 32 years.

"What appears to be taking place is that, over the long term, you have a significant permanent underclass that is not being impacted by anti-poverty policies," said Michael Tanner, the director of Health and Welfare Studies at the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank.

Arloc Sherman, a senior researcher at the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, a liberal think tank, disagreed. "It doesn't look like a growing permanent underclass," said Sherman, whose organization has chronicled the growth of deep poverty. "What you see in the data are more and more single moms with children who lose their jobs and who aren't being caught by a safety net anymore."

About 1.1 million such families account for roughly 2.1 million deeply poor children, Sherman said.

After fleeing an abusive marriage in 2002, 42-year-old Marjorie Sant moved with her three children from Arkansas to a seedy boarding house in Raleigh, N.C., where the four shared one bedroom. For most of 2005, they lived off food stamps and the $300 a month in Social Security Disability Income for her son with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. Teachers offered clothes to Sant's children. Saturdays meant lunch at the Salvation Army.

"To depend on other people to feed and clothe your kids is horrible," Sant said. "I found myself in a hole and didn't know how to get out."

In the summer of 2005, social workers warned that she'd lose her children if her home situation didn't change. Sant then brought her two youngest children to a temporary housing program at the Raleigh Rescue Mission while her oldest son moved to California to live with an adult daughter from a previous marriage.

So for 10 months, Sant learned basic office skills. She now lives in a rented house, works two jobs and earns about $20,400 a year.

Sant is proud of where she is, but she knows that "if something went wrong, I could well be back to where I was."

'I'M GETTING NOWHERE FAST'

As more poor Americans sink into severe poverty, more individuals and families living within $8,000 above or below the poverty line also have seen their incomes decline. Steven Woolf of Virginia Commonwealth University attributes this to what he calls a "sinkhole effect" on income.

"Just as a sinkhole causes everything above it to collapse downward, families and individuals in the middle and upper classes appear to be migrating to lower-income tiers that bring them closer to the poverty threshold," Woolf wrote in the study.

Before Hurricane Katrina, Rene Winn of Biloxi, Miss., earned $28,000 a year as an administrator for the Boys and Girls Club. But for 11 months in 2006, she couldn't find steady work and wouldn't take a fast-food job. As her opportunities dwindled, Winn's frustration grew.

"Some days I feel like the world is mine and I can create my own destiny," she said. "Other days I feel a desperate feeling. Like I gotta' hurry up. Like my career is at a stop. Like I'm getting nowhere fast. And that's not me because I've always been a positive person."

After relocating to New Jersey for 10 months after the storm, Winn returned to Biloxi in September because of medical and emotional problems with her son. She and her two youngest children moved into her sister's home along with her mother, who has Alzheimer's. With her sister, brother-in-law and their two children, eight people now share a three-bedroom home.

Winn said she recently took a job as a technician at the state health department. The hourly job pays $16,120 a year. That's enough to bring her out of severe poverty and just $122 shy of the $16,242 needed for a single mother with two children to escape poverty altogether under current federal guidelines.

Winn eventually wants to transfer to a higher-paying job, but she's thankful for her current position.

"I'm very independent and used to taking care of my own, so I don't like the fact that I have to depend on the state. I want to be able to do it myself."

The Census Bureau's Survey of Income and Program Participation shows that, in a given month, only 10 percent of severely poor Americans received Temporary Assistance for Needy Families in 2003 - the latest year available - and that only 36 percent received food stamps.

Many could have exhausted their eligibility for welfare or decided that the new program requirements were too onerous. But the low participation rates are troubling because the worst byproducts of poverty, such as higher crime and violence rates and poor health, nutrition and educational outcomes, are worse for those in deep poverty.

Over the last two decades, America has had the highest or near-highest poverty rates for children, individual adults and families among 31 developed countries, according to the Luxembourg Income Study, a 23-year project that compares poverty and income data from 31 industrial nations.

"It's shameful," said Timothy Smeeding, the former director of the study and the current head of the Center for Policy Research at Syracuse University. "We've been the worst performer every year since we've been doing this study."

With the exception of Mexico and Russia, the U.S. devotes the smallest portion of its gross domestic product to federal anti-poverty programs, and those programs are among the least effective at reducing poverty, the study found. Again, only Russia and Mexico do worse jobs.

One in three Americans will experience a full year of extreme poverty at some point in his or her adult life, according to long-term research by Mark Rank, a professor of social welfare at the University of Wisconsin, Madison.

An estimated 58 percent of Americans between the ages of 20 and 75 will spend at least a year in poverty, Rank said. Two of three will use a public assistance program between ages 20 and 65, and 40 percent will do so for five years or more.

These estimates apply only to non-immigrants. If illegal immigrants were factored in, the numbers would be worse, Rank said.

"It would appear that for most Americans the question is no longer if, but rather when, they will experience poverty. In short, poverty has become a routine and unfortunate part of the American life course," Rank wrote in a recent study. "Whether these patterns will continue throughout the first decade of 2000 and beyond is difficult to say ... but there is little reason to think that this trend will reverse itself any time soon."

'SOMETHING REAL AND TROUBLING'

Most researchers and economists say federal poverty estimates are a poor tool to gauge the complexity of poverty. The numbers don't factor in assistance from government anti-poverty programs, such as food stamps, housing subsidies and the Earned Income Tax Credit, all of which increase incomes and help pull people out of poverty.

But federal poverty measures also exclude work-related expenses and necessities such as day care, transportation, housing and health care costs, which eat up large portions of disposable income, particularly for low-income families.

Alternative poverty measures that account for these shortcomings typically inflate or deflate official poverty statistics. But many of those alternative measures show the same kind of long-term trends as the official poverty data.

Robert Rector, a senior researcher with the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, questioned the growth of severe poverty, saying that census data become less accurate farther down the income ladder. He said many poor people, particularly single mothers with boyfriends, underreport their income by not including cash gifts and loans. Rector said he's seen no data that suggest increasing deprivation among the very poor.

Arloc Sherman of the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities argues that the growing number of severely poor is an indisputable fact.

"When we check against more complete government survey data and administrative records from the benefit programs themselves, they confirm that this trend is real," Sherman said. He added that even among the poor, severely poor people have a much tougher time paying their bills. "That's another sign to me that we're seeing something real and troubling," Sherman said.

Dow, S& P 500 Sink While Nasdaq Rises (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, February 23, 2007

Weak earnings from a leading home builder, a $1.5 billion damage verdict against Microsoft and general concern that a market correction is overdue piled up to send stocks lower Thursday.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 52.39 points to 12,686.02, making it the benchmark's second-straight down day. Still, the Dow remains up 1.8% this year.

Injured by losses of stocks in the environmental services, specialized finance and construction materials industries, the Standard & Poor's 500 index lost 1.25 points to 1456.38. The S&P 500 remains up 2.7% for the year.

Tech stocks were the exception, with the Nasdaq composite index rising 6.52 points to 2524.94. The tech-heavy index got a lift from semiconductor maker Analog Devices, which reported strong quarterly results late Wednesday and issued a positive outlook.

Some were encouraged by the market's ability to recover from the day's lows. The Dow, for instance, had been down nearly 90 points during the day. "It was a test. It was a good test," says Joseph Saluzzi, trader at Themis Trading. "It was relatively stable," he says.

Investors need to block out the panic about whether a market correction is overdue and imminent, says Alan Skrainka, strategist at Edward Jones.

It's true that the current rally of the Dow and S&P 500 is the second longest without a 10% correction in more than 100 years, Skrainka says. But he adds the longest rally, in the 1990s, ran 1,000 days longer than the current one, which is about a week from the 1,000-day mark. "It doesn't pay to worry about a correction. That doesn't stop it from happening," Skrainka says.

Instead, know that corrections are frequent and normal, and be ready to buy stocks at lower prices if the opportunity comes. "It doesn't pay to time the market," he says.

Stocks Ease As Oil Nears $61; Nasdaq Grabs A 6-Year High (WSJ)

By Shefali Anand

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

Stocks slipped, as oil zipped higher for a second straight day.

Crude-oil prices crossed the $61 mark in intraday trading, following news of a decline in supplies of some petroleum products. Crude-futures contracts for April delivery rose 88 cents, or 1.5%, to $60.95 a barrel at the New York Mercantile Exchange, the highest close in 2007 and only 10 cents below the start of the year.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell for a second straight day, closing down 52.39 points, or 0.4%, to 12686.02, up 1.8% this year.

The Energy Department reported that inventories of gasoline and natural gas fell more than expected in the week ended Feb 16. Supplies of crude oil, however, rose.

Traders also paid attention to a United Nations report that Iran wasn't cutting back its nuclear program, which raises the possibility of trouble in the Middle East that could affect the supply, and consequently, the price of oil.

Still, analysts aren't sure that oil's gains can be sustained for a long period. "Without further help, be it from weather or supply, [the price] may settle back a bit," said Jeffrey Grossman, president of commodities trading firm BRG Brokerage.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.1%, or 1.25 points, to 1456.38, up 2.7% on the year. But the technology-laden Nasdaq Composite Index, which began the day lower, closed at a fresh six-year high, rising 0.3%, or 6.52 points, to 2524.94. It is now up 4.5% year-to-date.

Some market professionals said they wouldn't be surprised to see more declines in the next few trading sessions, but remain bullish on stocks for the year overall. "We're overdue for a pause on the equity side because the markets have really been very strong," said Andy Brooks, head of stock trading at Baltimore investment-management firm T. Rowe Price.

Some semiconductor shares rose on the back of good company news. Microchip maker Analog Devices rose 10% to $36.80, following its announcement of better-than-expected first-quarter earnings after the market close Wednesday. National Semiconductor shares jumped about 7% to $25.39.

Shares of Whole Foods Market rose 14% to $51.74, after the firm announced that it would buy rival Wild Oats Markets for $565 million. Wild Oats stock was up 17% to close at $18.41.

Outside the U.S. Stocks rose in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, rose 0.35%, or 0.89 point, to 253.33.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed. On the Big Board, where 2.6 billion shares traded, 1,534 stocks rose and 1,736 fell.

Bonds declined. The 10-year Treasury note fell 10/32, or $3.12 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.730%. The 30-year bond fell 20/32, to yield 4.830%.

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, it traded at 121.58 yen, up from 120.88 yen, while the euro fell slightly against the dollar at $1.3124 from $1.3139.

UCLA Wins Psychiatric Sex Trial, But No One Gets Monetary Award (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

A Los Angeles jury today ruled against a former UCLA psychiatric resident who claimed the school unfairly rescinded its offer of a coveted job because he broke off an affair with his supervisor.

But jurors did not believe the supervisor's counter-charge that Dr. David Martorano had slandered her by making up the affair, which Martorano testified included oral sex in parked cars.

In the end, neither party was awarded any money after a two-week trial of their dueling lawsuits that featured the appearance of no fewer than nine psychiatrists, along with women testifying about their sex lives under code names to protect their privacy.

As Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Judith Chirlin said to the jury: "You could have been here on some boring contract case."

Martorano, a handsome Columbia University-educated physician and a former psychiatric resident at UCLA's Neuropsychiatric Institute, alleged that he lost a coveted post as chief resident and that his reputation was ruined once rumors of the affair began to circulate after he broke off the relationship. He sued his former supervisor, Dr. Heather Krell, and UCLA.

Krell's lawyer accused Martorano of making the whole thing up to seduce yet another psychiatrist. Krell countersued Martorano for slander and invasion of privacy.

UCLA's lawyer, meanwhile, said it didn't matter from a legal perspective whether Martorano and Krell had an affair -- university administrators acted properly when they revoked the offer for Martorano to become chief resident after rumors began to fly because it was unacceptable for there to be even the perception that he was getting a job based on a sexual affair at the institute, one of the top facilities of its kind in the country.

Testimony was so explicit that Chirlin allowed several women to testify under code names, a decision she acknowledged was unusual but necessary to protect their reputations.

At times, the witness box seemed more like a psychoanalytic couch -- and not just because witnesses often faced not only a judge, jury and lawyers but also at least two psychiatrists.

Testimony and court papers included Martorano's depiction of himself zipping around Malibu on dates in a two-seater, as well as an internal UCLA report that said that people who worked with him said he "frequently spent his downtime ... talking about his sexual conduct." Jurors also heard his personal psychiatrist's assessment that he was "addicted" to having women fall in love with him.

At one point, UCLA's lawyer, Alan Zuckerman, asked Martorano, a former opera singer and the son of a psychiatrist, if he thought he had a narcissistic personality disorder. As Zuckerman later told the jury, narcissists have a grandiose sense of self, lack empathy for others and take advantage of them.

Martorano replied that he would never call himself narcissistic but that "there are traits of narcissism that I possess."

In his closing argument, Zuckerman went point by point through the nine attributes of narcissistic personality disorder in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders and explained how each attribute fit Martorano. He then accused the doctor of filing the lawsuit because his narcissistic personality couldn't handle that Krell would not admit that she had slept with him.

In response, Martorano's lawyer, Robert Scott, said that "some lawyers want to become psychiatrists." Later, he referred to Krell's lawyer, Donald Garrard, as "Dr. Garrard."

Garrard, meanwhile, enthusiastically endorsed the diagnoses of Martorano as a raging narcissist, offering several examples of his own.

Then he turned to evolutionary psychology in his attempt to impugn Martorano's testimony, saying that it wasn't believable that Martorano couldn't recall details of sex he allegedly had with Krell. "The genes we come with are programmed for little else," he said as the judge and members of the jury and gallery burst into laughter.

He also argued that jurors should not believe Martorano's claim that Krell had performed oral sex on him parked in an Audi in front of her apartment, because a 35-year-old physician would obviously choose to go to her apartment rather than stay in the car.

Garrard urged jurors to punish Martorano for acting like "a 14-year-old boy" by awarding Krell punitive damages.

Martorano's attorney, however, argued that the evidence that Martorano and Krell had an affair was hard to dispute. He pointed to dozens of phone calls, social events they attended together and testimony that they watched a movie about a porn star titled "The Fluffer."

Then, when rumors of the affair emerged, he said, Krell created a hostile work environment for Martorano by criticizing him excessively and by spreading rumors that he was a liar, a misogynist and manic depressive. He also was denied the job of chief resident. Then, Scott said, UCLA tried to "sweep it all under the rug" to protect itself.

This is not the only sexual harassment claim facing UCLA's medical school and its psychiatry department.

Krell has also filed a separate sexual harassment suit against UCLA, alleging that she was subjected to an onslaught of sexual comments and sexually degrading and demeaning behavior and gestures from Andrew Leuchter, another psychiatrist at UCLA.

She also alleged that department administrators retaliated against her when she complained. UCLA denies the allegations. The case is to go to trial next fall.

The university recently lost an appeal of a third, unrelated sexual harassment and discrimination case in which a female psychiatrist was awarded $2.9 million.

Martorano now runs a psychiatric practice out of his home in Malibu, where one of the things he specializes in, according to his website, is couples therapy. But that has not been trouble-free.

He and his new wife are embroiled in a legal dispute with a neighbor.

His next-door neighbor recently accused him of killing his dog and videotaping his children. In a countersuit, Martorano denied the allegations and accused his neighbor of telling his patients he was a dog-killer and child molester.

Grades Rise, But Reading Skills Do Not (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — High school students nationwide are taking seemingly tougher courses and earning better grades, but their reading skills are not improving through the effort, according to two federal reports released here Thursday that cite grade inflation as a possible explanation.

The National Assessment of Educational Progress, an exam commonly known as the nation's report card, found that the reading skills of 12th graders tested in 2005 were significantly worse than those of students in 1992, when a comparable test was first given, and essentially flat since students previously took the exam in 2002.

The test results also showed that the overwhelming majority of high school seniors have not fully mastered high-school-level math.

At the same time, however, grade-point averages have risen nationwide, according to a separate survey by the National Assessment, of the transcripts of 26,000 students, which compared them with a study of students' coursework in 1990.

"There's a disconnect between what we want and expect our 12th graders to know and do, and what our schools are actually delivering through instruction in the classroom," David W. Gordon, the superintendent of schools in Sacramento, said at a news conference announcing the results.

The reports offered several rationales for the disparity between rising grade-point averages and tougher coursework on the one hand and stagnant reading scores on the other, including "grade inflation, changes in grading standards" or the possibility that student grades were being increasingly affected by things like classroom participation or extra assignments.

The National Assessment of Educational Progress is considered the yardstick for academic performance because it is the only test taken all across the country. The test of 12th-grade achievement was given to a representative sample of 21,000 high school seniors attending 900 public and private schools from January to March 2005.

It showed that the share of 12th-grade students lacking even basic high school reading skills — meaning they could not, for example, extract data about train fares at different times of day from a brochure — rose to 27 percent from 20 percent in 1992.

The share of students proficient in reading dropped to 35 percent from 40 percent in 1992. At the same time, the gap between boys and girls grew, with girls' reading skills more than a year ahead those of boys.

In math, only 23 percent of all 12th graders were proficient, but the exam has been revamped, so the results could not be compared with those from earlier years, officials said. The new test has fewer questions requiring arithmetic and more using algebra and geometry. Some 39 percent of 12th graders lacked even basic high school math skills.

These results came about even though the separate study of transcripts showed that 12th graders in 2005 averaged 360 more hours of classroom instruction during their high school years than students had in 1990.

Their overall grade-point average was 2.98 — just shy of a B. That was one-third of a letter grade higher than in 1990. The share of students taking a standard curriculum or better, intended to prepare them for college, jumped to 68 percent from 40 percent.

In math, girls had higher grades than boys, and closed the achievement gap, scoring about as well as boys did on the national assessment. Boys who had taken advanced math and science courses, however, scored higher than girls who had also taken such courses.

The Bush administration, which has been pressing to expand testing in high school under the federal education law, No Child Left Behind, seized upon the results as proof that high schools were not measuring up.

"The consensus for strengthening our high schools has never been stronger," Margaret Spellings, the secretary of education, said in a statement released in advance of the report. "Schools must prepare students to succeed in college and the 21st-century work force."

Just how students can be getting better grades in classes that are supposedly more challenging yet lag in reading may become clearer in the future. Mark Schneider, the commissioner of the National Center for Education Statistics, the branch of the Education Department that administers the exams, had also collected a warehouse full of course descriptions, reading lists and textbooks to investigate the actual content of classes students are taking.

The Education Trust, a nonprofit group representing urban schools, attributed the disparity to a kind of academic false advertising, saying that schools may seem to offer the same courses to all students, but that the content of those courses is sometimes less demanding for poor and minority children.

For example, the group found, a ninth-grade English teacher at one school assigned students a two- to three-page essay comparing the themes of Homer's "Odyssey" to those in the movie "O Brother, Where Art Thou?" At the same school, assignments in another class covering the same material were considerably less demanding. There, students broke up into three clusters, with one designing a brochure for "Odyssey Cruises," another drawing pictures and the third making up a crossword using characters from the "Odyssey."

"Just slapping new names on courses with weak curriculum and ill-prepared teachers won't boost achievement," Kati Haycock, the Education Trust's president, said.

Grades Rise, But Reading Skills Fall, Data Suggest (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — High school seniors are taking more challenging classes and earning higher grades than ever, but their reading skills have actually worsened since 1992, data released Thursday by the U.S. Education Department suggest.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said the results show that "we must act now to increase rigor in our high schools." The No Child Left Behind law, up for reauthorization this year, currently applies only minimally to high schools.

The report brought mixed — and contradictory — results:

A record 68% of the class of 2005 completed at least a standard curriculum with four years of English and three each of math, science and social studies. That's a huge jump from 1990, when only 40% did the same, according to the study of 26,000 public- and private-school transcripts.

In 2005, 51% of students were doing college-preparatory work, up from 31% in 1990. And 10% were earning college credit, up from 5% in 1990.

·The average high school senior doesn't read as well as those in 1992, the first year the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP) was given to 12th-graders. In 2005, 35% of seniors scored "proficient" or "advanced," down from 40% in 1992.

Reading at a "proficient" level means students can make critical judgments — for instance, describing how two editorials argue different viewpoints. "Basic" means students can read and retrieve information from a document and recognize a sequence of plot elements.

The government has no comparable long-term data on math scores since it changed the test in 2005. But the 2005 scores show that, overall, 12th-graders' skills are basic at best.

"Clearly we need to look at some major changes in the way schools are organized and how teaching is delivered," Massachusetts Education Commissioner David Driscoll said.

The Brookings Institution's Tom Loveless, who researches the NAEP and course content, said that the reading results "should really be an area of concern" — and that perhaps even the brightest students don't read as much as they used to.

Critics have long said the NAEP is a poor measure of how well 12th-graders do, and the new data could give them ammunition: Even students whose transcripts show they took calculus score only, on average, "proficient" in math.

Loveless noted that the test includes no calculus, which forces advanced students to do math work they haven't done in three or four years.

Education researcher Gerald Bracey said 12th-graders take the NAEP in the last semester of their high school careers, and they have no real incentive to do well. Poor results are "senior slump writ large," he said.

Test Scores At Odds With Rising High School Grades (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

High school seniors are performing worse overall on some national tests than they did in the previous decade, even though they are receiving significantly higher grades and taking what seem to be more rigorous courses, according to government data released yesterday.

The mismatch between stronger transcripts and weak test scores on the National Assessment of Educational Progress, often called the nation's report card, resonated in the Washington area and elsewhere. Some seized upon the findings as evidence of grade inflation and the dumbing-down of courses. The findings also prompted renewed calls for tough national standards and the expansion of the federal No Child Left Behind law.

"We have our work cut out for us," Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said in a statement. "If, in fact, our high school students are taking more challenging courses and earning higher grades, we should be seeing greater gains in test scores."

About 35 percent of 12th-graders tested in 2005 scored proficient or better in reading -- the lowest percentage since the test was launched in 1992, the new data showed. And less than a quarter of seniors scored at least proficient on a new version of the math test; officials called those results disappointing but said they could not be compared to past scores. In addition, a previous report found that 18 percent of seniors in 2005 scored at least proficient in science, down from 21 percent in 1996.

At the same time, the average high school grade-point average rose from 2.68 in 1990 (about a B-minus) to 2.98 in 2005 (about a B), according to a study of transcripts from graduating seniors. The study also found that the percentage of graduating seniors who completed a standard or mid-level course of study rose from 35 to 58 percent in that time; meanwhile, the percentage who took the highest-level curriculum doubled, to 10 percent.

"The core problem is that course titles don't really signal what is taught in the course and grades don't signal what a kid has learned," said Kati Haycock, president of the Education Trust, a D.C.-based nonprofit group that supports No Child Left Behind. She added hyperbolically, "What we're going to end up with is the high school valedictorian who can't write three paragraphs."

Some experts say these educational mirages, which obscure low student achievement with inflated grades and tough-sounding class titles, disproportionately harm poor and minority students.

A visit to two ninth-grade English classes in Prince George's County this week showed that instruction can vary immensely even in classrooms -- just 15 miles apart -- that share the same champagne-colored textbook, the same course title and the same syllabus.

In Room 101 at Bowie High, a racially diverse school in one of the county's more affluent areas, the assignment was: Compare and contrast the themes of disillusionment, poverty and frustration in George Orwell's "Animal Farm" and the poems of Langston Hughes.

In Room 31 at Suitland High, which has more poor and black students, the assignment was: What are your immediate goals? How would you feel if no one close to you supported you in reaching your goals?

The teacher at Suitland, R'Chelle L. Mullins, walked around the classroom and repeated the assignment several times to the students, some of whose heads were slumped on their desks. "What are your immediate goals?" she asked one boy again.

"To pass the ninth grade," he finally answered.

After class, Mullins said she had "stuck very close to the curriculum" and "was doing exactly what the county wants me to do." But when told of the more complicated questions asked in the Bowie High class, Mullins acknowledged that she sometimes modifies assignments based on the background of her students.

Mullins, 24, who began teaching two years ago because she wanted to help underprivileged children, said she had "a different caliber" of students in her classroom. "Not to dumb my kids down," she added. "I hate the bad reputation that they get, and I don't think it's fair at all. . . . Not to pass the blame, but some of these kids should never have been allowed to graduate middle school."

County Superintendent John E. Deasy said he is working hard to reduce inequities among schools and cited uneven teacher quality as a key issue. He said that the county curriculum has been standardized and that the challenge now is to ensure an equal level of instruction in every classroom by investing in teacher training and increasing the number of Advancement Placement courses.

"This is the civil rights issue of our time," Deasy said.

The potential for grade and course-title inflation is not confined to low-performing schools. Julie Greenberg, a math teacher at Montgomery Blair High School in Silver Spring, said she was under such pressure to raise grades that she used to keep two sets of books in her statistics class: one for the grades students deserved and one for the grades that appeared on report cards.

"If a teacher were to really grade students on their true level of mastery, there would be such extraordinary levels of failure that it would not be tolerated, so most teachers don't do that," she said.

At a news conference yesterday near Capitol Hill, education experts expressed concern that white and Asian students continue to score consistently higher than black and Hispanic students in all subjects. They also said the overall discrepancy between the test scores and transcripts deserves close examination. Darvin M. Winick, chairman of the National Assessment Governing Board, which oversaw the exams and the transcript study, called the gap "very suspicious."

"For all of our talk of the achievement gap amongst subgroups of students, a larger problem may be an instructional gap or a rigor gap," said David W. Gordon, superintendent of Sacramento County schools in California. "There's a disconnect between what we want and expect our 12th-grade students to know and do and what our schools are actually delivering through instruction in the classroom."

Lawmakers said the low test scores would reinvigorate the debate over high school reform as Congress considers the renewal of No Child Left Behind.

DOJ_NMG_0135902

Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, said "disappointing" results underscore the need to recruit first-rate teachers to low-performing schools.

Report Raises Questions About High-School Courses (WSJ)

By Robert Tomsho

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

American educators have complained about grade inflation for years. But new findings suggest that U.S. high schools may also suffer from another type of inflation -- in the labeling of courses.

Under pressure to produce graduates better prepared for college and the workplace, dozens of states have stiffened high-school graduation requirements in recent years, pushing a broader array of students to take more years of core subjects and eliminating less rigorous lower-tier courses altogether.

Reflecting these efforts, a review of high-school transcripts by the staff of the National Assessment of Educational Progress shows that high-school students are taking, and receiving higher grades in, more college-prep courses than ever.

Yet just-released test results for 12th graders on the NAEP, a widely respected barometer of educational achievement known as the "nation's report card," indicated that students are graduating with mediocre math skills and reading abilities that have tumbled to their lowest level since the early 1990s. The 12th-grade tests are designed to measure the sorts of high-level thinking demanded in college work.

The findings raise questions about whether college-prep courses are as tough as their titles indicate, and, if so, whether high schools and their instructors are adequately prepared to teach such courses to a rapidly changing mix of students.

U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings expressed disappointment with the findings, saying: "If, in fact, our high-school students are taking more challenging courses and earning higher grades, we should be seeing greater gains in test scores."

Other observers said the results suggest that some school districts are teaching watered-down versions of everything from history to trigonometry. "A course title alone does not make rigor," said David Conley, a University of Oregon professor who studies high-school course content.

The NAEP results are likely to fuel calls for reform measures as the federal No Child Left Behind act approaches a reauthorization debate. The Bush administration has proposed requiring states to conduct additional reading and math achievement tests at the high-school level.

In December, the Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, a private group that includes former governors and cabinet secretaries from both political parties, called for such radical measures as ending high school after 10th grade for some students and denying entry to public colleges and universities to any who can't pass so-called board exams in core subjects.

The NAEP review of high school transcripts, released yesterday, found that 51% of the graduating class of 2005 completed at least a midlevel college-prep curriculum that included four years of English; three years of math, including geometry and algebra; and three years of science including at least two of biology, chemistry and physics. In 1990, only about 31% of seniors completed a similar curriculum.

The NAEP review also found that the class of 2005 received about 360 more hours of instruction in high school than their 1990 counterparts and earned higher grades. On a zero-to-four point scale, the 2005 seniors had a cumulative grade point average of 2.98 points, or about a B, up from 2.68 points in 1990. But the benefits of such changes weren't evident in the results of NAEP reading and math achievement tests for the class of 2005.

On a zero-to-500 point scale, their average reading score was 286 points. That was down a point from 2002, the last time the test was given, and was the lowest average score since 1992, when the average was 292 points. About 40% of the test takers scored at or above the proficient range, down from 44% in 1992.

On the math side, the average score was 150 on a zero-to-300 point scale and only 23% of the seniors were scored at or above the proficient range. NAEP officials said results of the 2005 math test aren't comparable with those from previous years because of recent changes in the exam's structure and content.

Reflecting demographic changes in society, the sorts of students taking the NAEP test have changed significantly in recent years. Hispanics accounted for 14% of all 12th graders in 2005, up from 7% in 1992. The scoring gap between them and white students has changed little since 1992.

Since 1998, when NAEP began allowing accommodations such as longer testing times, more English-language learners are also taking the NAEP. In 2005, they accounted for about 4% of all seniors taking the NAEP reading test and posted an average score of 247. The effect was to lower the overall average score by two points, to 286, which NAEP officials said was statistically significant.

The decline in reading abilities was not a complete surprise. A recent study by ACT Inc., the nonprofit testing concern based in Iowa City, Iowa, found that only about 51% of high school graduates who took the ACT test in 2005 were prepared to tackle college-level reading, down from 55% in 1999. ACT also found a decline in reading skills through the high-school years, with more eighth- and 10th-graders on track for college reading than seniors. "Reading just drops off the radar in high school," said Jon Erickson, ACT's vice president for educational services.

And the NAEP results aren't the only signs that college-prep courses may not be delivering all that they promise.

The College Board, the New York nonprofit that gives the SAT admissions test, is in the midst of a nationwide audit of its high-school Advanced Placement Program courses, amid concerns that some districts aren't offering college-level content.

Meanwhile, a recent study by the state of Maryland found that 30% of its 2005 high-school graduates who completed a college-prep curriculum needed remedial math in college, up from 26% for the class of 2000.

States may require students to take more upper-level courses, but content is still largely left up to local school boards and varies widely. And few states have instituted mandatory end-of-course tests to measure what is actually being taught in high-school classrooms or taken concrete action to ensure that high-school graduation standards are aligned with what colleges and universities expect incoming freshmen to know.

Hodan Janay, of Boston says she earned B's during four years of high-school English, took a college-prep literature course her senior year and passed the state English exams required to graduate. "But I wasn't as ready as I thought," says the 21-year-old, who is now enrolled in a remedial English course at Boston's Bunker Hill Community College.

Higher Grades Contradict Test Scores (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — Large percentages of high school seniors are posting weak scores on national math and reading tests even though more of them are taking challenging courses and getting higher grades in school, say two new government reports released Thursday.

"The reality is that the results don't square," said Darvin Winick, chair of the independent National Assessment Governing Board, which oversees the national tests.

Nearly 40 percent of high school seniors scored below the basic level on the math test. More than a quarter of seniors failed to reach the basic level on the reading test. Most educators think students ought to be able to work at the basic level.

The reading scores show no change since 2002, the last time the tests were given. "We should be getting better. There's nothing good about a flat score," Winick said.

The government said it could not compare the math results to old scores because the latest test was significantly different.

The National Assessment of Educational Progress — often called the nation's report card — is viewed as the best way to compare students across the country because it's the only uniform national yardstick for how well students are learning.

The tests were given in 2005. The government released the scores Thursday along with a report examining the high school transcripts of 2005 graduates.

The transcript study shows high school students are earning more credits, taking more challenging courses and getting higher grade-point averages than in the past.

In 2005, high school graduates had an overall grade-point average just shy of 3.0 — or about a B. That has gone up from a grade-point average of about 2.7 in 1990.

It is unclear whether student performance has improved or whether grade inflation or something else might be responsible, the report said.

More students are completing high school with a standard curriculum, meaning they took at least four credits of English and three credits each of social studies, math and science. More students also are taking the next level of courses, which generally includes college preparatory classes.

But the study showed no increase in the number of high-schoolers who completed the most advanced curriculum, which could include college-level or honors classes.

On the math test, about 60 percent of high school seniors performed at or above the basic level. At that level, a student should be able to convert a decimal to a fraction, for example.

Just one-fourth of 12th-graders were proficient or better in math, meaning they demonstrated solid academic performance. To qualify as "proficient," students might have to determine what type of graph should be used to display particular types of data.

On the reading test, about three-fourths of seniors performed at or above the basic level, while 40 percent hit the proficient mark.

Seniors working at a basic reading level can identify elements of an author's style. At the proficient level, they can make inferences from reading material, draw conclusions from it and make connections to their own experiences.

As in the past, the math and reading scores showed large achievement gaps between white students and minorities.

Forty-three percent of white students scored at or above proficient levels on the reading test, compared with 20 percent of Hispanic students and 16 percent of black students.

On the math test, 29 percent of white students reached the proficient level, compared with 8 percent of Hispanics and 6 percent of blacks.

The gap in reading scores between whites and minorities was relatively unchanged since 2002.

The federal No Child Left Behind law has put added emphasis on math and reading, largely in the elementary- and middle-school grades. It also requires states to separate out their test scores by race so officials can track and try to narrow achievement gaps between groups of students.

High Schoolers' Scores Lag Despite Courses, Grades (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

More 2005 high school graduates took challenging classes and got higher grades than their peers a few years prior, but overall, large percentages of high school seniors are scoring poorly on reading and math tests, two new reports found yesterday.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said these results mean "we have our work cut out for us," in providing quality education.

"If, in fact, our high school students are taking more challenging courses and earning higher grades, we should be seeing greater gains in test scores," she said, after the release of the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NEAP).

These reading and math tests, released by the government yesterday, were given in 2005 to a representative sample of more than 21,000 high school seniors from 900 schools. Accompanying that report was a separate study examining the transcripts of 2005 high school graduates.

According to the NAEP, nearly 40 percent of high school seniors didn't perform at the basic level on the math test and 23 percent performed at or above proficient level.

The average reading scores didn't change much since 2002 but declined since 1992. Seventy-three percent of 2005 high school seniors performed at or above basic reading level, meaning more than a quarter of seniors didn't reach that threshold.

In 2000, about 13 percent of high school graduates completed standard course work, and 36 percent went beyond and completed midlevel course work, according to the transcript study. Those percentages increased in 2005, to 17 percent and 41 percent.

The 2005 graduates also carried a slightly higher grade point average -- about a 3.0 -- than 2000 graduates and notably higher than the 2.7 GPA in 1990. The study noted "many possible reasons" for the increase, including grade inflation, changes in grading standards and practices, and growth in student performance.

Lawmakers and education researchers agreed that improvement is needed but disagreed on the best way of getting there -- with some arguing the federal government should get more involved in high schools and some saying that is exactly the wrong approach.

"The No Child Left Behind Act is working to improve our nation's elementary and middle schools, and we must act now to increase rigor in our high schools and improve graduation rates," Mrs. Spellings said, touting President Bush's proposal for more testing and improved curricula in high schools as part of his suggestions for renewing the law.

House education panel Chairman Rep. George Miller, California Democrat, called the scores a "disappointment" and said that as lawmakers work to renew federal education law for younger students "part of our charge will be to develop strategies for helping our struggling high schools," such as recruiting better teachers and ensuring all students have access to advanced courses.

Neal McClusky, education policy analyst at the Cato Institute, noted that the disappointing scores come despite "huge increases in per-pupil expenditures, the installation of 'standards and accountability' mechanisms all around the country, and ever-greater federal intervention" in America's schools.

"With all this in mind, the lesson from the latest NAEP scores is clear: American education needs fundamental restructuring away from the top-down, government control that has wrought regular academic failure, to a system that empowers parents to take their children and tax dollars out of broken public schools and put them into institutions that work," he said.

U.S. High Schools Raise Grades, Don't Test Better (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Paul Basken

Bloomberg, February 23, 2007

Feb. 22 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. high school students are showing no overall improvement on a nationwide achievement test, even as they take more challenging courses and earn higher grades, the U.S. Education Department reported.

Nationwide, 73 percent of 12th-grade students achieved a ``basic'' reading score in 2005, down from 80 percent in 1992, according to the National Assessment of Educational Progress, a sampling test the government calls the ``nation's report card.'' Sixty-one percent scored at or above the basic level in math.

At the same time, 68 percent of high school graduates completed at least a ``standard'' curriculum, up from 59 percent in 2000, with the overall grade point average about one-third of a letter grade higher than in 1990, the department said in a report. The figures raise questions about the quality of the courses being taught at U.S. high schools, it said.

``If, in fact, our high school students are taking more challenging courses and earning higher grades, we should be seeing greater gains in test scores,'' U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said in a statement. The results ``show that we have our work cut out for us,'' she said.

In May, NAEP said there were declines in science scores for high school students. Among 12th-graders, 54 percent were at or above the basic level in science in 2005, statistically similar to 2000 and a decline from 57 percent in 1996, the report said.

`Disappointing' Results

Business and education leaders said the latest results reinforce fears that the U.S. school system isn't preparing its students to be competitive in the global workplace.

``It's disappointing and unacceptable,'' said Susan Traiman, director of education and workforce policy at the Business Roundtable, a Washington-based association of chief executive officers of U.S. companies including General Motors Corp., Exxon Mobil Corp. and Citigroup Inc.

``These numbers perfectly book-end the rating of employers last fall,'' who in a nationwide survey said more half of companies are finding workers inadequately training in math or reading, said Linda Barrington, labor economist and research director at the Conference Board, a New York-based business group.

Bush Budget

Today's report on reading and math follows President George W. Bush's release earlier this month of his fiscal 2008 budget recommendation, in which he again asked Congress to devote a greater share of federal funding toward raising high school achievement levels.

Congress hasn't endorsed that plan in the past, in part because Democrats opposed Bush's calls for financing high school improvements through spending cuts in other parts of the federal education budget.

Representative Buck McKeon, the California Republican who headed the House education committee last year, believes the NAEP results mean Congress must continue to demand more from schools, spokesman Steve Forde said.

The NAEP report ``is a further indication that backing away from that commitment would be a huge mistake,'' Forde said.

Others were more cautious. Some of the lower performance at the 12th-grade level could be due to older students realizing their scores on the NAEP test have no effect on their personal records, said Antonia Cortese, executive vice president of the 1.3 million-member American Federation of Teachers, the nation's second-largest teacher union.

`No Child' Testing

The federal No Child Left Behind law currently requires schools to test students in grades 3 through 8, then once in high school. Researchers including Bruce Fuller, an education professor at the University of California, Berkeley, have suggested that states may be weakening their tests to help raise their passing rates under the federal law.

The NAEP reports today may reinforce fears that the quality of high-level courses suffers as more students are allowed into them, the Education Trust, a Washington-based research and advocacy group, said in a statement. ``This pattern is undoubtedly playing out in some schools,'' Education Trust said. ``But we know that it doesn't have to be this way.''

The NAEP tests for 2005 were given to a nationally representative sample of more than 21,000 high school seniors in 900 schools.

The results show 35 percent of 12th-grade students scored at or above ``proficient'' in reading in 2005, down from 40 percent in 1992. Only 23 percent of 12th-graders achieved the proficient rating in math in 2005.

Math Scores

The math scores aren't comparable with previous years because NAEP introduced a new assessment test in 2005, the report said. A separate analysis provided by NAEP of common math questions, however, showed a ``statistically significant increase,'' to 44 percent in 2005 from 42 percent in 2000, in the percentage of students answering each question correctly.

The scores released today also showed persistent gaps among racial and ethnic groups, including white students scoring 31 points higher than black students in math and 24 points higher than Hispanic students.

The comparisons to high school transcripts were based on data from 26,000 graduates of about 640 public schools and 80 private schools. The report defined a ``standard curriculum'' to mean the student has taken at least four credits of English and three each in social studies, mathematics and science.

In addition to more students enrolling in such a curriculum and receiving higher grades, the NAEP study found that U.S. high school graduates in 2005 earned about three credits more than their 1990 counterparts. That translates to about 360 additional hours of instruction during their high school years, it said.

Possible reasons for the increase in high school grades include ``grade inflation, changes in grading standards and practices and growth in student performance,'' the report said.

Stepping To The Plate, Giuliani Is Seeing Only Softballs (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

SPARTANBURG, S.C., Feb. 21 — In a swing through South Carolina this week, Rudolph W. Giuliani chose to campaign at a fire house, which is a little like Derek Jeter meeting with Yankees fans — a most unlikely forum for hostility, or even much skepticism.

Instead of the sometimes barbed give-and-take endured by the other candidates, Mr. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, fielded a few questions from the firefighters and police officers who gathered to hear him here. The questions, which began with comments like, "Being in your presence here is just unbelievable," stuck almost entirely to issues on which Mr. Giuliani is most comfortable, like airport security and border control.

More than the other major presidential candidates, Mr. Giuliani has limited himself to events with narrowly defined, friendly audiences, avoiding the kind of uncomfortable interrogations his rivals have occasionally faced. Aside from a couple of brief swings through diners, including one yesterday in Delray Beach, Fla., he has done little of the politicking that exposes candidates to random sets of people — at shopping malls or train stations — who might be of any political stripe, and can raise any issue.

Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton, John McCain and Barack Obama and others have held forums in Iowa and New Hampshire that were open to anyone and were widely advertised in advance — Mr. McCain did three on Saturday alone. People who were clearly skeptical pressed the candidates — Mrs. Clinton and Mr. McCain on their Iraq war positions, and Mr. Obama on his relative inexperience.

Mr. Giuliani has had no such events so far. He has yet to be questioned by voters about his support for abortion rights, same-sex civil unions and gun control, or about his marital history.

Party officials say Mr. Giuliani will have to face greater scrutiny from voters in primary states.

"For now it's O.K., but he can't follow that strategy indefinitely," said Fergus Cullen, the Republican chairman in New Hampshire. "People in New Hampshire, Iowa and a couple of other places really demand a chance to hit you between the eyes, and to ask a pointed follow-up if you don't give a straight answer. And there's a curveball in every group."

A spokeswoman, Maria Comella, said Mr. Giuliani was not avoiding difficult questions, noting that it was still early in the campaign and that "the mayor's travel has just started to pick up."

"The mayor will be at a wide variety of events that will put him in front of voters where he will answer their questions," Ms. Comella said.

She would not say whether there were plans for an open forum in the near future.

Difficult issues have come up, raised by journalists if not by others, and all candidates like to go before sympathetic groups and take agreeable questions. President Bush made a habit of it in 2004. Conversely, Mr. Giuliani was known for his frequent sparring with combative New York City reporters during his years as mayor.

The traditions of states with early presidential contests call for taking a few risks in front of voters. Dick Bennett, an independent pollster based in New Hampshire, said after Mr. Giuliani's last trip to that state that he was surprised at how little unscripted exposure to voters there was and wondered if they would hold it against him.

"People here expect to be able to see you, up close, more than once," Mr. Bennett said.

Mr. Giuliani recently spoke to state Republican conventions in New Hampshire and California, but he did not take questions, so there was little opportunity to address his views on social issues that set him apart from many in his party.

In the last month, Mr. Giuliani has had three brief public exchanges with groups of business people who were more interested in economic issues than social ones. At an agricultural fair in Central California he was asked about farm policy, and at a Chamber of Commerce dinner in New Hampshire, he was asked about budget deficits.

The Giuliani campaign billed the stop Wednesday in South Carolina, an early primary state, as a town-hall meeting. But only "first responders" had been invited, and Mr. Giuliani's speech was devoted to the heroism of police officers and firefighters on Sept. 11 and the threat of terrorism.

Many of those present described themselves as religious and more conservative than Mr. Giuliani, but they also said they attended because they were fans — and after hearing him praise them as the nation's heroes, they were in no mood to challenge him.

As much as the audiences he chooses, it is Mr. Giuliani's reputation as the icon of Sept. 11 that has shielded him during his early campaigning. At every stop, he is greeted more like a celebrity than a candidate and is asked in reverential tones about his handling of the attacks on the World Trade Center.

The social issues "carry some weight, but you have to look at the big picture," said Brian Lawson, the assistant fire chief in Chesnee, S.C., who attended Wednesday's event. "9/11, everybody knows what a job he did there, that he showed some great leadership. That's why we're here."

And of all the presidential candidates who have visited upstate South Carolina, Mr. Lawson said, "he's the first one to ask to speak with this group."

Giuliani To Court K Street (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

Politico.com, February 23, 2007

Former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani comes to Washington tomorrow to do a little lobbyist outreach. Lobbyists Dirk Van Dongen, Susan Molinari, Mike Zarelli and Willie Gaynor have helped put together the meet-and-greet, which is designed to familiarize Rudy with top K St. Republicans and vice-versa. There is no charge for the afternoon get-together, to take place at a downtown Washington hotel. First there will be a general reception, followed by a series of smaller meetings.

Because of the recess, members are not expected to attend. But Rudy is also making progress on that front and will soon roll out the backing of Rep. Charlie Dent of Pennyslvania. Dent, who represents an Allentown-area district, is only in his second term but is a respected member of the GOP conference. He served for years in the state legislature and knows the Lehigh Valley and Keystone State politics well. I'm also told that Team Rudy is making progress with other members of both chambers of Congress and will soon be announcing additional endorsements from the sort of states (Pennsylvania being one) that his supporters think he could put in play in the general election.

Huckabee: Don't Forget Me (POL)

By Mike Allen

Politico.com, February 23, 2007

Exclusive: Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee plans to make a splash on Capitol Hill on Friday with the surprising announcement that Rep. Don Young of Alaska has signed on as congressional chairman of his Republican presidential exploratory committee.

In a letter to House Republicans, Young says Huckabee will help produce "a reawakening of the conservative values that make our country a land of opportunity."

Huckabee, who moved out of the mansion in Little Rock in January, is rushing to catch up with the front-runners' massive organization and plans to officially announce his candidacy in the next few months. He said in a telephone interview that the debates – including the Politico-MSNBC debate on May 3 at the Ronald Reagan Library – will be critical to his chances of breaking out.

"Best I can determine, the floor is the same level for everybody at the debates," Huckabee said on his cell phone as he ran errands in Little Rock on Thursday. "This election will eventually become focused not just on rhetoric but the results behind the rhetoric."

Huckabee noted with a chuckle the disadvantages of being the front-runner this early in the campaign. "There's only one direction you can go, and it's not a good one," he said.

His campaign got a critical boost in South Carolina, which has one of the earliest nominating contests, when he was endorsed earlier this month by former South Carolina first lady Iris Campbell. Her youngest son, Mike Campbell, will serve as a senior national adviser to the campaign. The late Gov. Carroll Campbell and his family played a critical role in helping Ronald Reagan, George H.W. Bush, Bob Dole and George W. Bush win the South Carolina primary.

Young, the third-ranking Republican in Congress, is no diplomat but he has deep personal connections with almost every member because he was chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, which put him in charge of massive amounts of pork.

Young said in an interview from Puerto Rico that Huckabee is "a man of character and a hell of a speaker." Young said he'll travel on Huckabee's behalf. "He may be a long shot now," Young said. "But when this settles down, people will see that a governor is best positioned to bring the country together. They have the experience of bringing the opposite sides of a legislature together. People always ask me who I think I going to win, and when I say Governor Huckabee, they say, 'Who?' So we just need to convince people that he's a leader with great character."

Also Friday, Huckabee plans to announce that Rep. John Boozman of Arkansas will be congressional co-chairman of his presidential exploratory committee. Boozman is a member of the Republican Study Committee, the conservative caucus, and so has ties to a group of members whose support could really help Huckabee.

Boozman said in an interview that Huckabee "has a tremendous ability to communicate" and has positioned himself well as a conservative. "This thing is wide open," Boozman said. "His greatest challenge is going to be coordinating a national campaign."

Fundraiser To Help Underwrite S.C. Primary (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

South Carolina may be a new addition to the early days of Democrats' presidential nomination fight, but the state is already showing veteran savvy when it comes to collecting cash for its Jan. 29, 2008, primary.

Witness a fundraiser set for March 7 in Washington. The featured guests? The bulk of the 2008 Democratic field, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Joe Biden (Del.) and Chris Dodd (Conn.), as well as former senator John Edwards (N.C.) and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack. Reps. Jim Clyburn and John Spratt -- the only Democrats in South Carolina's congressional delegation -- are also set to appear.

The event, which will be emceed by Clinton White House press secretary Mike McCurry, is being billed as a "kickoff reception" for the state's presidential primary.

Joe Erwin, chairman of the South Carolina Democratic Party, explained that his state is one of a handful where the party must raise all of the money to finance the primary. In 2004, Erwin estimated, the cost of South Carolina's Democratic primary was $285,000. He believes the price tag this time will be closer to $500,000.

"It's a great honor to seek and successfully garner the first-in-the-South primary; it's a heck of a challenge to put it on," Erwin said.Breaux to the Rescue?

One question dominated the political chatter at this week's Washington Mardi Gras celebration: Will he or won't he? The "he" in question being former senator John Breaux (D-La.), who is looking seriously at running for governor in November.

Breaux, who served in Congress for more than three decades, is widely seen as Democrats' strongest statewide candidate and is being pushed to make a run by party regulars who don't believe Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) can win reelection. Blanco faced widespread criticism for her handling of the response to Hurricane Katrina, and private polling has shown her badly trailing Rep. Bobby Jindal (R), who has already declared his candidacy.

"Really, only John and Lois Breaux know the real odds of his decision-making process right now," said Rich Masters, a former senior aide to Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu (D). "But the odds of remaking New Orleans and the state would be much better with John Breaux as governor, so personally I hope he runs."

Breaux did not return a call seeking comment. He has until Sept. 6 -- the state's filing deadline -- to make up his mind.Huckabee Gets a Hand on the Hill

Former governor and current presidential candidate Mike Huckabee (R-Ark.) isn't a household name inside the Beltway. He's hoping to change that today as he announces the congressional co-chairs of his national bid.

Reps. Don Young (Alaska) and John Boozman (Ark.) will lead Huckabee's efforts to make inroads among the opinion leaders on Capitol Hill.

Asked about winning congressional endorsements, Huckabee said "it shows [that] people who are policy makers are willing to sign on," but he added: "Frankly, I don't think it's going to tip the election one way or another."

Detour From High Road In Clinton-Obama Clash (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — After weeks of watching in frustration as Senator Barack Obama presented himself as a fresh face gliding above partisan politics, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton has drawn Mr. Obama onto a muddy political field, engaging him in a back-and-forth that recalls the kind of Washington bickering Mr. Obama has decried.

Mrs. Clinton's effort to identify Mr. Obama with an attack made by one of his chief Hollywood supporters was widely viewed among Democrats as carrying some cost to Mrs. Clinton. The remarks at the heart of the dispute, by David Geffen, the Hollywood executive who was once a big fund-raiser for the Clintons, were a sharp reminder of Clinton family history that has led some Democrats to believe Mrs. Clinton cannot win a general election.

But when it came to tallying the final score on the most intense engagement so far in the 2008 presidential race, even Mr. Obama, the junior senator from Illinois, seemed to acknowledge that he may have been outmaneuvered.

In a telephone interview Thursday, Mr. Obama said he had not been aware beforehand of the statement his campaign had put out Wednesday morning responding to the public demand by Howard Wolfson, Mrs. Clinton's hard-driving senior communications adviser, that Mr. Obama denounce Mr. Geffen and return the money he had raised.

Mr. Obama said he had been on a red-eye flight, getting a haircut and taking his daughters to school as the fight broke out, and strongly suggested he had told his aides he wanted to stay above the fray.

"I told my staff that I don't want us to be a party to these kinds of distractions because I want to make sure that we're spending time talking about issues," Mr. Obama said. "My preference going forward is that we have to be careful not to slip into playing the game as it customarily is played."

For Mrs. Clinton, the risks of going after Mr. Obama included the possibility that some voters would view her as driven more by tactical war-room politics than by the domestic and foreign policy issues they are most concerned about.

At the very least, the blow-up provided a vivid snapshot of how the Clinton campaign is approaching what it views as the biggest obstacles to Mrs. Clinton's winning the nomination: the rapid emergence of Mr. Obama as a potent rival, and persistent questions about Mrs. Clinton's electability. And it demonstrated how fiercely these two formidable candidates are moving to nail down support in all quarters.

That is particularly true for Mrs. Clinton, backed by a cadre of aggressive advisers who have weathered a decade of some of the toughest political fights imaginable, from the election of Bill Clinton in 1992 to the fight to save him from impeachment in 1998, and are using lessons learned from those campaigns here and now.

For weeks, the Clinton campaign has been dealing with the threat from Mr. Obama aggressively, if not in such a public way as it did on Wednesday. Mrs. Clinton's team, which includes toughened advisers like Terry McAuliffe, the former Democratic Committee National chairman, has been sending signals, some gentle and some not so gentle, that it wants Democrats to choose between her and Mr. Obama and not hedge their bets.

At a fund-raiser for Mrs. Clinton in Hollywood two weeks ago, as Mr. McAuliffe told the story in an interview on Thursday, he joked in a crowded room that big contributors would be honored with limo rides with the new president while those who wrote checks to, say, Mr. Obama could give up their dreams of access.

"Clarence Avant's daughter was there, he's a friend of mine, and I looked at her and in front of 500 people I said, If you don't contribute, you're not going to get that ambassadorship to France," he said, referring to the former chairman of Motown Records. "It's a joke! I said it in front of 500 people."

The Los Angeles Times quoted Mr. McAuliffe as saying at that event, "You are either with us or you're against us," a remark Mr. McAullife and other attendees said was jocular.

But from New York to Washington to Los Angeles, the Clinton campaign has sought commitments of total loyalty this winter from a swath of important donors and elected officials. Mrs. Clinton would meet one-on-one with prominent donors, for instance, and make clear that she wanted their support exclusively. Some elected officials in New Hampshire, meanwhile, said they were told that their early support would matter more to the Clintons than an endorsement down the road.

Aides to both Mrs. Clinton, the junior senator from New York, and Mr. Obama said the other side had been relentless in trying to force potential contributors and political leaders to take sides. Their aggressiveness is not going over well with everyone, especially those who have given large sums to many Democrats over the years and are happy to see two or more presidential candidates continue to compete for their support more than 10 months before the first primary.

"I feel that way only because we the electorate earn the right to a vigorous debate," said Norman Lear, the producer, who has contributed to both Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton. Asked about Mr. McAuliffe's remark, he responded: "What's he going to do, jail me?"

The way that campaigns operate provide insights into the candidates themselves. If lessons were learned about the Clinton campaign style, there were lessons learned as well about Mr. Obama, who is making his first run for the presidency and whose lack of experience in campaigns has been a source of worry for some of his supporters.

In response to the initial volley from the Clinton camp on Wednesday, Mr. Obama's spokesman, Robert Gibbs, refused the demand by the Clinton campaign that the candidate distance himself from Mr. Geffen's statement, which he made in an interview with a New York Times columnist, Maureen Dowd. (Mr. Geffen said Mrs. Clinton was unelectable, and raised questions about her ethics and Bill Clinton's trustworthiness.) Mr. Gibbs went on to note that the Clintons had taken money from Mr. Geffen while they were in the White House, noting that Mr. Geffen had been among those who had spent the night in the Lincoln Bedroom.

The two camps traded barbs all day Wednesday, going toe to toe on a day when Mr. Obama had skipped an appearance with the rest of the Democratic presidential field in a demonstration of his desire to stay out of the daily exchange of criticism that can consume campaigns.

"It fundamentally undermined their long-term message," said Chris Lehane, a Democratic consultant who made his name with a tough campaign style, referring to the Obama campaign.

"If you're to run as something fundamentally different — the philosopher king — you have to have a campaign that is completely different," said Mr. Lehane, who has not endorsed a candidate. "Long term, there is peril here for Obama: if he is presenting a message that he represents a new style of governance, once you start to engage in the back and forth, you really diminish this kind of message."

If there was one clear beneficiary to the wrangling — other than the Republican Party, which stood back and enjoyed the fight — it was a third Democratic candidate, John Edwards. Mr. Edwards's strategy has been to let Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton fight it out, leaving an opening for him.

Et Tu, David? A Lucrative Friendship Sours (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer, David M. Halbfinger

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

LOS ANGELES Feb. 22 — The public unwinding of the relationship between the Clintons and David Geffen has many of the makings of a Hollywood who-done-it: While the outcome is now known, the trail remains complicated and mysterious.

The strains between Mr. Geffen and the Clintons were brought to the fore this week when Mr. Geffen, an entertainment executive and longtime benefactor of the Clintons, made clear with shards of verbal glass that he would not support the presidential campaign of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Mr. Geffen has been telling friends for two years that he thinks that Mrs. Clinton is a divisive figure who would fail to bring the nation together. He has since thrown his support behind Senator Barrack Obama of Illinois, who raised $1.3 million this week at a fund-raiser for which Mr. Geffen was a co-host.

"What Geffen did was he gave an expression to what is in the collective unconscious about the Clintons," said one Obama supporter in Hollywood, who, like everyone who was interviewed about the issue, would not speak for attribution out of fear of retribution from the Clinton camp, the famously irascible Mr. Geffen, or both.

Mr. Geffen's embrace of Mr. Obama is a notion that — backed with checkbooks and liberal blogging — could have resonance among Hollywood money raisers, who love nothing more than a fresh face attached to even perceived early momentum. It appears to be an outgrowth of Mr. Geffen's anger and disillusion with both Clintons, and his belief that Mrs. Clinton's candidacy impedes Democrats from regaining the White House, people close to the Clintons and Mr. Geffen said Thursday.

Yet even as his doubts about Mrs. Clinton have risen, Mr. Geffen contributed generously to her two Senate campaigns. All told, Mr. Geffen — who discussed his displeasure with a Clinton candidacy with the New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd this week — has raised or given millions of dollars to the Clinton political machine.

Long after his fury over Mr. Clinton's last-minute pardoning of the financier Marc Rich and not Leonard Peltier — the Indian activist who was convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment for the murders of two federal agents — Mr. Geffen went on to donate $1 million to the Clinton presidential library, even though Mr. Clinton made a disparaging remark to Time magazine about Mr. Geffen's displeasure with the way the last-minute pardons were executed.

Mr. Clinton had long paid homage to Mr. Geffen, and was a frequent guest at his home in Los Angeles. But after his 1996 re-election, Mr. Clinton began staying more frequently with Ron Burkle, a longtime Clinton supporter and onetime rival of Mr. Geffen for ownership of The Los Angeles Times. Mr. Burkle, a supermarket tycoon, lives in a 40-room Beverly Hills home that once belonged to the silent-movie star Harold Lloyd.

By late 1999, the president felt so divided between his two billionaire friends that he once wound up leaving Mr. Burkle's home late one evening to turn in for the night at Mr. Geffen's nearby Beverly Hills home, all to avoid offending Mr. Geffen, one member of the president's entourage said, even though Mr. Geffen was out of town.

For their part, Mrs. Clinton's supporters say that they are convinced that her luster in Los Angeles is untainted, and both spokesmen for both her and her husband declined to comment Thursday.

On Thursday in Los Angeles, Mrs. Clinton attended meetings with fund-raisers at Haim Saban's office, and later with supporters at Creative Artists Agency and other money raisers.

At the meeting at Mr. Saban's office, when the idea of a California primary's being moved to Feb. 5 was raised, according to one person who attended the event, Mr. Saban said, "Then we'll have to double what we all planned to do."

Analysis: Early Bumps Trip Clinton Camp (AP)

By Beth Fouhy, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

A Hollywood-style brawl with the campaign of rival Barack Obama is the latest in a series of speed bumps tripping up Hillary Rodham Clinton's early presidential moves.

From the Clinton team's decision to criticize — and therefore publicize — producer David Geffen's complaints about both Clintons to increasingly skeptical questions about Sen. Clinton's nuanced explanation of her 2002 vote authorizing the Iraq war, it became apparent even a battle-tested front-runner can fall prey to missteps.

On top of that, voters were reminded of the downside of the first Clinton presidency.

"Her explanation for her Iraq vote sounds like the bad old days of Dick Morris triangulation," said Marty Kaplan, a political communications professor at the University of Southern California. Morris, once an influential adviser to both Clintons who has since turned against the couple, urged President Clinton to make policy decisions by splitting the difference on opposing views.

Kaplan added, "She may have overreacted to Geffen in a way that showed she's potentially thin-skinned. And the whole thing was a reminder that the issues of Monica Lewinsky and Whitewater are still out there."

The latest spat began Wednesday, when Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson called on Obama to disavow comments Geffen made in a New York Times interview.

Geffen, a onetime Clinton supporter who threw a $1.3 million fundraiser for Obama in Hollywood Tuesday night, criticized Bill Clinton for "reckless" behavior and called his wife polarizing and dishonest. He also took her to task for refusing to recant her Iraq vote.

Obama ducked the controversy, saying he shouldn't have to apologize for something he didn't say. But his spokesman Robert Gibbs noted that Geffen had raised $18 million for Bill Clinton and had been invited to one of the infamous Lincoln Bedroom sleepovers that helped define the Clinton fundraising excesses of the 1990s.

The brouhaha reflected the Clinton campaign's annoyance with what it perceives as the national media's lenient treatment of Obama.

The tit-for-tat between campaign operatives helped the story to explode nationally — overshadowing a Democratic presidential forum in Nevada that all the candidates except Obama attended.

Ironically, that lack of attention may have helped Clinton, who was pointedly jabbed by rival John Edwards for her unwillingness to revisit her war stance.

Edwards, a former North Carolina senator who also voted to authorize the invasion, has repeatedly apologized for his vote and said Clinton's decision not to do so was "between her and her conscience."

With the early 2008 voting contests in Iowa and New Hampshire still a year away, the current turbulence on the campaign trail is largely the province of hard-core political junkies.

Even so, the events of the last few days exposed the Clinton campaign's sensitivity to criticism of her husband's White House years the growing appeal of Obama — and to some extent, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards — among the party's overwhelmingly anti-war activists.

"It's time for a different kind of leadership in this country," Edwards said, adding that voters want a president "who will tell the truth when they've made a mistake. Who will take responsibility when they've made a mistake."

Clinton has been challenged to explain her vote at nearly every campaign stop since entering the presidential field last month.

She tried to put the matter to rest in New Hampshire last weekend, saying voters could choose another candidate if her answer doesn't suffice. Nevertheless, the questions persist.

Another headache emerged last week when Clinton was asked to renounce comments about Obama made by one of her South Carolina supporters. State Sen. Robert Ford, who is black, said he was endorsing Clinton in part because Obama as a black presidential candidate would hurt other Democrats on the ballot.

"Every Democrat running on that ticket next year would lose — because he's black and he's top of the ticket," Ford said.

Ford later apologized as did a Clinton spokesman. But Clinton did not personally distance herself from it.

Raphael Sonenshein, a political scientist at California State University-Fullerton, said the Clinton campaign had seized on the Geffen comments as a prelude of what to expect later.

"This is a dress rehearsal, and it's peanuts compared to what Republicans will do in the general election," he said. "She knows she's got to come out and come out strong."

EDITORIALS Geffen Has A Point About The Clintons (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

THERE ARE TWO THINGS to be said about the first major intramural spat of the 2008 Democratic primary season. The first is that David Geffen has a point (and we're not saying that just because there is a remote chance that we might work for him someday). The second is that if California moves up its primary, presidential candidates visiting here will soon have to pander to more than just Hollywood moguls.

Geffen, once among Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton's biggest financial backers, threw Hollywood's first mega-fundraiser of the election cycle on Tuesday — for Barack Obama. His criticism of Hillary Clinton, reported Wednesday by New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd, sparked an amusingly overwrought exchange between the Clinton and Obama camps.

Geffen was on to something with his passing mention of the fact that Obama is not from "the Bush royal family" or the "Clinton royal family." Regardless of what you think of Bill Clinton's presidency, or his wife's talent, the dynastic aspect of Hillary Clinton's candidacy is an issue that will increasingly come to occupy center stage in this campaign. Is the country prepared to be governed, potentially, for 28 years by two families who alternate turns in the White House?

The Clinton campaign appears unwilling to acknowledge this concern. The candidate likes talking to audiences about whether the nation is ready for a female president. But the question of whether the country is ready to perpetuate the dueling-family reign by voting in the former president's spouse is disingenuously left off the table. Maybe Hillary Clinton can make the case that she is the most qualified candidate, but she is going to have to find a way to address the dynastic issue directly. She can't have it both ways — trading on her husband's popularity but not acknowledging people's unease at turning the White House into a family business.

Yet Californians, at least, may be grateful that candidates vying for the 2008 presidential nomination in both parties will have to worry not only about what big donors think of them but what all Californians think. In recent presidential primary seasons, the California contest hasn't gotten beyond the David Geffens because the state has been solely a fundraising battlefield. But now that California is likely to move its presidential primary to early February, candidates will no longer think of their California constituencies as consisting solely of that other royalty: Hollywood celebrities.

So, if you are frustrated that one Californian's view on the race could be so newsworthy, bear with us. You'll get your turn.

Clinton And Obama's Hollywood Scene (WP)

By E. J. Dionne

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

It was a good day for Joe Biden, Chris Dodd, John Edwards, Bill Richardson, Tom Vilsack -- and, what the heck, Dennis Kucinich.

It was a bad day for Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton and David Geffen.

It was a good day for the Republican Party, particularly George W. Bush, John McCain and Dick Cheney.

It was a bad day for the Democratic Party, opponents of the Iraq war and advocates of national health insurance.

The petty feud was started by big-time producer Geffen's brutal remarks about the Clintons, which appeared after he helped raise a ton of Hollywood money for Obama. The grudge match revived those depressing cliches about the Democrats: their affection for circular firing squads and their habit of never missing an opportunity to miss an opportunity.

You wonder what Clinton and Obama will learn from this. Both might study the long Democratic nomination fight that began in 1987, well in advance of the 1988 election.

There was an obvious front-runner named Gary Hart, a smart, young former Colorado senator who promised to lead his party out of the 1930s into the 1990s. There was a young Delaware senator named Joe Biden, the same guy who's running this time. Biden wasn't the clear No. 2 that Obama is now, but he got some good early reviews.

Before election year dawned, Hart and Biden were knocked out of the race, because of their own mistakes for sure, but also because of whispering campaigns and subterranean attacks by their opponents.

By the fall of 1987, the Democrats looked like ineffectual dwarfs, to use the word popular back then. A Republican operative named Haley Barbour -- now Mississippi's governor -- happily declared: "At the beginning of this year, the American people questioned whether the Democrats had the first team on the field. I think everything that's happened has confirmed that it's a real amateur hour. It's been a confirmation of people's idea that these aren't the big boys."

Obama and Clinton lieutenants and their full-of-themselves fundraisers: Read Barbour a few times and remember that the Democrats blew the 1988 election. Today, the party has its most talented collection of candidates since 1960. That could change fast.

Political junkies know the week's story line, but in brief: Geffen, a Hollywood mogul who co-hosted a $1.3 million fundraiser for Obama, trashed Bill and Hillary Clinton to New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd, who gets the powerful to say the darnedest things. The Clinton and Obama camps went to war, rocking computers all over the country with incendiary e-mails.

The Clinton side insisted that Obama -- the let's-end-negative-politics candidate -- disown Geffen. The Obama forces trashed Clinton for accepting support from a South Carolina Democrat who suggested that Obama would doom the ticket because he's black.

Just lovely. Because Clinton pulled her saintly opponent off his pedestal and made her new enemy Geffen into an Obama problem, she might be seen as the net winner. In truth, both campaigns showed they care a lot more about themselves than the causes (and the party) to which they claim to be devoted.

That's why every other Democratic presidential candidate was smiling, and why Republicans were gleeful, too. Absent the explosions set off by Geffen's therapy session with Dowd, the big news would have been Dick Cheney's mean jab at John McCain.

McCain, ensnared in Bush's Iraq disaster, tried to disentangle himself by going after Cheney and former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Cheney's devastating pushback in an interview with ABC News made McCain look wimpy and less than straight-talking: "John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld."

But the Hollywood news pushed the Republican eye-scratching over Iraq onto the back pages. It also shrank coverage of the first big Democratic forum in Nevada (only Obama skipped it), where the candidates sparred about serious issues, notably over how to achieve universal health coverage.

Oh, but health care is so boring compared with a Hollywood big shot who drops hints about Bill Clinton's love life. Yeah? Tell that to the family of someone who died of cancer because she had no insurance and couldn't afford a screening test.

Clinton, Obama and their brilliant staffs don't own the Democratic Party, no matter how much money they raise in Hollywood. If they think this is all about their personal drama, they should quit politics and go into the movies. Geffen can put up the money.

Depends What The Meaning Of "Mistake" Is (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Hillary Clinton's rivals would love to paint her as inflexible, programmed, focus-grouped within an inch of her life and intent on bringing nothing less than a full-fledged Clinton Restoration to the White House. So why is she sitting for the portrait?

We'll get to her campaign's delicious quarrel with Hollywood mogul David Geffen in a moment. Less entertaining, but ultimately more important, is the rhetorical line that Clinton drew in the Iraqi quicksand Wednesday at the Democratic candidates' forum in Nevada: no apology for her vote to authorize the war, no admission that she made a mistake. In other words, Clinton opposes the war but defends her vote to enable it.

That's the kind of carefully calibrated position that I suppose might help her in the general election, when she would have to win support from independents. It would let her avoid the "I voted for it before I voted against it" trap that snared John Kerry in 2004. But buckling herself into a no-regrets straitjacket so early can only hurt Clinton among Democratic primary voters, who overwhelmingly oppose the war -- and who, by all evidence, expect abject contrition from candidates who voted to authorize it.

Barack Obama gets a pass -- he wasn't anywhere near Congress at the time, and he publicly opposed the war to boot. John Edwards and Christopher Dodd, both of whom were in the Senate in 2002, have proclaimed that their votes to authorize the invasion were wrong and are begging forgiveness.

Asked about Clinton's position, Edwards said: "Whether it's good enough, I think, is between her and her conscience. It's not for me to judge."

Which, of course, was a judgment.

Clinton may believe that being the front-runner for the nomination means never having to say you're sorry. She may believe that positioning herself at the hawkish end of the Democratic spectrum helps her project an image of toughness, dispelling any reservations voters may have about a woman as commander in chief. Whatever the reason, refusing to say the words "mistake" or "apology" seems transparently artificial. It's a simple matter of cause and effect: If you deplore the effect, how can you not regret participating in the cause?

It sounds like something a candidate has decided to say rather than something a candidate believes -- an all-too-cute parsing of the language that brings to mind some of the less glorious episodes of the Clinton years. It sounds like a position manufactured by committee, an output from a machine. It certainly doesn't sound like an organic part of the "conversation" that Clinton says she wants to have with America.

It's awfully early for a candidate to lock herself into such a problematic script. As long as the war remains the campaign's dominant issue, Clinton is likely to be pressed on Iraq at virtually every stop. Refusing to apologize, or even to admit making a mistake, just keeps alive an issue for Clinton that her opponents already have dealt with and left behind.

Now, on to the Geffen imbroglio. Once one of the Clintons' biggest Hollywood supporters, the billionaire co-hosted a fundraiser for Obama this week that brought in $1.3 million. That was bad enough, from the Clintons' point of view -- they're not used to having to share the Hollywood money machine with anybody else. But Geffen went much further, telling New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd that Hillary Clinton was "incredibly polarizing" -- and that while everyone in politics lies, the Clintons "do it with such ease, it's troubling."

The Clinton campaign went thermonuclear, and it's easy to understand why. Here was a former insider, a one-time guest in the Lincoln Bedroom, seeming to confirm the suspicions of the most dedicated Clinton-haters. The campaign immediately responded by demanding that Obama disassociate himself from Geffen's remarks and "return his money" -- presumably meaning his personal $2,300 campaign contribution. Clinton herself refrained from attacking Obama but deplored the "politics of personal destruction" -- a classic Clinton-era phrase.

Obama responded that he didn't see why he should get involved in what looked like a dispute between Geffen and the Clintons. Obama's campaign issued a sharper statement, perhaps worried about looking soft or passive, then wisely let the matter drop.

The impression that was left at the end of the week was of a touchy, grouchy Clinton Inc. and a candidate constrained by her campaign strategy. It was as if Hillary Clinton were sketching a caricature of herself. That's wasted effort. Others would be happy to do the job for her.

For Clinton, New Wealth In Speeches (WP)

By John Solomon, Matthew Mosk, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Fees in 6 Years Total Nearly $40 Million

Former president Bill Clinton, who came to the White House with modest means and left deeply in debt, has collected nearly $40 million in speaking fees over the past six years, according to interviews and financial disclosure statements filed by his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Last year, one of his most lucrative since he left the presidency, Clinton earned $9 million to $10 million on the lecture circuit. He averaged almost a speech a day -- 352 for the year -- but only about 20 percent were for personal income. The others were given for no fee or for donations to the William J. Clinton Foundation, the nonprofit group he founded to pursue causes such as the fight against AIDS.

His paid speeches included $150,000 appearances before landlord groups, biotechnology firms and food distributors, as well as speeches in England, Ireland, New Zealand and Australia that together netted him more than $1.6 million. On one particularly good day in Canada, Clinton made $475,000 for two speeches, more than double his annual salary as president.

"I never had a nickel to my name until I got out of the White House, and now I'm a millionaire, the most favored person for the Washington Republicans," Clinton told a friendly audience in Kentucky last fall. "I get a tax cut every year, no matter what our needs are."

Indeed, the Clintons -- who left the White House with an estimated $12 million in legal debts rung up during the Whitewater, campaign fundraising and Monica S. Lewinsky investigations -- are worth an estimated $10 million to $50 million, according to Hillary Clinton's most recent disclosure form. That is attributable primarily to the speaking fees and to the seven-figure book deals that both Clintons signed shortly after leaving the White House.

The fortune they have amassed gives the Clintons a nest egg for the first time, and it allows them to tap into that wealth for a campaign if Hillary Clinton, as expected, forgoes public financing in her race for president. It also suggests a sometimes close connection between their personal finances and her political career.

Many of Bill Clinton's six-figure speeches have been made to companies whose employees and political action committees have been among Hillary Clinton's top backers in her Senate campaigns. The New York investment giant Goldman Sachs paid him $650,000 for four speeches in recent years. Its employees and PAC have given her $270,000 since 2000 -- putting it second on the list of her most generous political patrons.

The banking firm Citigroup, whose employees and PAC have been Hillary Clinton's top source of campaign donations, with more than $320,000, paid her husband $250,000 for a speech in France in 2004. Last year, it committed $5.5 million for Clinton's Global Initiative to help encourage entrepreneurship and financial education among the poor.

Asked about the companies and their relationship to the Clintons, Jay Carson, a spokesman for the former president, said, "It certainly makes sense that reputable New York companies who support the policies and works of President Clinton and his foundation would also be supportive of their senator."Finding Foreign Audiences

Over the past two decades, speaking for money, especially to foreign audiences, has become a common way for ex-presidents to find financial security. Ronald Reagan raised eyebrows collecting $2 million in Japan shortly after he left office in 1989. And George H.W. Bush and Jimmy Carter have both traveled extensively to lecture for pay.

The elder Bush, who was wealthy before he became president, had an active speaking schedule after he left the White House, and as recently as 2004 he was reported to have been paid between $125,000 and $150,000 for a series of speeches in China. He has also held seats on corporate boards. But much of his activity remains private because he is under no obligation to disclose it.

Mark K. Updegrove, author of a book on the activities of former presidents, said Clinton remains a huge draw even six years after leaving the White House. "One thing makes President Clinton slightly different from his predecessors," Updegrove said. "Not only has he carried the prestige of the presidency, but he maintains the mystique of celebrity."

Two-thirds of the former president's speaking money has come from foreign sources. Outside the United States, clients are willing to pay more to hear him speak, Clinton is able to conduct his charitable work on AIDS, and he can avoid upstaging his wife on the American political scene, associates say.

Foreign clients have included Saudi Arabia's Dabbagh investment firm, which paid $600,000 for two speeches, and China's JingJi Real Estate Development Group, run by a local Communist Party official, which paid $200,000 for a speech. The Mito City Political Research Group, a Japanese political studies center, paid Clinton $400,000 for a 2002 speech about politics.

Besides Goldman Sachs, the two firms that have paid Clinton the most over the past six years are foreign-based. Gold Services International, an event organizer based in Bogota, Colombia, brought Clinton to Latin America in the summer of 2005 for $800,000 in speaking fees. The Power Within, a motivational-speech company in Toronto, paid Clinton $650,000 for speeches in Canada in 2005 and brought him back for an undisclosed sum in 2006. The company was founded by Salim Khoja, a Kenyan immigrant who years earlier was convicted of stock fraud and was barred for life from the brokerage business.Speaking for Charity

The nearly $40 million total is based on Hillary Clinton's annual ethics report to Congress, which showed that her husband made more than $30 million from speeches from 2001 to 2005. Under Senate ethics rules, she does not have to disclose 2006 fees until mid-May, and the estimate for that year's totals is based on interviews with speech organizers, who confirmed an additional $9 million to $10 million in fees.

Beyond the millions he has earned personally, the former president has given dozens more speeches that result in payments to the William J. Clinton Foundation, his nonprofit charity in New York. His associates say those have yielded millions to help cover the $60 million annual budget the foundation spends to fund his charitable work on AIDS and world hunger.

The Clintons declined to disclose the size and sources of the payments for speeches he delivered on behalf of the charity. Campaign law and Senate ethics rules require Hillary Clinton to disclose only the fees her husband has taken as personal income, not those he routed to charity.

The former president declined repeated requests to discuss his speeches or the income he earns from them. "The reason that he picked paid speeches is that it is an efficient way for him to make a living for his family and allow him a lot of time to do charitable work, which is his passion," said Carson, his spokesman.

Carson said Clinton's staff constructs his schedule to pack as much charitable work as possible -- along with political events helpful to Democrats -- around his for-profit speaking career.

"We take a look at the schedule and say, 'All right, he has to be in this place for that paid speech. There are these three or four great things we've been meaning to do in this place. Let's do them,' " Carson said.

Last June, for example, Clinton booked a speech in Denver before the National Apartment Association, the industry group for landlords, which earned him $150,000.

When his office heard that funds were lagging for a nearby memorial to victims of the Columbine High School massacre, he volunteered to be the keynote speaker at the groundbreaking ceremony -- at no charge -- and instantly boosted fundraising. On the dais that day, when told the project was still short of its goal, he pledged $50,000 that could be matched by a local company. On the same trip, he addressed a politically important group of school principals.

Likewise, in February 2006, Clinton headed to Asia for charitable work to help tsunami and AIDS victims. At the last minute, the State Department asked him to squeeze in a visit to Pakistan, helping ease tensions among Muslims angered by political cartoons they considered insulting. He then tacked on three days of paid engagements in Australia and New Zealand that earned him about $750,000.'It Was Worth It'

Those willing to pay Clinton to speak say they can pack a hall with people eager to hear his question-and-answer sessions on Middle East peace, his motivational seminars, or his lectures on globalization that weave together personal anecdotes and detailed data aimed at inspiring corporate executives to compete better in the 21st-century global economy.

Clinton can also transform a fundraising event.

The former president in 2005 helped the U.S. arm of Israel's treasury authority sell $101 million in investment bonds by speaking at a luncheon at the Pierre Hotel in New York that was jammed with real estate executives who wanted to hear his keynote address.

A Catholic group in Canada far exceeded its fundraising goal when it hired Clinton to address a fundraising gala for domestic violence services last November. The crowds came despite protests by Catholic bishops who urged a boycott because of the group's support for abortion rights.

"We had people buying $500 tickets for a lunch. This was a once-in-a-lifetime event for them," said Andrew Wilding of the Catholic Family Counseling Center in Kitchener, Ontario. "They did it in lieu of Christmas gifts, birthday gifts. It was unbelievable."

Kevin O'Marah, senior vice president of AMR Research, an industry group for retail, food and manufacturing suppliers, said the process of signing Clinton to speak last year was so complex -- including filling out multiple forms explaining to Clinton's office and the speakers bureau he uses why the group wanted him -- that "it was like applying for college."

"But it was worth it," he said, adding that Clinton's speech to 900 executives at AMR's annual conference in Scottsdale, Ariz., inspired many in the audience to consider what they could do to address global hunger.More Money, More Access

Clinton gets a flat fee for those overseas events, but event promoters sometimes offer a tier of options to their patrons. Spending more means gaining more access. This was the case when Clinton collected at least $900,000 last fall for speeches in England and Ireland promoted by longtime golfing partner Satty Singh, a wealthy businessman based in Glasgow, Scotland.

Those who paid about $1,000 to see Clinton at the Burlington Hotel in Dublin on Sept. 27 gained entry to a champagne reception and lunch before the speech. For $4,000 more, they got VIP perks that included a photo and a goody bag containing an autographed copy of his memoir. For about $150,000, corporate sponsors were assured of seats close to Clinton.

Clinton receives thousands of speaking requests a year and accepts a few hundred. Despite the extensive vetting, at least two companies that booked him were under federal investigation.

In February 2005, Clinton traveled to the Paradise Island resort in the Bahamas and collected $150,000 from Swiss biotechnology giant Serono International for a speech that touched on global AIDS. Serono's U.S. arm was then embroiled in a well-publicized federal investigation into giveaways to doctors who unnecessarily prescribed its AIDS drug. A few months after the speech, the company pleaded guilty to two federal conspiracy charges and agreed to pay $704 million in fines.

Clinton also accepted $125,000 in December 2001 to address workers at International Profit Associates, an Illinois company that advises small businesses. At the time, IPA was the focus of a federal investigation -- started during the Clinton administration -- and a government lawsuit alleging widespread sexual harassment.

Like many who have paid the former president to give a speech, IPA executives have been helpful to his wife's campaigns in New York. Her campaign and political action committee have collected nearly $150,000 in donations from the company's officials, making IPA one of her largest single sources of campaign contributions since she ran for the Senate in 2000. The company also flew her aboard its corporate jet, according to a 2004 reimbursement item on her campaign finance report.

Asked about the IPA and Serono speeches, Carson said: "We take our vetting process very seriously. We do our best to try to catch any issues. And given the volume of that, we are not always perfect."

Clinton continues to book new lectures this year as his wife campaigns for president. He will be in Montreal for a motivational speech next month.

FEC Drafts New Campaign Finance Opinion (WP/AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Presidential candidates may solicit contributions for a general election campaign even if they later decide to take public money for the race, federal regulators said Thursday in a proposed opinion.

The draft document, which would have to be approved by the Federal Election Commission, was in response to a request for FEC advice from Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, the Illinois senator.

If a majority of the six election commissioners support the opinion, candidates would have yet another incentive to seek double contributions this early in the presidential election cycle. Any candidate who then chooses to accept public money would have to refund money raised exclusively for the general election.

The commission will meet March 1.

Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., and former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., have already said they will forego public financing in both the primary and general election campaigns. As a result, both are soliciting maximum contributions of $4,600 from individual donors, twice the $2,300 permitted for each election.

Under federal law, taxpayers can redirect $3 of their income tax payment to the presidential campaign fund. Candidates who accept public financing in the primaries can still accept political contributions, but must agree to certain spending limits. Primary winners who accept public financing in the general election cannot use political donations to finance their campaigns.

This year, the primary winners would be entitled to about $85 million each. But campaign finance experts and advisers to presidential candidates predict that the 2008 general election campaign will be far longer and much more expensive than previous ones. Some predict the total cost to each nominee will be $500 million. That is why some candidates would prefer to turn down the public funds and raise their own, more substantial sums.

Campaign watchdog groups, however, have lamented the trend as signaling the demise of the public financing system, which attempted to reduce the influence of money in politics.

Under federal law, any candidate who raises money during the primary for the general election must refund donors if he or she loses the primary. Obama, in seeking an opinion from the FEC, offered a twist on that financial consideration that left the door open to staying within the public system.

"We're pleased this draft opinion moves the ball forward in the direction of preserving public financing of campaigns this election," Obama spokesman Bill Burton said.

Obama's Funding Question To Get FEC Look (CHIT)

By John Mccormick, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 23, 2007

Responding to his request for clarification, the Federal Election Commission signaled Thursday that Sen. Barack Obama's presidential campaign may be able to solicit private contributions for the 2008 general election while remaining eligible for public financing for that same contest.

The draft response was to a question Obama's campaign brought up this month when it indicated that it would start raising money for a potential general election candidacy, nearly a year before the first caucus and primary votes will be cast.

Obama (D-Ill.) and two of his top rivals for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.), have indicated they would likely reject the public financing system that has governed presidential elections for more than three decades.

But Obama wanted to see if he had the option of reversing course and then use public financing, should he win the nomination and be able to convince his Republican opponent to also limit spending.

The commission said it would formally consider the question at a March 1 meeting. "We have never faced this question before," said Bob Biersack, a commission spokesman.

In its draft ruling, the commission said Obama may solicit and receive contributions for the general election if he meets certain conditions, including a requirement to keep the money in a separate escrow account and that the funds not be used for any other purpose other than general election activities.

Under the draft proposal, if Obama were to win the Democratic nomination and then decide to accept public funding for the general election, he would need to refund all general election contributions within 60 days of certifying his eligibility for public funds.

In previous elections, candidates have accepted the notion that once they start raising money for the general election, they have committed to running without federal matching funds.

"We're pleased this draft opinion moves the ball forward in the direction of preserving public financing of campaigns this election," Obama spokesman Bill Burton said.

Proposal By Obama On Public Financing Appears To Gain (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — The staff of the Federal Election Commission has drafted an opinion that would allow the two major parties' presidential nominees to adopt what amounts to a fund-raising truce.

The draft opinion would allow the nominees, if both agreed, to return contributions they had solicited for the general election campaign and limit themselves to public financing for it instead.

The opinion is a response to an inquiry by Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, a leading candidate for the Democratic nomination. It is an indication of how the commission, which released the document Thursday, is likely to rule on the idea. The commissioners are expected to issue their decision after a meeting next Thursday.

Mr. Obama sought the ruling after all the front-runners in both parties rejected public financing for the primary campaign, already under way, and prepared to forgo it for the general election as well, to avoid the spending limits that it imposes. That would make the 2008 general election the first outside the system since its creation in the aftermath of the Watergate scandal more than three decades ago.

Candidates say the amount of public financing — it would be about $85 million per nominee next year — has failed to keep pace not only with campaign costs but also with the potential for private contributions, meaning a candidate who does not seek donations early on risks falling far behind.

But Mr. Obama, campaigning on pledges to clean up politics, argued in his filing with the commission that the public financing system had insulated candidates from a corrupting dependence on big donors. He asserted that the system could be preserved for the general election through bipartisan agreement if party nominees returned early contributions.

The plausibility of such an agreement is not clear. One nominee is likely to have a financial edge on the other at the outset of the campaign, and accepting public financing would mean relinquishing that edge.

Hope From The FEC (WP)

MAYBE THE public financing system for presidential campaigns can be saved after all -- at least part of it. The Federal Election Commission released a draft advisory opinion yesterday that could provide a way to slow the fundraising frenzy and encourage the 2008 nominees to accept full federal funding for their general election campaigns. The draft, likely to be approved by the commission at a meeting March 1, came in response to a creative request from Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

Like other presidential contenders this cycle, Mr. Obama is already raising money for a hoped-for general election campaign. The candidates are calculating that there are enough donors to go around and that the costs of campaigns have grown so high that it doesn't make sense to live within the $84 million public-money limit. But Mr. Obama asked whether he could also reserve the option, if he were to win the nomination, of returning those donations and taking public funds instead -- if the Republican nominee agreed to do so as well.

The FEC's positive reaction yesterday offers a glimmer of hope that 2008 will not become the first presidential election since the Watergate scandal to be fully financed by private funds. The system of providing federal matching funds during the primaries is dead, a victim of woefully outdated spending limits; none of the leading candidates participated in the system in 2004, and none is expected to this time around. But 2008 would be the first election in which candidates turn down matching funds for the general election as well. The result might be as much as $1 billion in combined spending, with enormous amounts of the candidates' time devoted to raising money rather than meeting voters. The solution of allowing a candidate to begin to raise general election funds now but opt to live within the system later isn't perfect, but it's far better than the alternative.

Mr. Obama's competitors in both parties should join him in trying to salvage this broken system. As the FEC prepares to finalize its ruling, the candidates should support its interpretation -- and pledge, if they win the nomination, to help control the campaign arms race.

Statehouse Yields Clues To Obama (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

Sharp Elbows of Illinois Politics Taught Lessons In Art of Compromise

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. -- As an Illinois state senator, Barack Obama was a leader in helping to tighten state ethics laws -- up to a point. When a 2003 package seemed doomed in the Senate's final hours -- with his Democratic leader among the foes -- he left the chamber to tell advocates there was nothing more he could do.

"He wasn't going to stand on the desk and pound his shoe," recalls Cynthia Canary, director of the nonpartisan Illinois Campaign for Political Reform, and an admirer. "Barack is a political realist. You may know that in his heart he feels strongly, but he'll only go so far." Yet a compromise was salvaged, she adds, and Mr. Obama helped to toughen it in subsequent legislative sessions.

The accomplishment was emblematic of the picture that emerges of the eight years Mr. Obama spent here: of a lawmaker of lofty, liberal rhetoric who nonetheless pragmatically accepted bipartisan compromises that won over foes -- and sometimes left supporters dissatisfied.

Now that he is running as a presidential candidate, after just two years in the U.S. Senate, most clues about what style of politics he would bring to the White House are here in Illinois's Statehouse.

Mr. Obama wrote in his recent, best-selling memoir that it was in Springfield that he learned "how the game had come to be played" between Democrats and Republicans: "I understood politics as a full-contact sport, and minded neither the sharp elbows nor the occasional blindside hit." The Obama campaign's tangle this week with that of Democratic rival Hillary Clinton shows a willingness to engage in intraparty spats, as well.

Yet he also wrote that through his state Senate years he "clung to the notion that politics could be different," less combative, more bipartisan. He has put that notion at the heart of his presidential bid.

Illinois Republicans recall Mr. Obama as a committed liberal of no singular achievements, yet one they could work with to pass ethics, welfare and death-penalty revisions. "He's unique in his ability to deal with extremely complex issues, to reach across the aisle and to deal with diverse people," says Republican state Sen. Kirk Dillard. "If he surrounds himself with good people, I wouldn't lose any sleep with him as my president."

As for sharp elbows, the scraps for which Mr. Obama is remembered -- including near-fisticuffs once on the Senate floor -- were with fellow black Democrats, some of whom were resentful of his ambitions and his successes.

In Mr. Obama's first term, in 1997-98, he joined with Mr. Dillard to pass Illinois's first ethics package in a quarter-century, and with Republican state Sen. Dave Syverson, then chairman of a health and human services committee, to overhaul the state's welfare law. Those earlier ethics overhauls grew out of a proposal from the late U.S. Sen. Paul Simon, an Illinois Democrat, for a four-member task force -- one representative of each party in the Illinois House and Senate -- to forge a compromise. Mr. Dillard represented Senate Republicans. Senate Democratic leader Emil Jones, like Mr. Obama an African-American from Chicago, picked the young freshman on the advice of former federal judge Abner Mikva, who had known Mr. Obama as a constitutional-law teacher at the University of Chicago.

The panel's recommendations didn't go so far as ethics-revamp advocates wanted. To ease passage, for example, its ban on lawmakers' personal use of campaign funds exempted existing accounts. Still, Mr. Obama had a hard sell in Senate Democrats' caucuses. "He was getting so beat up by the members, sometimes I felt sorry for him," recalls Mr. Jones, who became his mentor. "He would just listen to them, and then explain the reason why this particular issue was before us."

When the legislature revisited the ethics issue in 2003, Mr. Jones was among those who resisted changes Mr. Obama promoted. "He wouldn't buck Emil Jones," Ms. Canary said. The Senate and House agreed to a weaker bill.

Likewise, Mr. Syverson says the welfare-overhaul compromise he cosponsored with Mr. Obama riled both parties. "He took heat from some liberal groups" for welfare limits, Mr. Syverson says, "but I took heat from conservative groups," for the child-care and health-care aid to those who moved from welfare to work. When Democrats won a majority in 2003, for Mr. Obama's final two years, he succeeded Mr. Syverson as the health panel's chairman. Yet on his most ambitious initiative, for universal health-care coverage, the best he could do was pass a measure providing for a study.

On the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Obama wanted to co-sponsor Democratic Chairman John Cullerton's top initiative, a highway-safety measure allowing police to stop vehicles in which occupants weren't wearing seat belts. At the time, nonuse couldn't be the primary reason for stopping drivers.

But Mr. Jones objected. The Senate leader said a tougher seat-belt law would give police another ruse for racial profiling -- the practice of stopping and searching minority drivers for little reason. "Barack said, 'Then let's do a racial profiling law,' " Mr. Cullerton recalls.

Mr. Obama and other Democrats had previously proposed antiprofiling bills, which would require police to keep data on the race of those they stopped. Police groups always were opposed. But they wanted a seat-belt law. Senators say Mr. Obama negotiated changes to the racial-profiling measure that allowed the police to remain neutral. Both bills were passed.

Meanwhile, the legislature in 2003 was revamping death-penalty laws after evidence of numerous wrongful convictions. Mr. Obama wanted to mandate videotaping of interrogations of murder suspects, to guard against coerced confessions. Prosecutors and many Republicans were opposed, particularly to the prospect that unrecorded confessions would be inadmissible in court. They recall Mr. Obama's spending hours in negotiations on compromises, such as allowing for equipment failure and providing for judges' discretion. "Some people say the exemptions are too broad," Mr. Cullerton says, "but that's what you have to do to pass laws."

The credit that went to Mr. Obama for the racial-profiling and videotaping measures stoked tensions among black colleagues who had sponsored similar proposals only to see Mr. Jones promote his protégé's efforts. One was state Sen. Rickey "Hollywood" Hendon, an outspoken Democrat, who once had to be separated from Mr. Obama in the Senate after confronting him for reasons that witnesses don't recall and Mr. Hendon won't discuss.

Mr. Hendon complained that he felt like the football player who had run 99 yards, only to see the halfback plunge the final yard for the touchdown and the credit. Earlier this month, he was outside the Old State Capitol in the cold, lending support as Mr. Obama announced his presidential candidacy.

Wilder Praises Obama Strategy (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

RICHMOND -- Richmond Mayor L. Douglas Wilder says Sen. Barack Obama's strategy of relying less on the black leaders of the civil rights era and more on a message of unity gives him the best chance of becoming the first Democrat in 44 years to win the state's electoral votes in a presidential election.

DOJ_NMG_0135920

"The civil rights movement was over 50-something years ago," Mr. Wilder, a Democrat and the country's first elected black governor, told The Washington Times. "Many people know nothing of it other than a recitation [during Black History] month. People are tired of that. They want to see more relatively.

"The worst mistake one can make, in my judgment, is to try to tailor a message to a group and to say: 'I am the person for your group.' He should be the person for the American people," he said.

As a result, Mr. Obama, an Illinois Democrat who is black, has "received an audience the likes of which have never been seen by any African-American seeking an elective office in this country, period," Mr. Wilder said. "Even at [former Secretary of State] Colin Powell's height, he did not get these kinds of crowds, and Colin was not chopped liver."

The mayor's comments come less than a week after Mr. Obama addressed nearly 4,000 people at the annual Jefferson-Jackson dinner in Richmond and received Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine's early endorsement.

The endorsement was the first by any governor outside of a candidate's home state. It also takes on additional significance in a state that has not voted for a Democrat in a presidential election since Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964, but where voters had elected Democrats in the past two gubernatorial races and last year's U.S. Senate race.

After his speech in Richmond on Saturday, Mr. Obama was thronged by supporters, who toppled a metal railing and knocked plates of half-eaten food off tables to get a peak of the senator before he slipped out a back door.

"It is a new day," Delegate Dwight Clinton Jones, a black Richmond Democrat, said after he watched Mr. Obama court voters and political leaders in Virginia on Saturday. "I believe that America is ready for things that in past times they may not have considered."

Although most black political leaders have been careful about what they say about Mr. Obama, there is evidence that civil rights leaders are concerned that Mr. Obama is not overly interested in appeasing them.

For example, earlier this month, Mr. Obama opted to announce his bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in front of nearly 15,000 people, most of whom were white, at the Old State Capitol in Springfield, Ill. -- the same day thousands of black leaders gathered at Hampton University in Virginia for the State of the Black Union, an annual traveling town hall.

The timing and location of Mr. Obama's announcement drew some cutting responses from State of the Black Union panelists, even though the former civil rights lawyer and community organizer in Chicago apologized beforehand for not attending the event.

Without singling out Mr. Obama, one of the panelists, the Rev. Al Sharpton, told attendees, "Just because you're our color doesn't make you our kind."

The remarks from Mr. Sharpton helped open the floodgates for pundits eager to question Mr. Obama's so-called "blackness" and left some local black leaders bewildered.

When asked about the remarks, Delegate A. Donald McEachin, a black Richmond Democrat, said it is wrong to question Mr. Obama's "integrity or commitment" to the black community "in the absence of any evidence to the contrary."

"We all have our roles in history to play," Mr. McEachin said. "[The civil rights leaders] have, and continue to play their roles, and he is playing his.'

Mr. Wilder, a State of the Black Union panelist, said Mr. Obama is too smart to get bogged down in such comments.

"That wasn't from the people," he said. "That wasn't from that audience, that wasn't from attendees. I really do believe he is past that level, but he is not dismissive of it."

Running On A Résumé Both Local And National (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal And Dan Frosch

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

SANTA FE, N.M. — When a governor runs for president, local issues can suddenly loom large. Take cockfighting. Gov. Bill Richardson has come out against it after ignoring the question for years.

Concerned that New Mexico suffers for being the sole state other than Louisiana to permit wagering contests pitting weaponed birds in fights to the death, Mr. Richardson has taken sides in the emotional debate, speaking out for a ban, to be debated on Saturday in the Legislature.

“I believe the people of the state want to abolish it,” the governor, a Democrat, said in his art-bedecked office. “It’s a bad image nationally. I’m putting my weight on it. It’s going to make it pass, and it’s the right thing to do.”

With portfolios as a congressman, global troubleshooter and energy czar, Mr. Richardson, 59, may rightly claim the broadest résumé of the declared presidential candidates.

He served seven terms in the House until joining the Clinton administration as ambassador to the United Nations and then energy secretary before being elected governor in 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0135921

But as he makes his case for the Democratic nomination, he is likely to be judged in large measure by his four years as governor, a record that has won him friends and foes.

He acknowledged being far back in the polls and unlikely to match leading rivals' fund-raising.

"I'm not going to be competitive in that area with the top-tier candidates," Mr. Richardson said. "But I'm going to have enough to win."

He said he would wage "an old-fashioned grass-roots campaign" based on his résumé.

"Who's the best person to get us out of Iraq?" he asked. "Who's the best person to restore America's international standing? The best person to create jobs? I believe I have the experience. I've done all these things everyone's talked about."

Hispanic — his mother was born in Mexico — in one of only three states where Anglos are no longer a majority (California and Texas are the others), Mr. Richardson won re-election as governor in November with a record 69 percent of the vote.

An imposing, exuberant figure with a relish for attention, he enjoys near-celebrity status in New Mexico, where his comings and goings — like being driven around in a speeding S.U.V. and holding court at a popular capital watering hole — routinely dominate the news.

Under Mr. Richardson, New Mexico, long ranked near the bottom of almost every social index, has made advances. With his pressing for higher wages for educators, teachers' salaries have moved from 46th in the nation in 2000 to 39th in 2006, the highest since the mid-'80s, the National Education Association says.

Since Mr. Richardson took office, unemployment is down, to 3.8 percent from 5.8 percent, according to the federal Labor Department. New Mexico is 10th in economic growth, according to a report by the Federal Funds Information Service for States, affiliated with the National Governors Association and the National Conference of State Legislators.

Mr. Richardson has also pushed hard to make New Mexico, with its dust-swept mesas and high-desert peaks, a choice location for Hollywood. According to the New Mexico Film Office, more than 60 movies and television programs have been shot here since he became governor.

And he positioned New Mexico for the private space age by carving a spaceport out of the desert alongside the White Sands Missile Range.

He persuaded Mexican authorities to bulldoze a human-smuggling base across from Columbus and declared the first governor's state of emergency on the border, freeing $1 million a year for extra patrols. But the state is also broadly tolerant of immigrants, issuing driver's licenses without regard to legal residency.

"Richardson has positioned himself as hard to cubbyhole," Brian Sanderoff, a leading pollster, said. "The minute you think he's liberal, he does something conservative."

Critics say Mr. Richardson can be vindictive, penalizing opponents by holding up their projects or grants.

"He rules the roost," Lonna Atkeson, a professor of political science at the University of New Mexico, said. "He takes things away when people are not so nice."

Told that some people called his politics rough, Mr. Richardson blurted, "Who's saying that?"

Then he said: "No, no. Look, I'm aggressive. I get things done. I believe I'm a good manager."

The governor has also been lucky. State coffers are overflowing, with much of the revenue generated by oil and gas resources. His proposed budget calls for $123 million in tax cuts, a 9 percent increase in spending for primary and secondary schools and a 7.4 percent increase in teachers' salaries.

But national studies show New Mexico continuing to lag in categories where the state has historically underachieved, although some of the figures predate Mr. Richardson's efforts.

The Annie E. Casey Foundation ranked the state 48th in its 2003-4 Kids Count index of problem indicators. The foundation said more than a quarter of New Mexico children lived in poverty, among the highest rates in the nation.

A Census Bureau study shows that from 2003 to 2005, an average of 21 percent of New Mexicans went without health insurance. Just Texas had a greater average rate in that period.

"It's a failure of a systematic way of looking at the problem," said Kay Monaco, former executive director of New Mexico Voices for Children, an advocacy group.

Although not laid at Mr. Richardson's door, corruption scandals have also tarnished the state — "pay to play," in the words of critics. Some of Mr. Richardson's embarrassing appointees stepped down, including a former state police officer named to a magistrate judgeship who resigned after being caught ordering the release of a friend jailed on a drunken-driving charge.

"One bad judge out of 56," Mr. Richardson said, acknowledging "our vetting procedures are not the most extensive."

His ethics package, pending before the Legislature, includes limits on campaign contributions.

Mr. Richardson's physicality and roughhousing have also drawn rebukes. In his autobiography from 2005, "Between Worlds," Mr. Richardson recalled negotiating with Saddam Hussein in 1995 and, in a gesture of good will, touching President Hussein's arm.

"Saddam started," he recalled, "and along the wall eight hands suddenly touched sidearms."

In late 2005, Lt. Gov. Diane Denish told The Albuquerque Journal that Mr. Richardson "pokes me" when they sit together, calling that more annoying and likely to be misconstrued than improper.

"He pinches my neck," Ms. Denish said. "He touches my hip, my thigh, sort of the side of my leg."

The governor waved that off, telling The Journal: "I tease Diane. I touch guys. It's my way of lessening tension."

In the interview, Mr. Richardson ridiculed blogs' suggesting he acted improperly around women.

"Rumors are always in a politician's life by your opposition," he said. "I've run seven times for Congress. I've been vetted by the F.B.I. for cabinet posts. I've been confirmed by the Senate. I've run two statewide races. Top security clearance. Kerry vetted me for vice president. Was clean."

He said that he welcomed scrutiny and that he had told his wife of 33 years, Barbara: "You ought to expect this. She said: 'I know. I'm ready for it.' "

Locally, no issue in recent years seems as volatile as cockfighting. State Senator Mary Jane Garcia, a Democrat who is sponsoring the bill, has tried to pass similar bills for nearly 20 years. But Ms. Garcia could never muster enough votes, largely because lawmakers were reluctant to provoke constituents, many of whom say the sport is rooted in the state's Hispanic culture.

But this time is different. Mr. Richardson is running for president.

"I asked him, 'Are you serious?' " Ms. Garcia recalled. "And he told me that he was ready to help, that it was the right thing to do, that it was the right thing for New Mexico."

The New GOP Attack Machine (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 23, 2007

If you suddenly start hearing a lot about Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., having a "calculating nature" and "political baggage," or being a "lifelong liberal," it won't be a coincidence. Similarly, get ready to see Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., strafed for his "short political timeline" (a euphemism for "rookie"), for being "arrogant and insulated" and a liberal rubberstamp. John Edwards? "New negative tone," "running to the far left" and "hypocritical."

The put-downs – some clever, some blunt -- are part of an attack-o-matic that the Republican National Committee is encouraging its supporters to use in preparing for their appearances on cable television and talk radio. The 69-page playbook, posted on the national party's Web site (GOP.com) on Wednesday as "Meet the Real Dem Candidates," devotes 10 pages each to Clinton, Edwards and Obama; nine each to Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut; and seven each to New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack.

The Republican tip sheets, each with the antiseptic title of "Research Report," constitute a sophisticated new way for the party to infuse the blogosphere and airwaves with a coordinated, fact-based message. They help allies who come with their own credibility and are not identified as party officials.

The reports come complete with video links and amusing photos: Edwards has a shiny forehead, Biden has an open mouth, Obama glowers, Dodd pontificates and Clinton and Richardson purse their lips.

Critics will call it pre-fab mudslinging, but the documents are laid out in a just-the-facts fashion, with each charge linked to a citation for a news story. Such "talking points" used to be closely held, but Republicans are going public with them in an effort to standardize the message they propagate through the new media culture.

For some time, the Democratic National Committee has had a resource center for its advocates, in the form of a blog-style collection of riffs from news stories. It points to "smooth talking Mitt" Romney, "angry" John McCain and a Rudy Giuliani who might be "hiding" something. The entries can be sorted by candidate.

Karen Finney, communications director of the Democratic National Committee, called the GOP packet "a lame attempt on the part of the RNC to play catch-up" and said there is more to come from her party, both online and offline. The DNC reached out to its own talkers on Wednesday with a memo about vulnerabilities of Republican candidates, including "The Rudy You Don't Know" Giuliani, "Anything to Win" John McCain and "Smooth Talking" Mitt Romney.

RNC Chairman Mike Duncan explained on a conference call for "friends and allies" on Wednesday afternoon that the Democratic forum in Carson City, Nev., provided the party with the "first opportunity to get the truth out about the Democrats in a widespread, coordinated way."

"Our message is very simple," Duncan said, in rolling out the dossiers. "It seems like the Democrats have far more candidates for the presidency than they have real plans for the highest office in the land, if by chance one of them wins. That's a pretty simple message. Their candidates run the gamut from Hillary Clinton, who carefully calculates every single policy decision to see how it plays with her base, to … John Edwards, who complains that there are two Americas. But the problem is, he's not sure which America his $4.2 million mansion resides in."

Duncan called for “a coordinated volley” against the candidates. “These documents will detail the flip-flops of the Democratic candidates … their dashes to the left, various verbal missteps that they’ve made,” Duncan said. “I hope that you can use this new research to help us deliver the message about the Democrats early in the debate. You are the people who make a big difference for us. You’re our face on television, our voice on radio. We need your help, and we appreciate your help. Every opportunity we have for you to hit the Democrats on the air is an opportunity for us to define them before they can define themselves.”

RNC press secretary Tracey Schmitt said party officials and surrogates gave national and local radio and TV interviews on the documents, and state parties released statements echoing the research. “It’s pretty obvious that the Democrats aren’t eager to discuss the ins and outs of their records,” Schmitt said. “We are more than happy to fill in the blanks.”

Here are the images Republicans are pushing for each candidate, so count the times you hear them on radio and TV out of the mouth of your favorite (or least favorite) pundit:

Biden: "An Undisciplined, Self-Described Northeast Liberal, In Love With The Sound Of His Own Voice."

Clinton:"A Calculating, Divisive, Lifelong Liberal With Political Baggage."

Dodd: "A New England Liberal, Past His Prime, On An Unrealistic Vanity Run For The White House."

Edwards: "A Hypocritical, Inexperienced Liberal With A New Negative Attitude."

Obama: "An Inexperienced, Insulated, Arrogant, Unabashed Liberal."

Richardson: "A Self-Promoting, Washington Insider With A Controversial Record."

The Philadelphia Story (WSJ)

By Paul E. Peterson

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

Judging by test-score results, Philadelphia schools have been enjoying a renaissance over the past four years. Thirty-two percent of Philadelphia's fifth-graders achieved proficiency on the Pennsylvania reading test in 2006, as compared to just 21% in 2002; math proficiency rose to 41% from 19%. At the eighth-grade level, there were 20 percentage point uptics in both reading and math.

Nevertheless, the respected RAND Corporation, in a study expected to influence the report of the Accountability Review Council for the Philadelphia schools that will be released later today, claims these positive results -- which came after a series of reforms including the engagement of private firms in the management of 45 schools -- are in fact deceptive and misleading.

In a press release early this month, announcing results from its latest study, RAND claims to have shown that "the four-year gains . . . were generally on a par with gains from similar low-achieving schools in the rest of the state." According to Jolley Christman, one of the report's authors, Philadelphia's "investment in private management of schools has not paid the expected dividends."

Needless to say, the study attracted wide attention. It also thrilled school choice critics, including Henry Levin of Columbia Teachers College, who said of the experiment in private management, "It's a romance that just hasn't worked. . . . They don't seem to be doing better, and they cost more."

These strong conclusions are not well supported by the RAND study, however. The widely quoted press release overstates what is actually in the report; the comparisons within the study itself are inexact; and vital information on school spending and other school characteristics is missing from the report.

First, a few words about the larger context. In 2002, fighting off fierce opposition, Pennsylvania placed Philadelphia's schools in the hands of a School Reform Commission, which then hired as superintendent the same Paul Vallas who had helped lift student achievement in Chicago. Among other innovations, Mr. Vallas audaciously turned 45 of the lowest performing schools over to private providers.

But reform did not come without a prolonged political struggle. Numerous compromises were struck, including concessions to unions that allowed many of the old regulations to remain in effect. Meanwhile, the unions kept a low public profile while apparently doing their best to undermine the reforms, especially by encouraging experienced teachers to leave the 45 schools assigned to private providers. In the first year, teacher transfer rates more than doubled at many of these schools. Despite this, test scores rose in most of the privately managed schools.

Now RAND says Philadelphia could have done equally well by doing nothing.

To prove that claim, one might expect RAND to have identified other big cities with extremely low-performing schools making equally striking gains -- but without launching reforms such as those undertaken in Philadelphia. Instead, RAND compared Philadelphia to other schools in Pennsylvania -- despite RAND's own admission (buried deep in its report) that

"Philadelphia is unique among Pennsylvania school districts: Other schools in the state are only imperfectly comparable to Philadelphia schools."

In any event, RAND says that gains in Philadelphia "were generally on a par" with gains in "similar" schools elsewhere. But the report never identifies those "similar" schools -- not their names, not the characteristics of the students attending them, not their test performance back in 2002 before reforms began. RAND only tells us that the comparison schools were in the bottom 25% of all the state's schools, a very large category that contains a wide range of schools.

Still, Philadelphia schools do not look all that bad. While not making much progress the first year, they are estimated to have outperformed the comparison schools in the second and third years. For example, Philadelphia eighth-graders, in year three, are estimated to have gained eight to 10 points more than those in the comparison schools. In year four Philadelphia's edge slips. That could be a temporary blip; RAND instead concludes that Philadelphia's gains remained only at "par." Ordinarily, researchers make use of all available estimates, not just the most recent one, to draw their conclusions.

In its second analysis of schools within Philadelphia, RAND finds privately operated schools to have done no better -- but also no worse -- than would be expected from that same school, given citywide trends. In the words of the report's italicized conclusion: "We find little evidence in terms of academic outcomes that would support the additional resources for the private managers."

Given the restrictions placed on the private providers, such a finding would not necessarily be surprising. But RAND's way of reaching its conclusion is flawed; the research looked only at those students in certain grades who were tested on multiple occasions, a small, non-random percentage of all students. No information is provided on their representativeness.

More puzzling still is RAND's decision to expect these schools to exceed the overall citywide gains in test score performance. In so doing, RAND seemingly ignored the fact that the 45 schools assigned to the private managers were among the city's most challenging, scoring, in 2002, one to two years below the citywide average. A more suitable analysis would have expected them to gain more than students at comparably low-performing schools.

Finally, RAND questions the additional cost of private management, and says that the privately managed schools gained additional resources that the average school did not. But nowhere does RAND provide evidence on overall per-pupil spending at any Philadelphia school, making it impossible to tell whether the privately managed schools actually received more additional resources than other city schools.

It is more likely that per-pupil expenditure at the privately managed schools dropped when experienced, highly paid teachers left the schools at a much higher rate than before. RAND needs to show that that did not happen, or was offset by large increments in other kinds of expenditures, if it is to draw the conclusion that the privately managed schools had "additional resources."

Just how sensitive results are to RAND's specific methodology is unknown. But if education policy research is going to make a solid contribution to school reform, it needs to be both objective and keep pace with rising standards in educational research. In RAND's case, a forward step would be to make its Philadelphia data available to other qualified researchers, something it has so far been unwilling to do.

Non-Union Jobs (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

If Apple CEO Steve Jobs had praised teachers unions as the backbone of public education in the U.S., it would have made the front pages. Instead, at an education conference in Austin, Texas, Mr. Jobs offered some constructive criticism of teachers unions and barely anyone noticed. Sounds like news to us.

"I believe that what is wrong with our schools in this nation is that they've become unionized in the worst possible way," said Mr. Jobs during a Q-and-A session on technology in the classroom. "This unionization and lifetime employment of K-12 teachers is off-the-charts crazy."

The real crisis in public education, he noted, has nothing to do with the amount of technology in the classroom. It's the fact that union work rules prevent principals from firing the bad teachers and rewarding the good ones. "Here's the problem," said Mr. Jobs, using a business analogy: "What kind of person could you get to run a small business if you told them, when they came in, they couldn't get rid of people they thought weren't any good in the first place? Or they couldn't pay people three times as much when they got three times as much work done?"

Regular readers of these columns will find nothing particularly shocking in Mr. Jobs's broadside. Still, it's nice to hear such sentiments coming from a titan of industry, especially his.

The latest National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP) report was released yesterday. The dismal results are what we've come to expect from an elementary and secondary public education system in the vice-grip of the National Education Association and its political acolytes. According to the NAEP survey, nearly 40% of high-school seniors scored below basic level on the math test, and fewer than a quarter of 12th graders rate proficient.

Except for high-skill immigrants, this would be Apple's future labor pool. Mr. Jobs is right to point the finger at the union stewards of public education. And fellow business leaders, who have as big a stake in this matter, would do well to lend him public support.

Iran Defies Nuclear Ultimatum (WT/AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

VIENNA, Austria -- Iran has ignored a U.N. Security Council ultimatum to freeze uranium enrichment and has instead expanded its program by setting up hundreds of centrifuges, the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency said yesterday. The finding paves the way for new U.N. sanctions.

The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) said in a report to the Security Council and its 35-nation board that Tehran also has continued to build a heavy water reactor and related facilities which, along with enrichment, could help it develop nuclear arms.

In addition, the report said, Iran ignored a Security Council call to cooperate with the IAEA in its efforts to shed light on suspicious nuclear activities.

The conclusions, while widely expected, could serve as the trigger for the council to start deliberating on new sanctions against Iran.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said U.S. officials have already begun consulting with allies about the next steps, including sanctions. He said officials expect the council to meet on the matter as early as next week.

"The report gives us a pretty clear picture that shows that Iran has not changed its behavior, has not changed its views and is continuing on the path of defiance. We think that's unfortunate," he told reporters.

In Tehran, the deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, Mohammed Saeedi, said international demands for Iran to suspend enrichment violated Iran's "rights, the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and international regulations."

The Security Council issued three demands to Iran on Dec. 23 -- freeze uranium enrichment, stop building heavy water facilities and fully cooperate with the IAEA. It introduced limited sanctions and gave Iran 60 days to comply -- a deadline that expired Wednesday.

The IAEA report prepared by director Mohamed ElBaradei showed Tehran has instead expanded its enrichment efforts by setting up nearly 1,000 centrifuges in and above an underground bunker, enriching minute amounts of uranium and bringing nearly 9 tons of gaseous feedstock -- the mixture that is fed into the centrifuges for enrichment -- into its underground nuclear facility at Natanz.

Iranian officials also informed the agency that they planned to have close to 3,000 centrifuges in place by May, the report said.

Iran's stated goal is running 54,000 centrifuges at Natanz to churn out enriched uranium -- enough for dozens of nuclear weapons a year.

Iran maintains it only wants to generate power and says its heavy water facilities at the central city of Arak -- which will produce plutonium, another potential pathway to nuclear arms -- are meant solely to generate isotopes for medical research and other peaceful purposes.

Even before the IAEA report was issued, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the U.S. and its allies would use the Security Council and other "available channels" to bring Tehran back to negotiations over its nuclear program.

British Foreign Minister Margaret Beckett said her country would consult with other Security Council members on the next steps, adding: "We remain determined to prevent Iran acquiring the means to develop nuclear weapons."

The sanctions approved in December banned all countries from supplying Iran with materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs and froze the Iranian assets of 10 key companies and 12 individuals related to those programs.

Russia and China, veto-holding council members with close ties to Iran, are likely to oppose strict economic sanctions or weapons bans. A travel ban was dropped from the initial resolution because of Moscow's opposition, so tough negotiations are expected.

Russia's U.N. ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, said yesterday that he had "no substantive comment" on the IAEA report, but he reiterated Moscow's desire for a diplomatically negotiated solution.

"We should not lose sight of the goal -- and the goal is not to have a resolution or to impose sanctions," he said. "The goal is to accomplish a political outcome."

New Penalties May Loom For Iran's Nuclear Work (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — The United Nations' nuclear watchdog said Thursday that Iran has expanded its efforts to enrich uranium, a conclusion likely to result in a push for tougher penalties against Tehran.

A report by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) said Iran was installing hundreds of new centrifuges for uranium enrichment and was taking other steps that would enable it to build nuclear weapons.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns announced later Thursday that he will travel to London on Monday to meet with negotiating partners to try to draft a new resolution on Iran. Even before the report was issued, Burns had said the United States, its European allies, Russia and China had begun discussing a new round of penalties.

Iran's nuclear activities defy a U.N. Security Council demand that it suspend uranium enrichment by Wednesday or face the possibility of additional sanctions.

On Dec. 23, the council imposed penalties intended to cut off trade that could provide Iran with technology and know-how for its nuclear and missile programs. The council also banned travel by Iranian officials involved in the programs.

In addition, the United States has persuaded several large European banks to cut ties with Iranian banks or restrict dealings with them.

Iranian central bank figures show inflation and unemployment rising as the United States and Europe have increased economic pressure.

Burns said the administration was "heartened" by the impact the sanctions have had on other trade and investment in Iran. "It leads us to believe that a second round would have a similar impact."

Despite sanctions, Iran appears to be accelerating efforts to enrich uranium. The IAEA report said Iran has installed two new sets of centrifuges in an underground plant at Natanz, 160 miles south of Tehran. Another two sets were "in the final stages of installation," and Iran told the U.N. agency it intended to put 3,000 centrifuges into operation by May. Centrifuges are machines that spin at high speed and isolate a form of uranium suitable for fuel for nuclear reactors or bombs.

Iran has said that it intends to make only fuel for nuclear power plants, not weapons.

Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, said on Thursday that the U.N. demand for Iran to suspend uranium work "has no legal basis and … naturally, it could not be accepted by Iran."

The IAEA said Iran had failed to clear up long-standing questions about other nuclear activities. The agency was uncertain if Iran was hiding other programs.

David Albright, a former U.N. nuclear inspector and president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a Washington think tank, said Iran was experiencing some technical difficulties but was still "moving ahead pretty fast."

Albright said it was possible Iran could have enough highly enriched uranium to make a bomb by 2009.

The Bush administration has urged Iran to stop uranium work and begin negotiations with the United States and five other countries: Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China. Iran has said it wants to talk but will not suspend enrichment as a precondition.

Rice Warns Iran It Risks Further U.N. Sanctions (WP)

By Colum Lynch And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Feb. 22 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned Iran on Thursday that it will face further punishment and isolation if it forges ahead with efforts to develop a uranium-enrichment program, but she said the United States and other powers are prepared to restart talks aimed at ending the standoff if Iran suspends its most controversial nuclear activities.

The remarks came hours after the International Atomic Energy Agency issued a report saying Iran has defied yet another U.N. Security Council demand to halt its most sensitive nuclear activities. R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, plans to travel to London on Monday to press Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany to slap additional penalties on Iran.

"We have the common goal to encourage Iran back to the bargaining table," Rice said after a meeting in Berlin with her counterparts from Russia, Germany and the European Union. "The hope is that the sanctions show the Iranians the isolation that they are enduring, that isolation is likely to increase over time and that it is time to take a different course."

The IAEA report confirmed that Iran has continued to operate an experimental uranium-enrichment program and that it has advanced its efforts to produce an industrial-scale facility that could potentially produce enough highly enriched uranium to make as many as two bombs a year. Iran says it has no intention of producing bomb-grade uranium and will use the facility to produce nuclear fuel for energy.

A senior Iranian official said that the council's demand to suspend its nuclear activities "could not be accepted by Iran" because it would strip Tehran of its right, under the 1970 Non-Proliferation Treaty, to operate a civilian nuclear energy program. "This report shows that the best way to resolve this international issue is to return to the negotiating table and reach a broad agreement," said the official, Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, according to [a news agency].

Russia, China and several European countries have become increasingly uncomfortable with the Bush administration's positions on Iran as tensions between Tehran and Washington have risen in recent months. Bush recently authorized the U.S. military to capture or kill Iranian intelligence and paramilitary agents in Iraq; the administration has said such agents are involved in attacks against U.S. military forces. The Pentagon has sent two carriers to sit off the Iranian coast in the Persian Gulf, which some allies have interpreted as preparation for a possible military strike.

Those concerns have prompted renewed calls for direct dialogue with Iran. German, Swiss, Russian, Chinese, Saudi and IAEA officials have all reached out to Iran in recent weeks in the hopes of restarting talks even if Iran continues to defy the Security Council.

Several diplomats said there is a possibility that the E.U.'s top diplomat, Javier Solana, will meet next week with Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani to assemble a list of guiding principles for future negotiations.

U.S and European diplomats said that they are pursuing a "dual track" diplomatic strategy -- pressing simultaneously for additional sanctions and renewed negotiations with Tehran -- but remained divided over how tough new sanctions should be.

The United States, Britain and France favor imposing a series of additional penalties against Iran, including a mandatory travel ban and additional asset freezes against some Iranian officials linked to the country's most sensitive nuclear programs. They also support measures including a ban on export credits. "We want to do it as soon as possible and to avoid the wrangling of last time. But we've got to get tougher sanctions than we have at the moment if we want real impact, and we're very realistic about how difficult that may be," a senior European official said.

A senior U.S. official said the United States is willing to forgo a tough resolution in exchange for the Security Council moving quickly to a unified agreement to raise the political stakes for Iran while avoiding a fight with the Russians.

But other European powers that conduct billions of dollars in trade with Iran, including Germany and Italy, have resisted stringent economic sanctions that would harm their commercial interests.

Russia and China are also resisting a tough reaction. Russia's U.N. ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, said, "We should not lose sight of the goal, . . . to accomplish a political outcome of this problem."

Thursday's six-page report concluded that "Iran has not suspended its enrichment related activities." The report provided no evidence that Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons, as President Bush asserts, but inspectors said Iran's lack of voluntary cooperation with its investigation made it impossible to rule out that such efforts were underway.

The report detailed progress Iran has made in the past two months installing several hundred centrifuges for industrial-scale enrichment at its largest nuclear facility in the town of Natanz. The Iranians have been enriching low levels of uranium suitable for a nuclear energy program, not bombs, in other centrifuges set up more than a year ago at Natanz's research center.

IAEA inspectors said Iran had not provided any new information on the history of its nuclear program, which began in secret in 1987. Inspectors also received no answers to questions raised by documents obtained by U.S. intelligence in 2004 that suggest Iran was trying to develop a missile capable of carrying a nuclear warhead and was considering plans for a second uranium-conversion facility.

Despite the lack of information in the report, no official, in Washington or Europe, suggested that Iran's current work meant it will acquire nuclear weapons in the near future.

"Their nuclear program is not forging ahead," said a senior European diplomat. "Some of that is a result of the sanctions and the international pressure on them and some of it is because of their own technical difficulties in putting the program together."

Rice Says Europe, Russia Want Iran Talks (AP)

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday that U.S., European and Russian diplomats have a common goal to encourage Iran back to the bargaining table over its disputed nuclear program. "We reconfirmed we will use available channels and the Security Council to try to achieve that goal," the top U.S. diplomat said. Rice spoke following a breakfast meeting with her counterparts from Germany, Russia and the European Union.

The group reviewed Iran's compliance with a U.N. Security Council demand that it stop enriching uranium, a key step toward producing either nuclear power or a nuclear weapon.

After the meeting ended, the U.N. nuclear watchdog released a report formally confirming the Islamic republic's refusal to freeze enrichment.

The report by Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said Iran has expanded enrichment efforts.

The finding is a step toward additional sanctions, but it was not clear whether U.N. Security Council members Russia and China would go along.

Rice said she and her counterparts made no decisions Thursday because they met before ElBaradei's report was released. Rice headed back to the United States immediately after the breakfast meeting.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said that Iran's refusal to curtail its nuclear program is a "missed opportunity" for Iran's government and people.

Casey said that he is confident that the Security Council will approve additional sanctions against Iran but he declined to predict what they might be.

Iran has called for talks with the United States — but has not budged on council demands that it mothball its enrichment program.

Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel but further enrichment makes it suitable for use in building an atomic bomb. The West claims the Islamic republic intends to build a bomb with enriched uranium. Iran says it merely wants to develop peaceful nuclear power.

In moderate remarks Wednesday directed at Washington — the key backer of tougher U.N. action — Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said the dispute "has to be decided peacefully with the United States."

But other top Iranian officials used harsher language, and none showed signs of compromise on the main demand of the U.S. and other world powers — a halt to enrichment and related activities.

"The enemy is making a big mistake if it thinks it can thwart the will of the Iranian nation to achieve the peaceful use of nuclear technology," Iranian state TV's Web site quoted President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as saying Wednesday.

Rice said last week that the United States probably would press for another U.N. resolution condemning Iran for continuing to defy the U.N. demand to stop enriching uranium, and to seek additional penalties against Tehran.

The Security Council set a 60-day deadline on Dec. 23 for Iran to freeze its enrichment activities and said continued Iranian defiance past that ultimatum, which ran out Wednesday, could lead to stronger punishment.

The U.N. is demanding an immediate and unconditional stop to uranium enrichment, after which European-led negotiations over an economic reward package might begin. Iran has long insisted it will not stop its nuclear activities as a condition for negotiations to start.

"The best course would be for Iran to suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities so that we can return to negotiations," Rice told reporters Tuesday. "That is the entire purpose of having the pressure on the Iranian regime, so that the Iranian regime can make better choices about how to engage the international community."

Diplomats Trying To Restart Iran Talks (AP)

U.S., European and Russian diplomats agree on encouraging Iran back to the bargaining table over its disputed nuclear program, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday. Diplomats from the U.S. and its negotiating partners plan to meet next week to try drafting a new U.N. resolution on the standoff.

Burns said he hoped the United States and other permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, plus Germany, can quickly draft a resolution. He said it was too soon to say what provisions the resolution might contain but said his hope was one would be drafted that would "see Iran repudiated again."

The atomic energy agency's report is a step toward additional sanctions, but it was not clear whether U.N. Security Council members Russia and China would go along.

Iran Expanding Nuclear Effort, Agency Reports (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And William J. Broad

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — In open defiance of the United Nations, Iran is steadily expanding its efforts to enrich uranium, the International Atomic Energy Agency reported Thursday. In response, the Bush administration immediately pressed for more severe sanctions against the country, at a moment of greatly increased tensions between Washington and Tehran.

In a mild surprise to outside experts, the nuclear agency reported that Iran was now operating or about to switch on roughly 1,000 centrifuges, the high-speed devices that enrich uranium, at its nuclear facility at Natanz.

“They are very serious,” said David Albright, a former inspector who is now president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a private nuclear study group. “They are installing faster than was commonly expected.”

Coming on the heels of the Bush administration’s accusations that Iran’s Quds Force is sending deadly bombs and other weapons into Iraq, the report heightens what has become a growing confrontation.

Since the last energy agency assessment of Iran’s progress, President Bush has ordered a second aircraft carrier group into waters in striking distance of Iran, an unsubtle reminder that, if diplomacy fails, Mr. Bush could order a strike on Iran’s nuclear facilities. But senior administration officials have insisted in recent days that the show of military force is intended only to remind Iran of Washington's options, and they have dismissed the idea that Mr. Bush is considering an attack.

On Thursday, administration officials said they hoped to use the agency's conclusions to return to the Security Council for approval of deeper sanctions, and they said the United States would work outside the Council to persuade banks around the world to cut off more lending and export credits to Iran, in hopes of further damaging its oil infrastructure. Under Secretary of State R. Nicholas Burns will go to London on Monday to begin that process, meeting with the four other permanent members of the Security Council and Germany to talk about tougher sanctions. While Russia and China agreed to the December resolution, which required the inspectors to report back on Iran's compliance in 60 days, they indicated at the time that they were unwilling to increase the penalties.

The report appeared to confirm that the Iranian government was somewhat behind schedule in its nuclear ambitions: it boasted a year ago of plans to have roughly 3,000 centrifuges running by about now. But the 1,000 that it has nearly ready to run is still more than most outside experts believed it could install. If the country could operate 3,000 centrifuges continuously for a year, it could produce about one weapon's worth of highly enriched uranium.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel said Thursday that even though the Iranians were not as far along as they would like to be, they were still far closer to learning how to make bomb-grade uranium than Israel was comfortable with. He dodged questions about at what point Israel might lean toward military action, a step American officials have said that they are trying to discourage.

"We're a long way from that," one senior administration official said earlier this week. "We want to make sure that the Israelis are, too." He said he had no indication that Israel was planning unilateral action.

The report comes at a time of debate within the administration over whether and how to find a way to negotiate with Iran without violating Mr. Bush's stricture that the country must first suspend its enrichment work. Officials say they are trying to exploit fissures in Iranian society, as some Iranian groups are beginning to question whether the hard-line position taken by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and some of the country's ruling ayatollahs is worth the cost in sanctions and isolation.

"There are people in Iran who recognize that the path that they're on is not a useful path, not a constructive path," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in Berlin before the release of the report. She said if Iran suspended enrichment, "We could begin negotiations on whatever they would like to talk about."

On Thursday, Mr. Burns said in an interview that he believed the Security Council resolution in December was having an effect. "We did not fully anticipate the strong impact that it would have," he said. "It has divided the government in Tehran and frankly knocked them off stride."

But Iran's leaders have continued to reject Mr. Bush's condition for talks — a suspension of nuclear activity — which would essentially undercut their only real leverage in negotiations. Unlike North Korea, which agreed in principle in recent days to freeze its production of new nuclear material, Iran is not believed to possess nuclear weapons, meaning that the uranium enrichment is its main bargaining chip.

Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice are also concerned about losing leverage, senior officials say. With oil at $60 a barrel, they are concerned that no sanctions can truly harm Iran. And negotiating while Iran expands its enrichment capacity, they fear, would mean that as negotiations dragged on, Iran would get closer to being able to produce a nuclear weapon.

In its December resolution , the Security Council gave Iran 60 days to both suspend its operations and answer a series of questions. Open issues, it said, included research on high explosives, which are necessary to detonate an atom bomb, as well as the design of a missile warhead.

"Without such cooperation and transparency," the report said, "the agency will not be able to provide assurances about the absence of undeclared nuclear material and activities in Iran or about the exclusively peaceful nature of that program."

Moreover, the Iranians have sharply restricted the access of inspectors to many of the sites they once had freedom to visit. Inspectors were allowed several recent visits to the nuclear complex at Natanz, and their report reflected greater-than-expected progress there. In addition to the 362 centrifuges in its pilot plant there, Iran in recent months has been installing an additional 656 machines in two cavernous underground halls at the complex. Of those, inspectors say, roughly half are at the final stage of testing before the introduction of uranium, and the other half were "in the final stages of installation."

The report said that between Nov. 2 and Feb. 17, Iranian crews fed 145 pounds of uranium into the pilot plant for enrichment. That is more than they had done in previous intervals. But their effort still produced only about 15 pounds of low-enriched uranium — too little for anything but experimental analysis.

The inspectors expected that effort to expand quickly, saying that Iran planned to begin feeding uranium into the new centrifuges in the big halls by the end of this month, and to continue installing more centrifuges there so that, by May, the total number of operating machines would come to 3,000.

"They're forging ahead," said a European diplomat who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of protocol. "They're not moving at a huge pace but they're moving."

"It's fairly clear," the diplomat added, "that Iran still has not addressed the outstanding issues — the scope and intent of the program."

The Iranians say the cavernous underground halls will eventually hold 54,000 centrifuges, allowing the enrichment of uranium by the ton for reactor fuel rods — or, if the Bush administration's fears come true, nuclear arms.

The atomic agency in its report said Iran had already moved into the cavernous halls nearly 10 tons of unenriched uranium — enough, nuclear experts said, to make at least one atom bomb. In all, at its sprawling plant at Isfahan, Iran has produced some 200 tons of uranium now ready for enrichment at Natanz. If turned into weapons-grade uranium, that would be enough for more than a dozen nuclear weapons.

Iran Has Speeded Up N-plans, Says UN (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Najmeh Bozorgmehr

Financial Times, February 23, 2007

Iran has speeded up its nuclear programme and plans to complete a large-scale uranium enrichment facility by May, the United Nations atomic watchdog said on Thursday.

By that time, according to a long-awaited report by the International Atomic Energy Agency, Iran plans to install and start using 3,000 centrifuges to enrich uranium – despite UN demands that it suspend uranium enrichment related activities.

If they functioned smoothly, the 3,000 centrifuges – organised into "cascades" of 164 machines apiece – could produce sufficient highly enriched uranium for a nuclear bomb within a year.

The report said Iran intended "to continue progressively with the installation of the 18 cascades of the 3,000 machine hall and to bring them gradually into operation by May 2007".

However, Iran protests its purposes are purely peaceful, and many observers add that the country relies on inferior blackmarket technology, notorious for breaking down.

Yesterday Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organisation, confirmed to the country's Mehr news agency that Iran planned to bring the 3,000 centrifuges on stream in May. Originally, Iran had intended to start installing the centrifuges by the final quarter of last year.

The report added that on January 31 Iran transferred "approximately 8.7 tonnes" of the nuclear feedstock uranium hexafluoride to the Natanz plant and that it planned to begin feeding them into the centrifuges by the end of this month.

The speed with which Tehran intends to pursue its programme adds to the tensions surrounding the dispute and means that the issue is likely to make a swift return to the UN Security Council, where the US will push for new measures against Tehran to add to UN sanctions agreed last December. However, Russia and China are sceptical about sanctions.

Privately, IAEA officials are sceptical of whether Iran can meet its timetable, which it informed the agency of last month. This week, Mohamed ElBaradei, IAEA director general, told the Financial Times that Iran could take between six months and a year to install and operate 3,000 centrifuges.

So far, yesterday's report says, Iran has installed and started spinning two cascades of 164 centrifuges at the fuel enrichment plant, to add to two 164-centrifuge cascades in a "research" facility above ground. The report added that, as of February 17, Iran was in the final stages of installing two additional 164-centrifuge cascades.

The report also notes that Iran has objected to 10 of the agency's designated nuclear inspectors, after having rejected an earlier 38 inspectors, and failed to account for uranium contamination at a technical university.

Iran Says Nuclear Fuel Is For Future (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

VIENNA, Austria — Iran has steadily expanded its program to enrich uranium and defied a U.N. Security Council deadline for an immediate freeze of nuclear activities before it gains the capability to produce fuel for nuclear weapons, the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency said here today.

The six-page report by Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, is almost certain to trigger moves by the Bush administration and its European allies for stiffer U.N. sanctions against the hard-line Iranian regime.

The Security Council voted unanimously in December to impose a 60-day deadline for Iran to unconditionally stop a pilot program that has begun small-scale uranium enrichment, as well as stop construction of a heavy water reactor and installation of a much larger enrichment facility.

But ElBaradei's report indicated that the Iranians instead have pushed the program into higher gear since November. A senior United Nations' official, who briefed reporters, said there had been "no progress" in resolving the IAEA's major outstanding concerns.

"There is limited cooperation," he said. "In my view, it's fairly limited."

Most significantly, the report confirmed that Iran has begun installation of 3,000 gas centrifuges in an underground facility at Natanz and plans to "bring them gradually into operation by May 2007."

If true, experts here said, a facility that large conceivably could produce enough enriched uranium in a year to provide enough highly enriched uranium for a nuclear bomb. Earlier this week, ElBaradei was quoted as saying he believed the facility would not be operational for another six months.

Iran insists it will only produce low-enriched uranium to fuel civilian reactors at electric power plants, but the international community fears the effort could be extended to also produce weapons-grade material. Iran ultimately hopes to install 54,000 centrifuges, a facility large enough to fuel 20 bombs a year.

Iranian officials have repeatedly rebuffed IAEA requests to install special cameras and other remote monitoring equipment at the underground site to ensure the enrichment program is for peaceful purposes, according to the report.

Officials in Tehran also have failed to fully explain the source of particles of high-enriched uranium that previously were detected on equipment on the Natanz centrifuges and at separate technical research center, the report said.

IAEA inspectors visited Iran earlier this week and plan to return on March 3.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon, on a visit to Vienna, told reporters that he was "deeply concerned … that the Iranian government did not meet the deadline set by the Security Council."

Iran's nuclear activities, he added, had "great implications for peace and security, as well as nonproliferation of weapons of mass destruction."

The focus now moves to the Security Council in New York, which is expected to meet next week to consider a range of further actions against Iran.

Possible new sanctions could include a travel ban on certain Iranian officials, a prohibition against export guarantees and other financial support for Iran, and an expansion of the nuclear embargo to an arms embargo.

Iran's nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, flew to Vienna on Tuesday for last minute talks with ElBaradei. Larijani told reporters afterward that Iran was "looking for ways and means to start negotiations."

He said Iran was prepared to provide "assurances that there would be no deviation" of material for nuclear weapons, but ruled out stopping the program outright as a precondition for talks.

Speculation Rages: Is Iran Bush's Next Target? (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush says he isn't looking for a fight, but the question won't go away: Is the United States headed for war with Iran's Islamic rulers?

Increasing tensions with Iran over its nuclear program and actions in Iraq have fueled speculation that Bush may be paving the way for military action. With U.S. forces tied down in Iraq and Afghanistan, no one expects a ground invasion, but analysts at both ends of the political spectrum put little stock in Bush's insistence that he's focused only on diplomacy.

"I still believe, at the end of the day, that he will bomb the Iranian (nuclear) facilities," said Joshua Muravchik, a neoconservative scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, a think tank with close ties to the Bush administration. Muravchik, who favors military action, sees Bush's current focus on diplomacy as a prelude to attack.

"When he does it - if he does it - it will be wildly unpopular. He certainly at least wants to be able to say convincingly, `I tried everything else,'" Muravchik said.

Bush bristles at suggestions that he wants a confrontation. He and his advisers describe U.S. policy as a carrot-and-stick approach that uses the threat of military action to create diplomatic leverage. The goal is to encourage internal dissent in Iran and force the government to take a more moderate approach.

"Our policies are all aimed at convincing the Iranian people there's a better way forward, and I hope their government hears that message," Bush said at a Feb. 14 news conference. "We'll continue to try to solve the issue peacefully."

The next day, a frustrated Defense Secretary Robert Gates declared, "For the umpteenth time, we are not looking for an excuse to go to war with Iran."

The strategy could backfire, however, if U.S. pressure prompts Iranians to coalesce behind their leaders instead of encouraging dissent. Moreover, Iran has signaled that it has tools of its own, such as planning war games in the Strait of Hormuz, a chokepoint for half the world's oil; improving relations with Russia and China; and stepping up support for militant Shiite Muslims in Iraq, Lebanon, Afghanistan and elsewhere.

Skeptics note that Bush also stressed diplomacy in the run-up to the Iraq war, declaring his peaceful intentions even as he prepared for the 2003 invasion.

"I don't have any war plans on my desk," he told reporters during a visit to France on May 26, 2002. While that may have been technically correct, Bush already had received a series of briefings on invasion plans, including one about two weeks before his European trip.

In recent months, the Bush administration has ratcheted up pressure against Iran. It has:

Dispatched a second aircraft carrier strike group to patrol the Persian Gulf and sent Patriot anti-missile missiles to Arab allies bordering the Gulf.

Expanded operations against alleged Iranian networks operating in Iraq, conducting two raids, one involving U.S. soldiers snatching Iranians said to be members of the al Quds paramilitary force.

Accused Iran of supplying roadside bombs to Iraqi insurgents and vowed to stop the shipments.

Moved to bolster the government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora with money and military supplies in a proxy struggle with the Iranian-backed Hezbollah terrorist group.

Launched an aggressive financial campaign against Iran to curb its access to the international financial system, freezing bank funds and barring U.S. transactions with various entities. This week the Treasury Department added Hezbollah's construction arm, Jihad al Bina, to a roster of blacklisted banks.

A senior U.S. official said in an interview that Bush is seeking to increase pressure on Iran to change its behavior, but isn't trying to spark a military confrontation.

European and Arab diplomats say they've sought and received assurances that the United States isn't planning war against Iran.

"They have told us there are no plans to attack Iran," said Nabil Fahmy, Egypt's ambassador in Washington. Fahmy said that while Iran must address concerns about its nuclear program, the Middle East needs less conflict, not more.

U.S. officials from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on down say the pressure on Iran is producing results. They cite a growing debate in Iran over President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's performance, the country's economic doldrums and the poor showing of Ahmadinejad's supporters in December's local elections.

Still, Ahmadinejad has remained defiant on the nuclear issue, ignoring a Feb. 21 U.N. deadline to halt uranium enrichment. He says Iran is interested only in nuclear power generation. U.S. officials believe Iran is using its civilian nuclear industry as cover for a weapons program.

"The free world is sending the regime in Tehran a clear message: We're not going to allow Iran to have nuclear weapons,'" Bush told an American Legion convention last February.

So what happens if threats and diplomacy fail? It's a question that administration officials don't want to answer. Iran isn't believed to be on the verge of obtaining nuclear weapons, but some analysts - and Israelis - worry that it could soon reach a point where its program will be hard to stop without military strikes.

"We have got time," Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, the No. 3 State Department official, said at a recent forum. "There is no one arguing, that I know of, inside the administration or outside, to the effect that we have to exhaust diplomacy in the next few months."

But Bush has two more years in the White House, and he may not want to leave the Iranian problem to the next president.

"We may be talking about decisions the president has not yet made, but may yet make before his two years are up," said Paul Pillar, a retired senior CIA analyst who's now a Georgetown University professor.

"In military terms, in political terms, the stage is being set," said retired Air Force Col. Sam Gardiner, a frequent administration critic. "The path is toward the military option, although a decision, I don't think, has been made."

Some analysts fear that heightened tensions could lead to military action whether Bush wants it or not. In 1988, during a tense period of the Iran-Iraq War, the guided-missile cruiser USS Vincennes mistakenly shot down an Iranian civilian airliner, killing all 290 people aboard.

"In the current climate, there's a substantial risk of things escalating out of control," Pillar said.

Arab States, Wary Of Iran, Add To Their Arsenals But Still Lean On The U.S. (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

ABU DHABI, United Arab Emirates, Feb. 22 — As fears grow over the escalating confrontation between Iran and the West, Arab states across the Persian Gulf have begun a rare show of muscle flexing, publicly advertising a shopping spree for new weapons and openly discussing their security concerns.

Typically secretive, the gulf nations have long planned upgrades to their armed forces, but now are speaking openly about them. American military officials say the countries, normally prone to squabbling, have also increased their military cooperation and opened lines of communication to the American military here.

Patriot missile batteries capable of striking down ballistic missiles have been readied in several gulf countries, including Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Qatar, analysts say, and increasingly, the states have sought to emphasize their unanimity against Iran's nuclear ambitions.

"There has always been an acknowledgment of the threat in the region, but the volume of the debate has now risen," said one United Arab Emirates official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on the subject. "Now the message is there's a dialogue going on with Iran, but that doesn't mean I don't intend to defend myself."

The Persian Gulf monarchies and sheikdoms, mostly small and vulnerable, have long relied on the United States to protect them. The United States Fifth Fleet is based in Bahrain; the United States Central Command is based in nearby Qatar; and the Navy has long relied on docking facilities in the United Arab Emirates, which has one of the region's deepest water ports at Jebel Ali.

The United States, too, has begun a significant expansion of forces in the gulf, with a second United States aircraft carrier battle group led by the John C. Stennis now in the Persian Gulf and with minesweeping ships.

The expansion has helped calm fears among gulf governments that the United States could pull out of the region in the future, even as it has raised concerns about a potential American confrontation with Iran, accidental or intentional.

As tensions with Iran rise, many gulf countries have come to see themselves as the likely first targets of an Iranian attack. Some have grown more concerned that the United States may be overstretched militarily, many analysts say, while almost all the monarchies, flush with cash as a result of high oil prices, have sought to build a military deterrent of their own.

"The message is first, 'U.S., stay involved here,' and second, 'Iran, we will maintain a technological edge no matter what,' " said Emile el-Hokayem, research fellow at the Henry L. Stimson Center, a research center based in Washington. "They are trying to reinforce the credibility of the threat of force."

Military officials from throughout the region descended this week on the Idex military trade fair, a semiannual event that has become the region's largest arms market, drawing nearly 900 weapons makers from around the world. They came ready to update their military capacities and air and naval defenses. They also came armed with a veiled message of resolve.

"We believe there is a need for power to protect peace, and strong people with the capability to respond are the real protectors of peace," said Sheik Khalifa bin Zayed al-Nahyan, the president of the United Arab Emirates and ruler of the emirate of Abu Dhabi, at the exposition. "That is why we are keen to maintain the efficiency of our armed forces."

The Persian Gulf has been a lucrative market for arms. Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Oman spend up to 10 percent of their gross domestic product on the military, amounting to nearly $21 billion, $4 billion and $2.7 billion, respectively, estimates John Kenkel, senior director of Jane's Strategic Advisory Services.

If they follow through on the deals announced recently, it is estimated that countries like the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Oman and Saudi Arabia will spend up to $60 billion this year. The biggest buyer in 2006, according to the defense industry journal Defense News, was Saudi Arabia, which has agreed to buy 72 Eurofighter Typhoon combat jets for $11 billion. It also has a $400 million deal to upgrade 12 Apache AH-64A helicopters to the Longbow standard. The kingdom also reportedly plans to acquire cruise missiles, attack helicopters and tanks, all for a total of $50 billion.

Kuwait reportedly bought 24 Apache Longbow helicopters, while the United Arab Emirates has continued to take delivery of 80 F-16 Block 60 fighters, with plans to buy air tankers, missile defense batteries and airborne early warning systems. Bahrain ordered nine UH-60M Black Hawk helicopters in an estimated $252 million deal, while Oman reportedly bought 30 antitank rocket launchers in a $48 million purchase and is planning a naval overhaul.

"It is a message to enemies that 'We are taking defense seriously,' " Mr. Kenkel said, emphasizing that the new arms were for deterrence.

"If the U.S. ever does pull back, these countries in the gulf have realized, they may have to fend for themselves," Mr. Kenkel said. "As the Boy Scouts say, always be prepared."

The most marked change is in the public nature of the acquisitions, which previously would have been kept secret, many analysts here said, itself a form of deterrence.

"They have been doing these kinds of purchases since the '90s," said Marwan Lahoud, chief executive of the European missile maker MBDA. "What has changed is they are stating it publicly. The other side is making pronouncements so they have to as well," he said, speaking of Iran's recent announcements about its weapons capacity.

Senior United States military officials say gulf countries have become more nervous as Iran has conducted naval maneuvers, especially near the Straits of Hormuz, the main artery through which two-fifths of the world's oil reaches markets.

"A year ago you could have characterized the interaction with the Iranians as professional," said Vice Adm. Patrick Walsh, departing commander of the Fifth Fleet. "What's different today has been the number and amount of exercises and the proximity of those exercises to the Straits of Hormuz themselves."

The exercises were among the reasons for the expansion of Navy forces in the region, he said, but have also raised alarm about the potential for accidents to lead to an unintended war.

Admiral Walsh said that American warships remained in international waters, and that Iranian and American ships kept close watch on one another. Some critics of the Bush administration have alleged that the increased military presence in the gulf risks igniting a conflict.

Admiral Walsh said the increased American presence was aimed at o reassuring gulf states that the United States remained committed to their security, but also welcomed their efforts to build deterrence.

"We have found that we need to be physically present to prevent such armed behavior," he said of the Iranian maneuvers. "We're mindful we're not giving up any water, but also being careful not to take a provocative stance."

A Presidential Candidate Bill Clinton Can Publicly Embrace (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

And now, the first known use of the Heimlich maneuver in political advertising. This photo was included in an e-mail a Loop Fan and undoubtedly countless Clinton contributors received on Wednesday.

The former president has written a campaign solicitation for his wife with his usual impeccable timing: It's a week when tensions between Sen. Barack Obama's and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaigns have exploded over unkind comments about the Clintons from Hollywood producer and former Clinton -- now Obama -- contributor David Geffen.

It was exceptionally hard to find Bill Clinton campaigning for Al Gore in 2000, but now, he writes, "I can't wait to join Hillary on the campaign trail and talk to people about what a great president she's going to be."

"During eight years in the White House," he writes, "Hillary and I faced a constant barrage of attacks from Washington Republicans. No insult was off-limits. No tactic was too low." And the GOP never had David Geffen on its side.

Meanwhile, Bill Clinton wants to raise $1 million in a week for his candidate spouse.

So contribute -- or, in this case, cough it up!

No Guns in Cheney's Photo Shoot

Still haven't found the perfect calendar for 2007? How about the Republican National Committee's splendid offering? Eleven beautiful shots of President Bush as leader of the free world. Several show him with kids, babies, sharing a laugh with the troops, with Laura Bush at the White House and so on.

The August photo, however, features a fine shot of Vice President Cheney at his ranch in Wyoming, taken by White House photographer David Bohrer.

So why August? No, stop it. Not for the Pulitzer Prize-winning book "The Guns of August." And anyway, he shot his friend in the face in February -- a year ago. The picture was taken in August 2003.

Hurry, the calendar's on sale for $25.

You Say 'Extraordinary Rendition,' They Say 'Vacation'

Tired of snorkeling in the Caribbean? Skiiing in the Alps? Safaris in Africa? Then perhaps it's time for a truly different vacation. This just in from Agence France-Presse:

"A Polish travel firm said Thursday it was giving tourists a chance to follow in the footsteps of CIA agents and terror suspects near an alleged US detention centre in Poland's lakeland -- which the authorities deny exists.

"Visitors will be able to cycle and canoe near the Polish intelligence service's training centre . . . in the northern Mazuria region, and the nearby Szymany airport, Joanna Sobieska of Szarpie Travel was quoted as saying by the PAP news agency."

Just a seamless transition from stifling communism to creative capitalism.

Iran Sending In a New U.N. Ambassador

In the midst of building tensions between the United States and Iran, Tehran is withdrawing its long-serving ambassador to the United Nations, Javad Zarif. Iranian sources say Zarif, who has been a central figure in the negotiations over Iran's nuclear program, will be replaced by Mohammad Khazai, the deputy minister of economics. Khazai is no stranger to politics in the United States, having worked at the World Bank.

Zarif, who was sent to the United Nations when Mohammad Khatami was Iran's president, is due to leave in April. (There has been no Iranian ambassador to the United States since 1980, though there is a large interests section on Wisconsin Avenue

Balanced Reading for Political Book Clubs

An update on John R. Bolton's book on his days at the State Department and the United Nations: The former U.S. ambassador's book, "Surrender Is Not an Option: Defending America at the United Nations and Abroad," is to be published by Threshold Editions, which is the conservative publishing subsidiary of Simon & Schuster. (They've published Mary Cheney, Ed Gillespie, Al Regnery, Glenn Beck and other conservatives.) Bolton's book will be on sale Nov. 6 -- he'll be typing fast and aided by a daily diary -- and will naturally feature "no holds barred candor," take you "behind the scenes" and be "revealing," the publishing blurb says, all in 336 pages.

Also on the book front, this time from the left, a new one just out by Washington author Andrew Cockburn on former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld. This one, we are told, is "drawn from sources deep inside Washington, D.C." -- meaning folks who ride the Metro? -- and promises to be a "startling" exposé.

In a week in which Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said Rumsfeld "will go down as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history" -- presumably this ranking includes even Robert McNamara-- it seems Cockburn agrees. The book title offers a hint: "Rumsfeld: His Rise, Fall, and Catastrophic Legacy." Sounds a bit negative.

New Committee Chairman, New Horse for PAC to Back

Secretive Force At Center Of Tensions Between U.S., Iran (MCT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - A band of religious warriors that Iran's clerical rulers created to spread their country's Islamic Revolution has joined Iran's nuclear program at the center of the rising tensions between Washington and Tehran.

The Quds Force, a secretive overseas arm of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, has operatives in Iraq and Afghanistan; runs Shiite extremist networks in Asia, the Middle East, Africa, Latin America and Europe; trains and arms Hezbollah and other Shiite radicals in Iran and Lebanon; and funds the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group. Now it's arming Iraqi Shiite Muslims with armor-piercing bombs to use against American troops, according to U.S. officials.

Many experts now warn that if the U.S.-Iranian frictions over Iraq and Iran's nuclear program escalate into conflict, Tehran would use the Quds Force to launch terrorist attacks against U.S. and allied targets around the world.

"They are the brains behind those who are pulling the trigger," said one official, who requested anonymity because intelligence on the group is highly classified. "You are never going to see their fingerprints."

Iran denies that it's helping to kill U.S. soldiers in Iraq, and the Bush administration has refused to declassify the intelligence that it says proves the Quds Force is sending weapons to Iraqi militants. As a result, while it's clear that Iran is supporting Shiite groups in Iraq, both the extent and the intent of its meddling there are subjects of debate.

Five Iranian officials detained by U.S. forces in recent raids in Iraq are said to be Quds Force operatives, but some U.S. officials think the force isn't in Iraq to direct attacks on U.S. troops. The Iranians, they think, simply want to ensure that Iraq's Shiites prevail over the minority Sunnis, thereby ensuring peaceful relations with Iran.

The Quds force is well known to the world's intelligence agencies, but much about it remains unknown, including where it fits into Iran's deliberately complex and confusing power structure. One early attempt to diagram the power structure, by a Defense Intelligence Agency analyst in the 1980s, put "God" in the top box.

Although many intelligence services, including those of the United States, Israel and European and Arab nations, have been keeping tabs on its operatives - or at least trying to - for more than 20 years, the unit has been publicly accused of complicity in a terrorist attack only once. That was in the July 18, 1994, suicide bombing of a Jewish community center in Buenos Aires, which killed 85 people and injured 151.

The case was based in part on the testimony of Abdolhassem Masbahi, a former senior Iranian intelligence officer who defected to Turkey in 1995. An Argentine judge, acting at the request of special prosecutors, issued arrest warrants in November for former Iranian President Ali Akbar Rafsanjani and seven other Iranian officials, including Ahmad Vahidi, the Quds Force commander at the time of the bombing.

Experts say the force is a highly compartmentalized and disciplined contingent of several thousand men who are trained in espionage, military operations and political analysis, and it reports directly to supreme leader Ali Khamenei.

"It's like taking the CIA, special forces and the State Department and rolling them all into one," said the U.S. official.

DOJ_NMG_0135937

"These guys have been around for a very long time," said Daniel Byman, a former CIA analyst who's now a terrorism expert at The Brookings Institution, a centrist Washington policy organization. "We know they are nasty, and we know they are capable."

Its mission of exporting the Islamic Revolution has meant confronting Iran's main enemies, the United States and Israel, beginning in Lebanon 25 years ago.

Current and former U.S. officials said Revolutionary Guard members helped plan and organize the Hezbollah suicide bombings of the U.S. Embassy and Marine barracks in Beirut in 1983 and 1984, which killed more than 300 people, including 241 U.S. service personnel. Reconnaissance photographs of the Iranian headquarters near the town of Baalbek revealed a mockup of the unfinished defenses around the embassy annex and tire tracks where the bomber had rehearsed his mission.

The force also is believed to have been involved in recruiting and training the Shiite radicals who carried out the 1996 truck-bombing of the Khobar Towers housing complex in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia, which killed 19 U.S. servicemen and a Saudi.

Only now, however, has the United States confronted Iran over the force's activities.

"No administration wanted to take these people on," charged Robert Baer, a former covert CIA officer who served in the Middle East.

The unit's name, Persian for Jerusalem, reflects the Iranian goal of destroying Israel and liberating Islam's third holiest city. Its hostility toward the United States is reflected in its use of part of the former U.S. Embassy compound in Tehran, where 52 Americans were held hostage for 444 days between 1979 and 1980, U.S. intelligence officials said.

The force was formally constituted in 1990 as the foreign operations arm of the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, a military organization with its own air, land and sea forces that's separate from the regular Iranian military, whose main mission is protecting the ruling ayatollahs.

Hagel Says Diplomacy Is Best Option For Iran (FT)

By Josh Funk

Fremont (NE) Tribune, February 23, 2007

KEARNEY, Neb. - U.S. Sen. Chuck Hagel said Thursday that Iran should be held accountable for supporting terrorists through "wise statecraft" instead of military force, and America should be careful not to follow the "same destructive path" it did in Iraq.

The Nebraska Republican, who is still considering a 2008 presidential run, spoke at the University of Nebraska at Kearney's James E. Smith Conference on World Affairs.

Hagel said the United States must carefully consider any action against Iran in the wake of Thursday's report that Iran refused to comply with U.N. Security Council demands to curtail its nuclear program and suspend uranium enrichment.

"In a hazy, hair-triggered environment, careless rhetoric and military movements that one side may believe are required to demonstrate resolve and strength ... can be misinterpreted as preparations for military options," Hagel said. "The risk of inadvertent conflict because of miscalculation is great."

Middle East expert Steven Cook said Hagel is saying the Bush administration is wrong, and Iran needs to be engaged.

"Basically this is a polite, yet firm critique of the Bush administration policy with regard to Iran," said Cook, who is with the nonpartisan Council on Foreign Relations.

Cook said Hagel's speech appears related to his political aspirations.

"I think he's really trying to stake out a difference between himself and the other Republican contenders," Cook said.

Someone asked Hagel about his presidential aspirations during a question period after his speech.

"I'll make a decision on my political future in the next few weeks," Hagel said.

During his speech, Hagel said part of the problem in U.S.-Iran relations is that neither country understands the other very well. Hagel said complex factors inside Iran can affect the situation, and not all of Iran is against the United States.

Two-thirds of Iran's population is younger than 30, Hagel said, and many of those Iranians have positive attitudes about America.

"We do not want to lose this pro-American generation by turning them away from us," Hagel said. "They are the hope of Iran. They bristle under the heavy yoke of the ayatollahs' strident limitations of personal freedom."

He said the recent success of six-party talks about North Korea's nuclear program should serve as a model for talks with Iran.

"The United States must employ similar, wise statecraft to redirect deepening Middle East tensions toward a higher ground of resolution," Hagel said.

And diplomacy is likely to be much more productive than military action in Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0135938

"A U.S. military conflict with Iran would inflame the Middle East and global Muslim populations, crippling U.S. security, political, economic and strategic interests worldwide," Hagel said.

Hagel, who attended UNK when it was Kearney State College, used part of his speech to offer his audience of mostly college students a history lesson on conflict in the Middle East. And he said the United States should pay attention to that history because it affects current events.

"Forces and events in the Middle East cannot be neatly categorized. The swirl of Middle East history creates layers upon layers of complexity," Hagel said. "There is little transparency in the Middle East. That is a reality that is inescapable and cannot be assumed away.

"To ignore this reality is to risk being trapped by false choices _ false choices such as the question, "Which is worse: Iran with nuclear weapons or war with Iran?" Hagel said.

Iran Misses Another Deadline (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

Conspiracy theorists may soon have to add another name to Dick Cheney's secret cabal planning war with Iran: Mohamed ElBaradei.

At least that's what a wag might say after the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) speculated this week in an interview with the Financial Times that Iran might be as close as six months from developing an industrial-scale uranium enrichment facility of 3,000 centrifuges. That kind of capability would put Iran on track to produce sufficient fissile uranium for a nuclear bomb by the fall of 2008.

Mr. ElBaradei also noted that "even if the Iranian [nuclear] program is for peaceful purposes, there is no question that at the back of their minds this is a deterrent." Let's underscore the words "even if." The Director General has until now been remarkably cautious in his pronouncements on Iran's intentions. But his comments this week are a remarkable, if implicit, admission that Iran might have other uses for enriched uranium than turning on lights.

These comments also coincide with Iran's decision to flout yet another U.N. deadline to suspend enrichment. According to the IAEA report on Iran, released yesterday, not only have the Iranians continued to enrich, they have also failed to offer further information on some of the outstanding questions in their nuclear file. One such question concerns the source of some highly enriched (read, bomb-grade) uranium particles found in Iran by IAEA inspectors.

So what does the international community now intend to do? Belying his own forecasts as a U.N. technocrat, Mr. ElBaradei ventured a political opinion that any military strikes against Iran would be "catastrophic, counterproductive." So much for him being a neocon shill. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice after meeting with her Russian, German and EU counterparts in Berlin, could only say that she "confirmed that we will use our available channels and the Security Council to try and achieve that goal."

Ms. Rice shouldn't hold her breath. The Security Council could barely agree in December to sanction a handful of companies and individuals directly implicated in Iran's nuclear and ballistic-missile programs. And as these columns reported Tuesday, the level of European commercial investment in Iran has grown briskly since its secret nuclear programs were exposed in 2003, with an estimated 10,000 jobs in Germany alone dependent on exports to Iran. Moral courage on that front may be expecting too much.

Ultimately, whatever hope there might be of resolving the Iranian issue through diplomacy is going to require compromises by the Iranians themselves. Here's what Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had to say about that: "If we shut down other activities for 10 years and the country only focuses on nuclear energy it will be worth it because if we obtain this energy our people will advance as much as 50 years."

Maybe it's time the rest of us start taking Mr. Ahmadinejad at his word, and tailoring our expectations accordingly.

What Scares Iran's Mullahs? (NYT)

By Abbas Milani

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

Stanford, Calif.

IRAN has once again defied the United Nations by proceeding with enrichment activities, the International Atomic Energy Agency reported yesterday. And yet, simultaneously, Iranian officials have been sending a very different message — one that has gone largely unremarked but merits close attention.

After a meeting with the supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the leader's chief foreign policy adviser, Ali Akbar Velayati, declared last week that suspending uranium enrichment is not a red line for the regime — in other words, the mullahs might be ready to agree to some kind of a suspension. Another powerful insider, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, said much the same thing in a different setting, while a third high-ranking official acknowledged that the Islamic Republic is seriously considering a proposal by President Vladimir Putin of Russia to suspend enrichment at least long enough to start serious negotiations with the United Nations.

There have also been indications that the Iranians are willing to accept a compromise plan presented by Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency. That plan calls for the suspension of all major enrichment activities but allows the regime to save face by keeping a handful of centrifuges in operation.

The mullahs are keen on damage control on another front as well. After his meeting with Ayatollah Khamenei, Mr. Velayati announced that the Holocaust is a fact of history and chastised those who question its reality. Ali Larijani, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, also declared the Holocaust a "historical matter" to be discussed by scholars (and not, he implied, by ignorant politicians). In short, there is a new willingness among the Iranian political elite to avoid the rhetoric of confrontation and to negotiate.

There are three ways to analyze this turn. Advocates of an American invasion of Iran say that last month's strengthening of the American armada in the Persian Gulf has frightened the Iranian regime. What diplomacy could not do for years, a few destroyers did in less than a month. These advocates encourage more of the same, hoping either that the mullahs will accept defeat in the face of an imminent attack, or that a Gulf of Tonkin incident will lead to a full attack on Iran's nuclear facilities.

A second camp attacks the build-up of the armada as dangerous saber-rattling at best, and at worst as camouflage for already settled plans to attack Iran's nuclear sites. Such an attack, they say, might provide a much-needed feather for President Bush's empty cap at a time when his Middle East policy has manifestly failed. According to this camp, what changed the minds of Iranian officials was only the United Nations resolution threatening economic sanctions, and the possibility of other resolutions and more serious sanctions.

Both camps are partly right and yet dangerously wrong. There is a third way of looking at the facts.

The mullahs have historically shown an unfailing ability to smell out and, when pragmatic, succumb to credible power in their foes. Indeed, the presence of the American ships has helped encourage them to negotiate. But no less clear is the fact that the mullahs' attitude change began in late December, when the United Nations Security Council finally passed a resolution against the regime in Tehran.

The passage of the resolution hastened the demise of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's confrontational approach to the West. And the falling price of oil, leading to declining revenues for the regime, magnified the resolution's economic impact. Top leaders of the Islamic Republic, from Ayatollah Khamenei to Mr. Rafsanjani, have made it clear that they consider sanctions a serious threat — more serious, according to Mr. Rafsanjani, than the possibility of an invasion.

In other words, what the unilateral and increasingly quixotic American embargo could not do in more than a decade, a limited United Nations resolution has accomplished in less than a month. And the resolution succeeded because few things frighten the mullahs more than the prospect of confronting a united front made up of the European Union, Russia, China and the United States. The resolution was a manifestation of just such a united front.

While the combination of credible force, reduced oil prices and a United Nations resolution has worked to create the most favorable conditions yet for a negotiated solution to the nuclear crisis, any unilateral American attack on Iran is sure to backfire. It will break the international coalition against the Islamic Republic's nuclear adventurism; it will allow China, Russia and even some countries in Europe to legitimately side with the mullahs; it will lead to higher oil prices and an increase in Iranian government revenues; and finally, it will help revive the waning power of the warmongers in Tehran.

Those convinced that only the combination of credible might and diplomatic pressure will work worry rightly that the Bush administration, frustrated by its failures in Iraq and goaded by hawks in Washington, will do to Iran what it did to Iraq. In confronting Saddam Hussein and the threat of his weapons of mass destruction, the Bush administration insisted that amassing an armada in the Persian Gulf was necessary to frighten Mr. Hussein into submission. But once the armada was in place, they used it to carry out a long-ago planned invasion of Iraq.

Today, many worry that the plans for an invasion of Iran, too, were made long ago, and that the armada is there to make possible either another Gulf of Tonkin resolution or an Iranian act of provocation against American forces, which could then serve as an excuse for an attack on Iran.

War and peace with Iran are both possible today. With prudence, backed by power but guided by the wisdom to recognize the new signals coming from Tehran, the United States can today achieve a principled solution to the nuclear crisis. Congress, vigilant American citizens and a resolute policy from America's European allies can ensure that this principled peace is given a chance.

Signals From Tehran (WP)

By David Ignatius
The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

The title of the two-page Iranian document is "Gentlemen's Agreement." In convoluted English, it lists 11 points of understanding supposedly reached in September between Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani and his European counterpart, Javier Solana, on a temporary, partial, not-quite suspension of uranium enrichment.

What's interesting isn't the purported agreement -- Solana's spokeswoman, Cristina Gallach, insists there wasn't one -- but the fact that the Iranians are circulating the document and signaling through various channels that they want to restart dialogue. Indeed, when Larijani met Solana in Munich this month, "he expressed the willingness to resume talks to prepare final negotiations," according to a source close to Solana.

"We're getting pinged all over the world by Iranians wanting to talk to us," Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said in an interview yesterday. The problem, says Burns, is that the Iranians haven't yet said the "magic word," which is that they will actually suspend enrichment in exchange for the suspension of U.N. sanctions.

With Iran still publicly defying the United Nations over its nuclear program, the United States and its allies agreed yesterday to tighten the pressure another notch by preparing a second U.N. Security Council resolution with additional sanctions. Burns said Russia and China agreed to back the new resolution in a meeting yesterday with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. "It may not be substantially stronger, but it will be stronger," said Burns, who will travel to London on Monday to negotiate the details of the new resolution.

U.S. and European officials think Iran's new interest in negotiations is a sign that pressure on Tehran is working. The campaign includes the initial U.N. sanctions resolution, which shook the Iranians because it was backed by Russia and China; tough U.S. banking sanctions, accompanied by a successful Treasury Department push to dissuade European and Japanese banks from lending to Iran; and calculated muscle-flexing by the Bush administration, which has sent an additional aircraft carrier task force to the Persian Gulf and seized Iranian operatives inside Iraq.

"We are hopeful that all these pressure points will influence the internal debate in Iran," says Burns. And they appear to be doing just that.

The multipronged squeeze on Tehran surprised President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and other Iranian officials, who seemed confident when I visited the country in September that they were in the driver's seat and that it was the United States that was weakened and isolated. "We knocked them off stride and put them on the defensive," argues Burns. A British official who follows the issue closely agrees: "The Iranians have moved from cockiness to division and nervousness."

Western officials see various signs of an altered political balance in Tehran: public criticism of Ahmadinejad's management of the economy by former president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani; a letter challenging the president's economic policy signed by 150 members of the Iranian parliament; criticism of Ahmadinejad's handling of the nuclear issue by former members of the Iranian negotiating team and by a hard-line newspaper; and now new signals from Larijani and others that Iran wants to resume the preliminary negotiations it broke off last year.

"The financial sanctions have had a real impact," says the British official. "They lead to a general insecurity about economic viability."

So does all this mean it's time to go back to the bargaining table? Not yet, say a number of U.S. and European officials. They insist that the Iranians must stop haggling and agree to quit enriching uranium. Russian officials told me in Moscow last week that President Vladimir Putin passed the message to a top Iranian emissary this month that Tehran must agree to a "timeout" in enriching uranium if it wants to settle the nuclear issue.

The Iranians continue to dicker, in what Western officials regard as a tactical ploy to get out of trouble. Their efforts center on paragraph eight of the "Gentlemen's Agreement" their officials have been circulating. That part of the document proposes that if U.N. sanctions are lifted, Iran would agree to a two-month period "during which Iran in a voluntary and non-binding and temporary move avoids installation of next cascades" for enrichment. In other words, the Iranians wouldn't add additional centrifuges that would allow industrial-scale enrichment but would continue spinning their modest initial cascade of centrifuges.

No deal, say U.S. and European officials. The only way the Iranians can escape sanctions is to suspend enrichment and sit down at the table. If they do so, an array of goodies awaits. Meanwhile, the strategy of confrontation continues, and U.S. and European officials -- who haven't had much to cheer about recently -- seem confident that it's working.

'Long Way' To Go In North Korea Nuclear Pact: US (AFP)

By Stephen Collinson
AFP, February 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135941

The United States said Thursday there was a "long way to go" to implement a landmark North Korea nuclear deal, and warned tough talks loom on Pyongyang's suspected secret uranium enrichment program.

US Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill defended the deal with the isolated and impoverished Stalinist state which emerged from exhaustive six-nation talks in Beijing last week.

"I think there is a real sense among all the parties that we have a process going. We are very mindful of the fact that we have a long way to go," Hill said at a briefing at the Brookings Institution think-tank.

Hill lavished praise on China for its role in brokering the deal, and confirmed that if things go smoothly, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Beijing in April as required by the deal for talks with her North Korean counterpart and ministers from the other parties to the negotiations: China, Russia, Japan, and South Korea.

The deal, which binds North Korea to shut key nuclear facilities in exchange for energy aid, requires Pyongyang to produce a list of all its nuclear programs.

"We will face the problem -- in fact, the very serious problem -- of the highly enriched uranium program," Hill said,

Hill said the North Koreans had never acknowledged US accusations they had a program to manufacture highly enriched uranium (HEU) for nuclear bombs, but added that the United States had information North Korea had bought equipment consistent with plans for such a scheme.

"But they have been willing to discuss what we know and to try to resolve this ... to mutual satisfaction," he said.

"We don't know whether we're going to be able to do that, but we have agreed to have this discussion."

The United States accused North Korea in October 2002 of hiding a program to produce HEU, and the ensuing showdown sent relations back into the Cold War deep-freeze, ultimately resulting in the rupture of a 1994 deal which froze the Stalinist state's plutonium-based nuclear program.

Officials in Seoul this week warned Pyongyang must disable all programs under the six-party deal.

Critics have complained the pact does not directly address North Korea's existing plutonium nuclear bombs, or its suspected HEU program.

Hill heaped praise on China for hosting the six-party talks.

"I do believe that we have been able to synchronize our goals," Hill said.

"I think we're also synchronizing not only the goals, but also the strategy and in many respects the tactics themselves, so we've really come together with them on this."

"If we're successful with all of this, our plan is to then have a ministerial where US Secretary of State Condi Rice will go out to Beijing and she will meet with her other five counterparts, including the North Korean minister of foreign affairs, and review the first 60 days," Hill said.

Hill's remarks came a day after Washington said US Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte will travel to major Asian capitals next week for talks likely to focus on the nuclear deal.

Vice President Dick Cheney meanwhile wrapped up a visit to Japan, offering to support Tokyo on the emotionally charged issue of resolving North Korean kidnappings of Japanese citizens, which has cast a shadow over the nuclear deal.

Economically crippled North Korea has agreed to start disabling its nuclear facilities in exchange for badly needed energy aid.

It agreed to close and seal its Yongbyon reactor -- long suspected to be the centre of its nuclear program -- within 60 days and admit UN nuclear inspectors in return for 50,000 tonnes of heavy fuel oil.

Further steps to disable nuclear facilities would be rewarded with up to 950,000 tons of heavy oil or other aid, while Washington also agreed to discuss removing North Korea from a list of state sponsors of terrorism and begin talks on normalizing relations.

Hill Warns N Korea On Deadlines (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, February 23, 2007

North Korea must stick to the tight deadlines of the new deal to freeze its Yongbyon nuclear facility in exchange for a modest amount of fuel oil, Christopher Hill, the US negotiator at the six-party nuclear talks, said on Thursday.

Describing the 60-day deadline agreed to on February 13 as “very short” and one that required a “considerable amount of negotiation”, Mr Hill conceded that potentially serious sticking points lay ahead.

Mr Hill stressed that the shutting down of Yongbyon and the return of international inspectors within 60 days was just the first step of a much longer process. The ultimate goal, which North Korea signed up to in September 2005, is denuclearisation of the Korean peninsula in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

During the first 60 days, in which North Korea is to receive 50,000 tonnes of fuel oil for its depleted power stations, Pyongyang has also committed to discussing a list of all its nuclear programmes, and to later provide a complete declaration.

Mr Hill anticipated "problems" with that declaration, noting that North Korea had refused to acknowledge the existence of what the US alleges is a secret uranium enrichment programme. However he also indicated that the US did not believe Pyongyang had mastered the enrichment process.

North Korea carried out an underground test explosion last October and is believed to have enough reprocessed plutonium for some eight to 10 bombs.

North Korea's demand to be taken off the US list of state sponsors of terrorism would take "some time", Mr Hill said.

Foreign ministers of the six nations, which also include hosts China, South Korea, Japan and Russia, are to meet in Beijing in April to review any progress.

Within 30 days, the US and North Korea are to set up a bilateral working group to start discussions on normalising relations. Mr Hill made clear that process would only conclude when North Korea had dismantled its entire nuclear programme.

Nuke Timeline Key To Successful Deal (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

The top U.S. negotiator on North Korea said yesterday that the United States will insist on strict deadlines to keep a step-by-step deal to end the North's nuclear-weapons programs from unraveling as did a similar deal negotiated under the Clinton administration.

Christopher R. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian Affairs, said North Korea must shut down its nuclear site at Yongbyon and allow United Nations inspectors back into the country by mid-April under the deal struck at the six-party talks in Beijing 10 days ago.

Also by that date, a series of working groups -- including a bilateral one on U.S.-North Korean relations and one on promised food and fuel aid for Pyongyang -- are supposed to be up and running. The U.S. government also has promised to wrap up an 18-month investigation of a Chinese bank that was a crucial conduit for the North's meager hard currency reserves.

"Above all, everyone is agreed that we need to avoid missing deadlines," Mr. Hill told a packed room yesterday in a briefing at the Brookings Institution think tank.

"When you start missing deadline, it's like the theory about a broken window," Mr. Hill said. "If one window isn't repaired, before you know it, you'll have a lot of broken windows and nobody cares."

The agreement was signed by representatives from the United States, North and South Korea, Russia, Japan and China. Beijing hosted the talks and provided crucial behind-the-scenes diplomacy to make the deal, Mr. Hill said.

China's decision to back U.N. resolutions condemning Pyongyang for a missile test last summer and a nuclear bomb test in October "really got the attention of North Korea," he added.

U.S. critics of the deal, including former U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton, have criticized the agreement as a replay of the 1994 Agreed Framework, negotiated by the Clinton administration to head off an earlier North Korean nuclear crisis. Pyongyang proceeded with a secret nuclear-weapons program despite the promises of energy and aid in the 1994 deal.

Mr. Hill said that this time, China and all of the North's neighbors were parties to the deal, making it harder for Pyongyang to walk away. The six-party agreement also is far more ambitious, he said, calling for the eventual elimination of the North's nuclear-weapons programs and normalization of relations with the United States.

But Mr. Hill said he was "not taking a victory lap yet," because the Beijing accord left some major questions unanswered.

Among them: the fate of the North's existing stock of nuclear bombs -- estimated at four to 12 -- and of the 50 kilotons of plutonium Pyongyang is thought to have on hand to make more bombs. The North still has to provide a detailed list of all its nuclear sites that will be dismantled.

The State Department envoy also conceded that major uncertainties remain about the North's plans to use highly enriched uranium to fuel nuclear bombs. The Bush administration cited Pyongyang's admission in 2002 that it had a secret uranium program as a reason to break off the Agreed Framework deal for good.

Pyongyang has secretly bought some equipment consistent with an enriched uranium program, but there are some "considerable production techniques that we're not sure whether they have mastered," Mr. Hill said.

N. Korea Nuclear Deal Rife With Benefits (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0135943

By Barry Schweid
AP, February 23, 2007

The breakthrough nuclear agreement with North Korea could pay wide-ranging dividends for all sides, especially in the area of already improving U.S. relations with China and America's allies, chief U.S. negotiator Christopher Hill said Thursday.

Other side benefits might include a peace treaty formally ending the war on the Korean peninsula after more than a half-century, a cut in the force of 25,000 U.S. troops in South Korea, a better life for impoverished North Koreans and the State Department's declassifying of the North as a sponsor of terror, Hill said in remarks at the Brookings Institution, a liberal-oriented think tank.

The U.S. negotiator said he plans to meet with North Korean counterparts within 30 days to work on these issues and a schedule for North Korea to go beyond its commitment last week in six-sided negotiations in Beijing to seal its main nuclear reactor and permit international inspection.

In return, Pyongyang is due to receive 50,000 tons of heavy fuel oil and ultimately another 950,000 tons in fuel if it completely abandons its nuclear weapons program.

"We are very mindful we have a long way to go," Hill said.

For one thing, he said, Pyongyang must provide a complete list of programs to be put out of commission.

Conservatives have blasted the agreement, which was considered a breakthrough after months of deadlock and bickering, as naive and worse. They say it rewards North Korea for bad behavior and sets a terrible precedent for Iran, another country with which the U.S. is locked in a nuclear standoff.

Former U.N. Ambassador John Bolton said in an interview that the North Korean regime "is not going to give up something so central to its survival as nuclear weapons."

North Korea is known to have tried to acquire aluminum tubes from Germany and "made certain purchases of equipment which is entirely consistent with a highly enriched uranium program," he said.

The agreement already has strengthened U.S. relations with China and South Korea, Hill said. China wants "clarity" from North Korea on abandoning its weapons program and, "We really have lined up our interests with them," Hill said.

Further closing ranks on all fronts, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is planning to meet with the foreign ministers of the five other countries in April in Beijing. They are North Korea, China, South Korea, Japan and Russia.

In a parallel move, Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte will make a trip early next month to Japan, South Korea and China. The State Department has ruled out a stop in Pyongyang by Rice's new top deputy.

Hill stressed that North Korea has not yet made a commitment to abandon its entire program.

"They're going to make decisions to move on a step- by-step basis. And as they move one step, they will look back and say, 'This is a better place than we were in yesterday.' And that will encourage them to take still another step," Hill said.

Meanwhile, he said, North Korea is very interested in getting off the State Department list of terror sponsors.

"We are prepared to begin that process, with the understanding it's going to take some time. ... We need some answers from them," he said.

A peace treaty to replace an armistice and formally end the Korean war is not technically a six-party issue. Hill said he assumes China, the United States, North Korea and South Korea would meet to resolve the issue. If they do, different ways may be found to maintain peace on the peninsula, a task undertaken since the war by U.S. troops.

"Our guiding star," Hill said, is "we want to maintain the security and the stability that we've maintained all these years."

Top Democratic Hopefuls' Bickering Puts Focus On Candor And Personal Behavior (WSJ)

CHARACTER RISES as top issue in early presidential skirmishing.

Criticism by media mogul Geffen, a onetime ally of Bill and Hillary Clinton, underscores concerns among Democrats that controversies over candor and personal behavior could embroil 2008 ticket. Clinton team's attack on Geffen's new favorite, Obama, aimed to quash such discussion, but a top adviser laments that the tactic "gave it too much attention."

One academic expert on political combat calls Obama camp's feisty response worth risks to his "above politics" stance. "Real political change requires ... attacks to show what is wrong," says Vanderbilt's John Geer, author of "In Defense of Negativity."

House leaders expect the bill, which would end workplace secret ballots to determine union status, to pass with 20 or more Republicans joining majority Democrats. U.S. Chamber's political director, Bill Miller, denounces the attack on "a function of democracy."

Neither side expects the bill to garner the 60 votes needed to clear Senate procedural votes before passage, and the Bush administration has signaled a potential veto in any case. The two parties plan to use the issue to rally their bases for the 2008 elections.

NKorea Official To US For Talks: Sources (AFP)

AFP, February 23, 2007

North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator will visit New York early next month to follow up the multinational agreement on scrapping his country's nuclear programmes, sources said Friday.

Kim Kye-Gwan was expected to take part in a working group meeting on normalising US-North Korea relations, a source told Yonhap news agency.

"No date has been set for his visit but it is likely to last from March 5 through 7," the source said.

An official who spoke to AFP on condition of anonymity confirmed Kim would go to New York in early March but said he was unsure of the reason.

"It is probably for the purpose of the joint working group but no date has been set for that meeting," the official said.

At six-nation talks in Beijing on February 13 the communist state agreed to shut down and then disable its nuclear facilities in phases. In return it will receive up to one million tons of heavy fuel oil or equivalent economic aid.

As part of the deal the United States and North Korea agreed to start talking about establishing full diplomatic relations. Five working groups are due to meet within 30 days to start planning how to implement it.

Yonhap said Kim, a vice-foreign minister, is expected to hold talks with his US counterpart Christopher Hill in New York.

Hill cautioned Thursday there was a "long way to go" to implement the deal and said tough talks lie ahead on a suspected uranium enrichment project which Washington believes Pyongyang is concealing.

He said the North Koreans had never acknowledged such a programme. "But they have been willing to discuss what we know and to try to resolve this."

Critics have complained the Beijing pact does not directly address North Korea's existing plutonium stockpile or nuclear bombs, or its suspected uranium programme.

US Vice President Dick Cheney said Friday in Australia that the deal was a hopeful step towards a better future for the North Korean people.

But he added: "We go into this deal with our eyes open. In light of North Korea's missile tests last July, its nuclear test in October and its record of proliferation and human rights abuses, the regime in Pyongyang has much to prove."

Cheney Criticizes China's Arms Buildup (AP)

By Rohan Sullivan

AP, February 23, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney said Friday that China's recent anti-satellite weapons test and a rapid military buildup were "not consistent" with its stated aim of a peaceful rise as a global power.

Speaking in Sydney, Cheney also expressed wariness about North Korea's commitment to a landmark deal announced last week on ending the country's nuclear programs.

As anti-war demonstrators clashed with police outside the hotel where Cheney was speaking, the vice president also expressed gratitude to Australia for sending troops to the Iraq war, which he said must be won or terrorists would be emboldened worldwide.

Cheney praised China for playing an "especially important" role in the six-nation negotiations that resulted in the North Korea deal, under which the North is to seal its main nuclear reactor and allow international inspections in exchange for fuel oil.

"Other actions by the Chinese government send a different message," Cheney told the Australian-American Leadership Dialogue, a private organization that promotes ties between the two countries.

"Last month's anti-satellite test, China's continued fast-paced military buildup are less constructive and are not consistent with China's stated goal of a peaceful rise," he said.

The Chinese Foreign Ministry did not immediately respond to a faxed request for comment on Cheney's remarks. Many government offices were closed Friday for the weeklong Lunar New Year holiday.

Beijing previously said its Jan. 11 destruction of a defunct weather satellite was for scientific purposes, but the test was widely criticized as a provocative demonstration of China's growing military clout.

Washington and key Asian allies such as Japan say the test — which made China only the third nation after the United States and Russia to use weapons beyond the atmosphere — undermined efforts to keep weapons out of space. Beijing countered by saying the United States is blocking a possible global treaty that would ban weapons in space.

China's military has grown rapidly along with its economy in recent years, prompting concern in Washington that the balance of military power in the Pacific could start to shift away from the United States.

Regarding the North Korea deal, Cheney said it represented "a first hopeful step" that would "bring us closer" to a nuclear-free Korean peninsula — but he also sounded a note of caution.

"We go into this deal with our eyes open," he said. "In light of North Korea's missile test last July, its nuclear test in October and its record of proliferation and human rights abuses, the regime in Pyongyang has much to prove."

Washington and key Asian allies such as Japan have expressed concern that China's Jan. 11 firing of a missile at a defunct weather satellite — making it only the third nation after the United States and Russia to use weapons beyond the Earth's atmosphere — undermined efforts to keep weapons out of space. China says the test was for scientific purposes.

Also, China said in late December it was strengthening its military to thwart any attempt by Taiwan to push for independence, but vowed that it was committed to the peaceful development of its 2.3 million-strong military, the world's largest.

Cheney praised Prime Minister John Howard, who sent 2,000 troops to join the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, saying Australians had won the respect of the world through their support of the fight against terror.

He said that if the U.S.-led coalition leaves Iraq before domestic forces can handle security, radical factions would battle for control, and the violence would spread throughout the country and beyond.

"Having tasted victory in Iraq, jihadists would look for new missions," joining the Taliban fighting in Afghanistan and spreading "sorrow and discord" across the Middle East and further afield, he said.

"Such chaos and mounting danger does not have to occur, it is however the enemy's objective," Cheney said. "For the sake of our own long-term security, we have a duty to stand in their way."

DOJ_NMG_0135946

Outside, protesters waved placards saying "Go home Cheney" and "Bring the troops home." Three people were arrested as police clashed with about 50 demonstrators. Ten people were arrested at a similar demonstration shortly before Cheney arrived in Australia late Thursday.

Cheney was to hold talks Saturday with Howard, a staunch ally of Washington who has become a rarity by offering more, not fewer, troops for Iraq and Afghanistan.

Iraq, Afghanistan and North Korea are expected to dominate the talks with Howard, who is under increasing political pressure to set an exit strategy for the 1,400 Australian troops who remain in and around Iraq.

Among the protesters in Sydney on Friday was former Guantanamo Bay detainee Mamdouh Habib, who called for the release of the lone Australian still held at the U.S. naval base at Cuba, David Hicks. A group of three men held a counter-protest nearby with a banner reading: "The world needs more men like Dick Cheney — we love America."

Cheney and Howard are expected to discuss Hicks, a former kangaroo skinner captured in Afghanistan who has been locked up without trial at Guantanamo for more than five years.

Under growing public pressure, and with Hicks looming as an issue at elections due later this year, Howard has begun pushing U.S. officials to deal with Hicks' case more quickly.

VOA Says Goodbye To Uzbek, Other Tongues (WP)

By Delphine Schrank

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Back home on a farm in Uzbekistan, Navbahor Imamova's mother and siblings crowd around their cranky, Soviet-made radio and tune in daily to Voice of America broadcasts in Uzbek. Though frequently scrambled by Chinese martial music, the VOA journalist said, the broadcast is her family's chief source of credible, uncensored foreign news in the authoritarian Central Asian country.

But that source is due to be silenced. For the second year running, the board overseeing the government-funded VOA has plans to wipe out news in several languages, including its flagship English-language "News Now" programming.

"This is big," said Imamova, one of seven people who put together the Uzbek service from Washington. "It's not a secret that Uzbekistan is one of the most politically oppressed countries. There's not a single outlet that can call itself independent there."

The Broadcast Board of Governors, which oversees VOA and six other government-funded international broadcasters, said this month that the cutbacks are being made in an effort to shift resources to new technology and "critical audiences" in the Middle East, North Korea, Somalia and Cuba.

"The current budget climate requires that we utilize our funds to effectively adapt to changing viewing habits and new technology, and respond to the nation's most immediate and vital national security challenges," the board said in a statement.

The board's $668.2 million budget request calls for a 3.8 percent increase from its anticipated fiscal 2007 level. The increase would fund the expansion of programming to North Korea, Iran, Afghanistan and Pakistan, as well as to the Arab-language satellite network Alhurra TV and its pop music and news counterpart, Radio Sawa.

Board spokesman Larry Hart said the decision to scrap the services largely reflects their diminishing audiences. "The world has changed, and our independent surveys show year after year that fewer and fewer people use shortwave radio," Hart said. "Now, that differs dramatically in different parts of the world. But satellite TV, FM radio and the Internet are the way of the future."

VOA employees and advocates counter that their programming is a model of open media and a crucial source of trustworthy news and information for decision makers and influential figures worldwide, a demographic that is difficult to quantify.

Since VOA's inaugural radio broadcast into Nazi Germany 65 years ago, the network has expanded into television and across the globe, and in its heyday, it carried programming in more than 50 languages. In the past few years, services were cut in 10 former Soviet bloc countries that have since joined the European Union. Other services have come and gone only to appear again.

VOA advocates and employees said that among the more dire changes being planned is elimination of "News Now," which feeds the broadcaster's 45 language services and includes reports from Washington and around the world. VOA would continue to offer Web-based English-language content, as well as English to sub-Saharan Africa and news for listeners with a limited English vocabulary.

"This is the VOA. Everything else is patterned on it. This has been our identity since 1942," said Neil Currie, a senior anchor with "News Now" and 23-year veteran of the agency. The English-language program has already suffered the effects of drastic cuts, he said, with staff whittled down in the past two years from more than 50 people to 14. Broadcasts have been reduced dramatically. On Sundays, Currie said, he is alone in the VOA newsroom putting together hours' worth of news.

"It is very hard to think of a parallel to killing the English-language services of VOA America. I can't think of an analogy absurd enough," said Sanford J. Ungar, president of Goucher College in Maryland and VOA's director from 1999 to 2001. "Would Radio Moscow stop broadcasting in Russian? Would Radio Beijing stop broadcasting in Chinese? Radio France in French? The BBC in English?"

Alan L. Heil Jr., a former deputy director of VOA and author of "Voice of America: A History," said, "We need Voice of America more than ever, and yet here we are silencing ourselves on radio." For Heil, the plan is particularly shortsighted when English is spoken by more than a quarter of the world's population and when Russia, China, Iran and al-Jazeera are expanding their TV and Internet programming in English.

Based on figures from the research group InterMedia Survey Institute, Heil calculated that total audience losses worldwide under the budget plan could run to 18.5 million listeners, with 10.5 million lost for the English broadcasts alone.

But Hart, the broadcast board's spokesman, said the priority is to use the limited funds available to target information-deprived indigenous speakers in their own languages, rather than English-speakers traveling abroad. "People who are information-deprived or who don't have access to satellite TV or who don't have hookups to the BBC or CNN -- they don't speak English, and those are the people we need to reach," he said.

Ungar, who was director of VOA when it started offering 24-hour news on the Internet, does not dispute the value of new technology. "But VOA radio is a great bargain," he said. "It costs so little to do it, and is vastly less expensive than TV."

Advocates say shortwave radio should hardly be dismissed as an anachronism. Battery-operated radios are cheap and easy to procure worldwide. Not so with satellite TVs or even Internet service, both of which can be blocked more easily and efficiently than shortwave frequencies. And unlike FM, which transmits up to 75 miles, shortwave can be broadcast over vast distances.

VOA advocates contend that the broadcast board has opted to bulldoze the agency rather than explore alternatives, including asking for greater appropriations to cover the cost of the doomed services, which come to $22 million, or about 3.5 percent of the budget.

For Imamova, the broadcaster in the Uzbek service, the plan is devastating. "VOA Uzbek is the only source of U.S. and international news in the region. It is a critical service," especially in light of a crackdown on news media in Uzbekistan, she said, adding that her comments reflect her personal views.

The Uzbek government has crippled reception of the multimedia service, which costs VOA $600,000 a year and also reaches Kazakhstan, Tajikistan and parts of China. But researcher InterMedia also notes the likelihood of a significant audience undercount because of respondent wariness in the country.

But virtually all the countries listed for eliminations are critical, Heil said. Russian President Vladimir Putin "could pull the plug on TV any day, the Balkans are something of a tinderbox with the Kosovo crisis coming to a head, and Tibetan services are absolutely critical in a country with no other independent information."

"You have to keep up with new technology, but at the same time you need a measured approach to keep your audience base," Heil added. "The stronger you are as a news gatherer, the closer you come to fulfilling VOA's mission: 'The news may be good. The news may be bad. We shall tell you the truth.' "

Europeans' Chill Deepens On US Policy (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, February 23, 2007

The resignation of Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi underscores the difficulty in Europe of governments trying to support US foreign policy on terror while at the same time pleasing their own publics.

Mr. Prodi, who has been in office less than a year, stepped down Wednesday after he was unable to convince his parliament of the "profound difference" between sending Italian troops to Afghanistan and sending them to Iraq. Italy currently deploys 1,950 troops in Afghanistan as part of a NATO mission of some 30,000 soldiers from European states.

The Prodi drama came hours after Britain and Denmark announced the start of troop withdrawals from Iraq – a blow to the White House as it deploys an additional 21,000 soldiers to stabilize Baghdad. In a further departure from perfect alignment with US policy in the Middle East, British prime minister Tony Blair also said this week that he will consider dealing with the Palestinian group Hamas as part of a new "national unity" government in the occupied territories.

European capitals are wavering over how to deal with a US administration in its final two years, one saddled with multiple inconclusive wars and battles against terror.

Yet despite the crisis in Italy, and general dislike in Europe for US tactics in fighting terrorism, a fairly clear distinction continues to exist in elite circles between US-led Iraq and Afghan ventures.

Those distinctions have both practical and legal foundations: While a defeat of the US in Iraq might be troubling for the West, an accompanying defeat in Afghanistan would be "catastrophic," says a Brussels-based European diplomat.

"The war in Afghanistan is seen by Europeans as having a real basis in the events of 9/11, under UN rulings of the right of self-defense," says Adam Roberts, a professor at Oxford University, "and this is seen as different from the war in Iraq.

"In Afghanistan, efforts at transformation are multilateral, as distinct from Iraq," he adds. "In Afghanistan, 2 million refugees have returned, whereas in Iraq, 2 million refugees have left. There is still a strong tendency to draw these distinctions, despite European concern over US policy, which is very widespread."

The center-left Prodi government in Rome was always fragile, a nine-party coalition whose main agreement was its dislike of the previous center-right government of Silvio Berlusconi. Prodi decided to resign, it appears, after he was unable to achieve supporting votes from within his coalition for Italy's troops in Afghanistan or to follow through on a two-year-old deal with Washington to expand a military base in Vicenza.

Still, growing negative perceptions in Italy over the US enterprise in the Middle East has been eroding many distinctions in the public mind between the Afghanistan and Iraq wars, according to French analyst Bernard Getta. Such perceptions deepened last week when a judge ordered that 25 suspected CIA operatives stand trial in Milan for kidnapping an Islamist cleric in 2003 and sending him to Egypt. On Feb. 18, tens of thousands of Italians marched in Vicenza.

In Britain, Mr. Blair's announcement Wednesday that he would forces in Basra by 1,600 as part of what may be a complete drawdown by the end of 2008 reflects a broad consensus about Iraq.

Blair emphasized the difference between relatively safer conditions in Basra and those in Baghdad, suggesting that British forces had played their part, and that "the next chapter ... will be written by Iraqis." But the Iraq deployment is increasingly less popular. Blair spoke with his heir apparent, Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown, sitting to his left; Mr. Brown is regarded as willing to take a more independent position vis-à-vis the White House.

In the case of the Palestinian territories, the US has said it won't deal with a unity government unless it abides by conditions set last year by the Quartet mediating group – Russia, the US, the EU, and the UN – that Hamas renounce violence and recognize Israel.

In Denmark, which will bring home all 460 ground troops from Iraq by summer, public opinion generally distinguishes between Iraq and Afghanistan, says Mogens Jakobsen, who runs Epinion, a polling firm in Copenhagen.

As in Britain, the Iraq war is losing traction among Danes.

"The British withdrawal gave the Danish government a window of opportunity to get out," Mr. Jakobsen says. "Popular support ... is dropping, and it is more difficult for the government to explain to the people why they are there. So the British action was a kind of fig leaf for the Danes."

In the past year, some Danes have become skeptical of their Afghan role. Mostly, this is over tensions with the US created by a Danish policy not to turn over Afghan prisoners to US forces. A perception exists that US troops have sometimes tortured prisoners in Afghanistan. But "the Afghan war is not ... high on the agenda of opposition," Jakobsen says.

Europe's pushback stems partly from frustration that until recently the US had not worked closely with its allies on the Continent. Yet most European foreign ministries, from Britain to Germany to France, are working closely with US allies on Afghanistan, the Iranian nuclear question, and the Middle East, and are now considering a controversial US missile-shield for central Europe.

Italy has had 61 governments in 62 years; its parliamentary system is rife with squabbling parties that often take uncompromising positions. It remains unclear whether the government will disband, leading to new elections. That would pave the way for another run by Mr. Berlusconi.

Thursday, however, President Giorgio Napolitano began polling parties to determine whether a new government can be formed in the immediate future.

An Upside-Down World (WSJ)

By Nick Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

LONDON -- The other day Ken Livingstone, the mayor of my hometown of London, organized a conference on Islam and the West. It was a carefully rigged affair in which handpicked speaker after handpicked speaker stood up and announced that the democracies were to blame for the tidal wave of murder sweeping the world. To provide a spurious air of balance, the organizers invited a few people who dissented from the line of the Muslim Brotherhood and its British allies. Agnès Poirier, a French feminist, was one of them, but she pulled out because although there were no special facilities for Christians, Hindus and Jews, Mr. Livingstone had provided separate prayer rooms for Muslim men and Muslim women.

She wanted to know: Does Ken Livingstone's idea of multiculturalism acknowledge and condone segregation? It clearly does, but what made this vignette of ethnic politics in a European city worth noting is that commentators for the BBC and nearly every newspaper here describe Mr. Livingstone as one of the most left-wing politicians in British public life. Hardly any of them notices the weirdness of an apparent socialist pandering to a reactionary strain of Islam, pushing its arguments and accepting its dictates.

Mr. Livingstone's not alone. After suicide bombers massacred Londoners on July 7, 2005, leftish rather than conservative papers held British foreign policy responsible for the slaughters on the transport network. ("Blair's Bombs," ran the headline in my own leftish New Statesman.) In any university, you are more likely to hear campaigns for the rights of Muslim women derided by postmodernists than by crusty conservative dons. Our Stop the War coalition is an alliance of the white far left and the Islamist far right, and George Galloway, its leader, and the first allegedly "far left" MP to be elected to the British parliament in 50 years, is an admirer of Saddam Hussein and Hezbollah.

I could go on with specific examples, but the crucial point is the pervasive European attitude to the Iraq catastrophe. As al Qaeda, the Baathists and Shiite Islamists slaughter thousands, there is virtually no sense that their successes are our defeats. Iraqi socialists and trade unionists I know are close to despair. They turn for support to Europe, the home of liberalism, feminism and socialism, and find that rich democrats, liberals and feminists won't help them or even acknowledge their existence.

There were plenty of leftish people in the 20th century who excused communism, but they could at least say that communism was a left-wing idea. Now overwhelmingly and everywhere you find people who scream their heads off about the smallest sexist or racist remark, yet refuse to confront ultra-reactionary movements that explicitly reject every principle they profess to hold.

Why is the world upside down? In part, it is a measure of President Bush's failure that anti-Americanism has swept out of the intelligentsia and become mainstream in Britain. A country that was once the most pro-American in Western Europe now derides Tony Blair for sticking with the Atlantic alliance. But if Iraq has pummeled Mr. Blair's reputation, it has also shone a very harsh light on the British and European left. No one noticed it when the Berlin Wall came down, but the death of socialism gave people who called themselves "left wing" a paradoxical advantage. They no longer had a practical program they needed to defend and could go along with ultra-right movements that would once have been taboo. In moments of crisis, otherwise sane liberals will turn to these movements and be reassured by the professed leftism of the protest organizers that they are not making a nonsense of their beliefs.

If, that is, they have strong beliefs to abandon. In Europe and North America extreme versions of multiculturalism and identity politics have left a poisonous legacy. Far too many liberal-minded people think that is somehow culturally imperialist to criticize reactionary movements and ideas -- as long as they aren't European or American reactionary movements. This delusion is everywhere. Until very recently our Labour government was allowing its dealings with Britain's Muslim minority to be controlled by an unelected group, the Muslim Council of Britain, which stood for everything social democrats were against. In their desperate attempts to ingratiate themselves, ministers gave its leader a knighthood -- even though he had said that "death was too good" for Salman Rushdie, who happens to be a British citizen as well as a great novelist.

Beyond the contortions and betrayals of liberal and leftish thinking lies a simple emotion that I don't believe Americans take account of: an insidious fear that has produced the ideal conditions for appeasement. Radical Islam does worry Europeans but we are trying to prevent an explosion by going along with Islamist victimhood. We blame ourselves for the Islamist rage, in the hope that our admission of guilt will pacify our enemies. We are scared, but not scared enough to take a stand.

I hope conservative American readers come to Britain. But if you do, expect to find an upside-down world. People who call themselves liberals or leftists will argue with you, and when they have finished you may experience the strange realization that they have become far more reactionary than you have ever been.

A Foreign Policy Built On Do-Overs (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

Watching the Bush team wrestle with Iran, North Korea and Iraq reminds me of something that used to be said of the Reagan administration: The right hand never knew what the far right hand was doing.

In fact, my bet is that when the inside history of the Bush team is written, we will discover that, contrary to its carefully managed image of a disciplined core operating from consistent, conservative principles, it has actually been one of the most internally divided administrations — ever.

The only thing the Bush folks all agreed on was that they would never do anything Bill Clinton did. Beyond that, it's been a food fight. The trial of Scooter Libby, with its testimony about wars between the V.P.'s office and the White House, the White House and the C.I.A., and everyone against the State Department, proves that beyond a reasonable doubt.

When the former Bush U.N. ambassador John Bolton trashed the president's recent deal with North Korea as a "charade," though, he highlighted the biggest internal division of all within the Bush team: how to deal with rogue regimes like Iran, North Korea and Saddam's Iraq — whether to go for regime change or behavior change.

On Iran and North Korea, "this administration does not have clear policies, it has competing impulses," said Robert Litwak of the Wilson Center, who just published a smart book on this theme: "Regime Change: U.S. Strategy Through the Prism of 9/11." "The administration's mantra is 'all options are on the table.' But the dilemma is that too many objectives are on the table as well."

Because this administration was divided for so long on Iran and North Korea, over regime change or behavior change, it got neither. All it got was that Iran and North Korea both went out and bought Bush insurance: a nuclear weapons program.

President Bush obviously recognizes that and is now trying to remedy it. Bill Clinton was criticized for taking more golf mulligans — do-overs — than any other president. Mr. Bush will be remembered for taking more foreign policy mulligans than any other president.

On North Korea, the president has finally decided to focus purely on changing behavior. He struck a very sensible deal last week with Kim Jong Il to take his country off our terrorism list and normalize relations, provided Mr. Kim gives up his nukes.

But we could have had a similar deal years ago — when North Korea had only two nukes — had the Bush team not been wrangling with itself over regime change or behavior change. While it wrangled, Mr. Kim built up his nuclear arsenal, adding six to 12 more bombs. If this deal is carried out, which is still uncertain, the wasted years will not have been a disaster. If it isn't carried out, they will have been very costly.

Why do you think that a year after Mr. Bush told us we were "addicted to oil" we still have no serious plan to end that addiction? Because the market fundamentalists in his White House — led by Dick Cheney, who opposes any government effort to impose carbon caps or taxes to promote alternative energies, à la California — keep blocking the market pragmatists who do. And Mr. Bush won't intervene.

The irony of Iraq is that it's the one place where Mr. Bush decisively chose regime change, but he then executed it so poorly, with insufficient troops, that Iraq never stood a chance. If Don Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney had spent as much time plotting the toppling of Saddam Hussein as they did the toppling of Colin Powell, Iraq today would be Switzerland. Today's Bush troop surge in Iraq is just another mulligan — the president's trying to do in 2007 what he should have done in 2003. In between, we've paid a huge price.

How about we avoid a mulligan on Iran? Let's put a clear deal on the table: full diplomatic relations, security guarantees and thousands of student visas if Iran puts its nuclear program under U.N. inspection and stops supporting terrorism. If not: more sanctions and isolation. Such an offer would at least get us some leverage, unite us more with our allies outside Iran, energize our allies inside Iran and force some excruciating choices on Iran's leaders.

"Resolving the contradiction in Washington will sharpen the contradiction in Tehran," Mr. Litwak argued. "Taking regime change off the table in America will put behavior change on the table in Iran."

I guess we should be thankful that Mr. Bush is trying to fix some of his mistakes, but we have paid a huge, unnecessary price for his learning curve. Which is why it's always best to get it right the first time. The best golfers never take mulligans, and the best presidents never need them.

Russia And US Play Down Missile Dispute (FT)

By Neil Buckley And Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, February 23, 2007

Senior US and Russian officials sought to play down their differences on Thursday after two weeks that have seen a sharp cooling in relations between their countries.

On a visit to Moscow, Stephen Hadley, the US national security adviser, said he did not see a speech by President Vladimir Putin of Russia in Munich this month that was sharply critical of US "unilateralism" as a return to cold war-style confrontation.

He also reiterated assurances that Washington's planned missile defence system, parts of which the US wants to locate in eastern Europe, was not aimed at Russia but at a potential threat from Iran or other rogue states.

Igor Ivanov, Mr Hadley's counterpart as head of Russia's national security council, acknowledged there were disagreements between the two countries but said it was important that these should be resolved by dialogue.

Mr Hadley also held talks with Mr Putin during a visit that seemed designed to project a more conciliatory stance after the sharp exchanges that have taken place since the Russian president's Munich address.

"We do not see President Putin's speech as an invitation to confrontation and do not believe it was made with that intention," Mr Hadley said.

Sergei Yastrzhembsky, Mr Putin's envoy to the European Union, described the Munich speech as a "cold shower" rather than a declaration of cold war. He told Rossiiskaya Gazeta, a government daily, the speech brought into the open the kind of issues usually discussed behind closed doors.

"We are no longer in ideological conflict with the west," Mr Yastrzhembsky added. "Russia is a totally different country."

But the dispute over the planned US missile defence system continued to simmer on Thursday. Sergei Lavrov, Russia's foreign minister, said Moscow's complaints arose from concerns on how such defences were being handled between Russia and the west. He said western countries in the Nato-Russia Council, which deals with military ties between Moscow and the alliance, had insisted on "calling a break" in talks on co-operation on missile defence.

The pause in consultations appeared to have been "tailor-made to coincide with" the US move to position parts of its national missile system in eastern Europe, he complained.

Frank-Walter Steinmeier, Germany's foreign minister, said it was important to avoid "anti-American or anti-Russian reflexes" when tackling this issue.

Russia, US Advisers Pledge Cooperation (AP)

By Maria Danilova

AP, February 23, 2007

The U.S. national security adviser sought Thursday to ease Russian concerns about American intentions, saying he did not consider a fiery speech by President Vladimir Putin to have been a sign of confrontation, and reiterating reassurances about U.S. missile defense plans.

Washington and Moscow have been trading heated criticism over issues including U.S. plans to deploy elements of a national missile defense system in former Soviet satellites in Europe.

At a security conference this month in Germany, Putin said the United States "has overstepped its national borders in every way" and is fostering a global arms race — an unusually clear, comprehensive account of Kremlin complaints about U.S. conduct.

U.S. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley played down speculation that the remarks heralded a return to Cold War-style confrontation.

"We do not read President Putin's comments in any way ... as an invitation to confrontation," the Interfax news agency quoted Hadley as telling Russian reporters during his visit to Moscow, which included a meeting with Putin.

U.S. and other Western journalists were not invited to be present when he made the remarks, which suggests they were aimed at a Russian audience.

Hadley repeated assurances that planned missile defense sites in Poland and the Czech Republic would be aimed at countering a potential threat from Iran, and constituted no threat to Russia.

"It is not directed in any way against Russia," Interfax quoted him as saying.

According to Interfax, he also indicated the United States has no plans to deploy missile-defense components in Ukraine, which shares a long border with Russia.

Putin and other Russian officials have rejected the assurance that the system would be meant to combat an Iranian threat.

At a meeting between Hadley and his Russian counterpart, both men acknowledged disagreements but pledged to work closely together to overcome them and reach common goals.

Russian Security Council Secretary Igor Ivanov said the two countries should cooperate closely in areas such as fighting international terrorism and striving for global peace.

"This does not mean that our relations are cloudless — there are disagreements, there are misunderstandings, including on security matters. That is why it is very important that the dialogue that we have continues to develop at all levels and allows us to deal with those issues so that they don't damage bilateral relations," Ivanov said after the Kremlin meeting.

Hadley also met with Sergei Ivanov and Dmitry Medvedev, two first vice-premiers who are seen as the leading potential candidates to succeed Putin in 2008.

Hadley, who is visiting several European capitals this week amid a flurry of international diplomacy over Iran's nuclear program, the persistent Mideast unrest and other issues, also said Moscow and Washington share goals and should continue to seek common ground when they disagree.

"Where we have disagreements we've been able to talk candidly about them and work together constructively," he said.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, speaking Wednesday in Washington, described Putin's speech as "extraordinary."

Putin aide Sergei Yastrzhembsky, suggested Thursday that Putin's speech was not a statement of mistrust and animosity toward the United States but a sign of what Russia feels is its resurgence in the international arena after years of post-Soviet decline.

"Putin very clearly said one simple thing: 'Gentlemen, Russia has returned, it should be reckoned with,'" Yastrzhembsky was quoted as saying by the RIA-Novosti news agency.

Philippine Military Is Linked To Killings (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

MANILA, Feb. 22 — A commission investigating political murder in the Philippines has found that members of the armed forces were responsible for “an undetermined number of killings” and that senior officers could be held accountable.

Jose Melo, a retired Supreme Court justice, conducted the inquiry. The report, released on Thursday, said military officials had allowed, tolerated and even encouraged the murders of political activists, and that the government of President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo had not done enough to stem the violence.

It singled out a retired major general, Jovito Palparan, who leftist and human rights groups have said was behind many of the abuses. He has long denied a role in the abuses.

The military chief of staff, Gen. Hermogenes Esperon, called the commission’s conclusions “strained, unfair and a blank accusation.”

Political Killings Traced To Philippine Military (CSM)

By Simon Montlake

The Christian Science Monitor, February 23, 2007

These days, Boy Facunla is afraid to return home to the sun-drenched rice paddies of central Luzon, the region where he raised a family of eight and became active in local left-wing politics. Now, he spends his days hiding out in a cramped Manila office, fearing that a spate of unexpected murders in his community may one day turn on him.

"I haven't been home in two years. I'm the number one target in my area," he says in an interview held at the office of a farmers' union. "We think it's the military behind these killings."

Mr. Facunla is not alone in his suspicions. Since 2001, when President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo took office with the backing of the powerful military, hundreds of left-wing activists, unionists, farmers, human rights workers, and clergy have been slain, sparking accusations of a systematic, nationwide campaign to silence those who challenge the status quo.

A government commission headed by retired Supreme Court judge Jose Melo issued a long-awaited report Thursday that put the blame for much of the violence on the Philippine military. The damning report came one day after a visiting United Nations investigator said the military was in a "state of denial" about its involvement in the killings.

However, Philip Alston, a law professor at New York University and the UN's special rapporteur on extrajudicial killings, said that the "death squads" weren't state sanctioned.

"I do not believe that there's a policy at the top designed to direct these killings," he told a press conference at the end of a 10-day trip by the invitation of the Philippine government.

The Melo commission concurred, saying elements in the military had acted outside the law and called for an independent agency to investigate the security forces.

The military swung back at the commission, calling the report "strained, unfair, and a blank accusation."

"I believe that Mr. Alston might be in a state of denial himself," said Gen. Hermogenes Esperon at a news conference on Wednesday.

Ms. Arroyo has proposed creating special courts to try cases of extrajudicial killings. But ending a culture of impunity in the military won't be easy, not least because of its tight hold on local and national politics. It has also garnered substantial US assistance since 2001 for its war on terror, and its elite troops are being trained by US Special Forces.

The commission's findings are likely to increase pressure on Arroyo. Midterm elections in May could tip the balance in Congress against her. The president's opponents already tried unsuccessfully to impeach her once in 2005 over election fraud allegations.

Internal purges or military death squads?

Security officials reject claims of military death squads, calling them left-wing propaganda by groups that they consider to be fronts for the outlawed Communist Party of the Philippines (CPP) and its armed wing, the New People's Army (NPA). Indeed, while the US is fixated on the fight against Islamic extremists in the southern Philippines, Arroyo's advisers say the greater threat comes from Communist insurgents that roam across the country.

There is also disagreement over the extent of the violence. Karapatan, a leftist human rights watchdog, has recorded over 800 killings since 2001, but observers say that number is inflated and includes dozens of nonpolitical murders and undocumented cases. Alston declined to provide an estimate, but said the total was "high enough to be distressing."

A police task force set up last year to probe the violence has pinned much of the blame on the CPP itself. Deputy Director General Avelino Razon, who oversees the task force, says that most documented killings of left-wing activists were carried out by Communist forces, not the security forces.

"We think they're doing a series of purges, and this is timed during a government campaign against their insurgency," he says, referring to an all-out war that Arroyo declared last year against the CPP.

General Razon says police and Army personnel were involved in a few murder cases, but insists they were acting alone. "If we have evidence of orders from above, we would file charges against the officer issuing the orders," he says.

Unsurprisingly, this is vigorously disputed by leftist groups who accuse the police of a whitewash. Teodoro Casino is one of six left-wing lawmakers who were charged with rebellion last year after Arroyo declared a state of emergency. A court later overturned the charges. Mr. Casino says the administration's hand is clearly seen in the violence.

"You can't attribute widespread killings to a few generals. It has to go all the way up. It's the government's counterinsurgency policy that's provided the environment for these human rights abuses to take place," he says.

Military killings may lend support to leftists

Casino's complaint is echoed not only in political circles but also within the influential Roman Catholic church. Bishop Deogracias Iniguez, head of public affairs for the Catholic Bishops Conference of the Philippines, says Arroyo, a devout Catholic, is quick to smear her opponents. Many priests have been accused of Communist sympathies in the past – some of whom have turned up dead.

"In the Philippines, if you are against the government, then you're associated with the left-wing groups," he says.

The presence of legal leftist organizations in the Philippines is a legacy of a 1990s peace initiative to bring activists into the political arena and cut ties with armed insurgents. Security officials say these ties persist and accuse left-wing lawmakers of channeling Congressional funds to their comrades. Casino denies this accusation.

Even Arroyo's critics concede that a tough response is needed to counter the NPA and its frequent attacks on government targets. But declaring all-out war on Communists and tarring all activists with the same brush isn't the way forward, says Randy David, a newspaper columnist and sociologist at the University of the Philippines.

"This is a terrible approach to the insurgency. Those who are already in the underground may even welcome this. It focuses attention on their struggle, and in the long term it forces people to go underground," he says.

Chavez Builds His Sphere Of Influence (WP)

By Juan Forero And Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela has long pledged to buck Washington-backed economic policies in Latin America. Now, two months after winning reelection and consolidating his hold on the country with new powers to rule by decree, he is strengthening economic ties in the region in a bid to limit U.S. influence.

Chavez recently announced that his government would build housing, a highway and an oil refinery in Nicaragua, part of an aid package that would benefit one of Washington's most tenacious Cold War adversaries, President Daniel Ortega.

Farther south, Venezuela has pledged to provide Ecuador with $1 billion in credit, a gesture that would soften the blow if that country's leftist government follows through on its threat to default on foreign debt payments. And, along with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, a foe of the Bush administration, Chavez has announced a $2 billion international investment fund for Latin America.

Taken together, economists and others who track the country's affairs say, the investments signify an effort by Venezuela to curb the reach of the U.S. government, whose influence has waned in Latin America. For Chavez, the goal is nothing less than to kill the so-called Washington consensus, the economic prescriptions championed by the International Monetary Fund and the U.S. Treasury, which press governments to limit spending, raise interest rates and open their economies to foreign trade and investment.

Backing such economic principles as privatization and trade liberalization, the consensus rooted out bloated bureaucracies and helped tame hyper-inflation. Yet even those countries that have run their economies along Washington consensus lines have generally seen disappointing rates of economic growth and deepening poverty. The electoral success of such leftist leaders as Chavez, Ortega, Bolivia's Evo Morales and Ecuador's Rafael Correa is in part the result of the failure of previous policies to generate growth and raise incomes, economists say.

"All of this IMF stuff has actually benefited a very small sector of our economies," said Hernando de Soto, a Peruvian economist who champions free markets and has criticized elements of Chavez's political program. "That's where Chavez and company come in, because they pick up on the resentment."

Chavez's campaign to persuade countries to break with fiscal orthodoxy, a strategy funded by revenue from the largest oil reserves in the Americas, has had mixed success. Some of the region's most important economies -- Mexico, Brazil, Chile, Colombia and Peru -- maintain solid relations with multilateral lenders and continue to follow market-oriented principles, such as welcoming foreign investment, limiting government spending and attacking inflation.

For its part, the United States still has enormous influence in and close ties with most Latin American countries. Free-trade agreements now cover nearly two-thirds of economic output in the Americas, according to Thomas A. Shannon Jr., assistant secretary of state for Western Hemisphere affairs. And although voters in the region have increasingly elected leftist governments in the past several years, most of them are like those headed by Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva in Brazil and Michelle Bachelet in Chile -- concerned about social inequality but fiscally austere and on friendly terms with Wall Street.

Although Chavez frequently travels to foreign capitals to lambaste Washington, it's not so clear that Latin Americans favor the Venezuelan president's prescriptions, even if their governments are happy to accept his aid. According to a recent survey of 20,200 people in 18 countries by LatinobarÃ³metro, a Chilean polling firm, most Latin Americans lumped Chavez with Fidel Castro and President Bush as bad leaders, citing Brazil's Lula and Chile's Bachelet as the best. And most of those polled classified themselves as political moderates .

Still, U.S. efforts to reach a free-trade agreement with South America's two biggest economic powers, Brazil and Argentina, are stalled, and Washington's efforts to influence economic policies through the IMF and its sister organization, the World Bank, have diminished.

Chavez vs. the IMF

In a policy marked by 1960s-style rhetoric, Chavez is promising to "liberate" Latin America from the "imperialist North American plot" to enslave the region, as he put it recently during the inauguration of Correa in Ecuador. Given new powers to pass economic decrees for 18 months, the Venezuelan president has a free hand to control his country's purse strings.

"In Latin America and the Caribbean, there's more consciousness that these financial organizations are a curse that have taken our countries to hunger, misery and exploitation," said Sal Ortega, a member of the Venezuelan National Assembly's foreign relations committee.

Economists say other factors have helped leaders sever ties with the IMF, perhaps most notably the booming commodity prices that have filled government coffers from Bogota to Buenos Aires with international reserves and led to three years of robust economic growth. "The region doesn't need IMF financing, and we're happy about that," said Anoop Singh, director of the IMF's Western Hemisphere department. "The main reason is that the world economy is healthy, commodity prices are high and countries in the region are generally following much stronger policies than during previous expansions."

Chavez is most closely allied with those governments furthest from Washington's reach, including Cuba, which each year gets as much as $2 billion worth of cut-rate oil from Venezuela. He has also found allies in newly ascendant, like-minded political leaders: Ortega and Correa took office in January, and another beneficiary of Venezuelan aid, Bolivia's Morales, who rose to prominence opposing globalization, took office in January 2006.

Some analysts supportive of Chavez's policies, like Mark Weisbrot, co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research in Washington, contend that Venezuelan aid has made a difference for countries in the region. They point to Latin America's poor growth in the 1990s, when privatizations, pension cuts and other austerity measures prescribed by Washington were in full swing.

"Venezuela has added an alternative source of financing without policy conditions," Weisbrot said. "This has given governments wanting to avoid IMF conditions another option, as well as increased bargaining power with international financial institutions."

In the past two years, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil and Nicaragua have all paid off IMF loans or let lapse IMF agreements that imposed significant strictures on their governments. Among countries in Central and South America, only Paraguay, Peru and Honduras still have major agreements with the IMF, though Nicaragua has said it will negotiate a new one.

Data from the Penn World Table, an analytical unit at the University of Pennsylvania, highlight the economic difficulties that are driving some of Latin America's politics these days. In five Latin American countries that have allied themselves with Chavez -- Venezuela, Bolivia, Argentina, Ecuador and Nicaragua -- the data show that from 1980 through 2003, economic output per person shrank by more than 10 percent, when adjusted for inflation and relative purchasing power. That's a sharp contrast to the 40 percent economic growth those countries recorded from 1960 to 1979.

In Venezuela, Chavez has nationalized industries and tapped the country's oil wealth to expand public health and educational programs aimed at the poor. He has directed his aid dollars toward enabling other countries to cut ties with the IMF and similarly disregard the Washington consensus, nationalizing industries and boosting social spending even while risking inflation -- a course the IMF would not have allowed.A New Era?

The amount of Venezuelan aid is hard to quantify. The Center of Economic Investigations, a consulting firm in Caracas, the capital, has kept track of Chavez's frequent pronouncements and says that in 2006, he pledged $47 billion in aid and agreements -- impossible to deliver considering that Venezuela's annual budget hovers around $50 billion. Still, the country's central bank recorded billions spent on foreign bonds and other investments in the first nine months of last year, dwarfing the amount the United States offers in assistance to Latin America.

In Venezuela, the closer ties to Ecuador and Nicaragua, coupled with ChÃ¡vez's recent announcements that he will nationalize utilities and take greater control of oil projects at the expense of multinational corporations, has enthralled supporters who believe the country is in the vanguard of a new era in Latin America. Venezuela is proposing a new multinational bank, a Bank of the South, to replace Washington-based lenders.

"We are distancing ourselves fundamentally from the imperial pretensions of the United States," said Haiman El Troudi, a former chief of staff to Chavez who studies economic issues at the state-funded International Miranda Center in Caracas. "The leftist, progressive thought is thinking the same, thinking of human beings, the installation of new social relations to get along, thinking of the conditions of people's lives and people's culture."

The Venezuelan model, which is predicated on a break with all multinational institutions with Washington ties, has plainly gathered steam in some Latin American countries.

Last year, Argentina, recovering after its 2001 economic collapse by ignoring some crucial aspects of IMF advice, paid off the last of the $10 billion it owed the fund. It was aided by Venezuela, which had bought $2.5 billion in Argentine debt.

In Bolivia, Morales nationalized the gas industry and renegotiated agreements with foreign investors -- measures opposed by orthodox economists. Last March, after spending nearly two decades under the strictures of an IMF program, Bolivia let its agreement with the fund end. Meanwhile, Venezuela has committed more than $140 million in loans and grants while pledging to invest as much as $1.5 billion in Bolivia's gas industry in coming years.

Bolivian leaders said Venezuelan aid comes with fewer strings attached. "In the case of the United States, we're locked into specific areas -- aid for roads, aid for health, aid for electricity," Ãlvaro GarcÃ-a Linera, the vice president, said in an interview in his office. The Venezuelan aid "allows us greater flexibility to choose projects with more productive impact, especially those ventures that include a state presence."

With Venezuela offering loans, Ecuador, too, has moved to cut back its ties to the IMF and related lenders. The Correa administration said it would not sign an agreement allowing the fund to monitor the government's economic plan.

The question now is how long Venezuela can maintain the aid. Although the economy is growing thanks to high oil prices, it has little private investment and creates few new jobs. And, true to the predictions of economists who are skeptical of the Chavez model, inflation is skyrocketing -- so much so that Chavez recently threatened to nationalize grocery stores if they did not limit price increases.

"I don't know if Venezuela can simultaneously sustain internal spending and external spending at the level it has until now," said Teodoro Petkoff, a former leftist guerrilla and a Chavez opponent who runs a newspaper in Caracas. "I've said it before -- this year, the economy is going to begin to cost Chavez."

Venezuela Rivals U.S. In Aid To Bolivia (NYT)

By Simon Romero

New York Times, February 23, 2007

LA PAZ, Bolivia — To understand Venezuela's growing influence here, consider that more than two dozen ambassadors are in this capital city, including those of Bolivia's leading trading partners like Brazil, the United States and Argentina. Yet none enjoy the direct conduit that the Venezuelan ambassador, Julio Montes, has established with President Evo Morales.

Mr. Montes often accompanies Mr. Morales on domestic and international trips on executive jets provided by Venezuela's national oil company, say officials who have seen them traveling together. On many days Mr. Montes, who arrived in La Paz a year ago, can be found at the presidential palace huddled in meetings with Mr. Morales or the president's top aides.

Since Mr. Morales became president little more than a year ago, Venezuela has quickly come to rival the United States as Bolivia's main patron. It has provided assistance for the army, cattle ranches, soybean cultivation, microfinance projects, urban sanitation companies and the oil industry.

Perhaps most important to Washington, despite its opposition, Venezuelan financial assistance has helped Bolivia push ahead with plans to increase exports of its industrial production of coca, the main ingredient in cocaine.

The coca financing plan has helped Venezuela accomplish one of its foreign policy goals: limiting the regional influence of the United States, which for years has provided Bolivia with millions of dollars in aid in an effort to curb coca production. The United States recently cut its drug enforcement aid to Bolivia by about 25 percent, to $33.8 million, after Mr. Morales acknowledged that the size of the country's coca-growing areas were about double official estimates.

A senior American official here, speaking anonymously out of concern that Bolivia's already fragile relations with the United States could erode further, said it was difficult to know the exact amount of Venezuelan aid because many of the agreements between Venezuela and Bolivia were not made public.

Citing Mr. Morales's efforts to assert greater government control over the energy industry and to rush a military agreement with Venezuela through the Bolivian Congress, the American official said, "It is clear that Venezuela has strongly influenced policy in Bolivia."

Analysts who have reviewed the various Venezuelan assistance projects say the total may surpass the $120 million in antidrug and humanitarian assistance from the United States, which made Bolivia one of the largest recipients in the world of aid from Washington per capita.

[A report in the Venezuelan newspaper El Nacional over the weekend of Feb. 17-18 said President Hugo Chávez had approved a $100 million assistance fund for Bolivia, though it was not clear whether that included assistance for military or petroleum projects.

["What we are doing in Bolivia is the same that Cuba has done in Venezuela," Mr. Montes told El Nacional, referring to the thousands of Cuban doctors and social workers who had been sent to Venezuela. "The difference is that the greatest resource of the Cubans is their human capital. We have the possibility to help our Bolivian brothers with economic resources."]

Not all are pleased with Venezuela's new role. "We've become a client state of Venezuela, in what is a new form of imperialism," said Óscar Ortiz, an opposition senator with the Podemos Party who has publicly criticized Bolivia's relationship with Venezuela.

Mr. Ortiz and other opposition legislators have been particularly critical of Venezuelan ambitions that they believe may conflict with Bolivia's interests.

For instance, even as Venezuela advises Y.P.F.B., Bolivia's national energy company, in its efforts to assert greater control over ventures with foreign energy companies, Venezuela has moved forward with its own plans to build a pipeline that would export gas to Brazil, currently the main customer for Bolivian gas.

Political supporters of Mr. Morales argue that the alliance with Venezuela has allowed Bolivia to avoid some of the potentially detrimental effects of United States trade and drug policies in Latin America.

"Our comrades in Venezuela are rescuing our way of life," said Jerónimo Meneces Mollo, director of coca industrialization for Bolivia's government, which is receiving $250,000 in financing from Venezuela to build two coca-processing plants that will produce coca tea for exclusive export to the Venezuelan market. "No one but Hugo Chávez is brave enough to do this."

Others point to a prospective trade agreement between Colombia and the United States that could ease the entry of American soybean exports to Colombia and potentially deprive Bolivian farmers of one of their key markets.

In a boon to Mr. Morales's government, Venezuela answered the threat by announcing that it would purchase a large portion of Bolivia's soybean crop. Venezuela also says it plans to import 300 tons of Bolivian beef to meet demand in its domestic market, along with as much as 7,500 tons of beans and poultry.

Though much of Venezuela's aid is related to agriculture, like the donation of more than 300 tractors produced by a joint Venezuelan-Iranian venture, its military assistance has attracted the most scrutiny.

Opposition legislators are trying to overturn a military agreement reached last year that could provide Bolivia with as much as $47 million in assistance intended, among other things, to strengthen the government's presence in the eastern lowlands, where separatist sentiment runs strong.

The International Institute for Strategic Studies, a British research group, said in a recent report that Venezuela, which is undertaking a rapid armaments buildup, could be providing Bolivia with weapons and financing for new military bases.

Officials from both countries minimized the report, saying any military assistance was intended to assist Mr. Morales by lending him helicopters and flight crews to travel throughout Bolivia. [Citing military officials, the Bolivian newspaper La Razón reported on Feb. 19 that Venezuela was giving Bolivia two SuperPuma helicopters in a good-will gesture.]

"Bolivia is a tremendously poor country," said Gustavo Torrico, a leading supporter of Mr. Morales in Congress. "Any help we can get is positive."

Not least, the Venezuelan aid has given Bolivia a source of assistance outside the International Monetary Fund, whose policies are widely criticized in much of Latin America as not having helped the poor. It has also given Mr. Morales the breathing space to carry out popular social welfare programs.

DOJ_NMG_0135957

“The direct relationship with Chávez hasn’t been problematic for Evo Morales so far,” said Jim Shultz, executive director of the Democracy Center, a nonprofit institute in the Bolivian city of Cochabamba. “The I.M.F. is a banker without clients in parts of Latin America.”

Jackson Lee Tries To Smooth Chavez Ties (HC)

By John Otis

Houston Chronicle, February 23, 2007

BOGOTA, COLOMBIA — Breaking with Bush administration policy, Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee of Houston ventured to Venezuela to campaign for a thaw in relations with leftist President Hugo Chavez.

"We've made a serious mistake in not engaging with President Chavez," the Democratic lawmaker said Thursday in a telephone interview from Houston, a few hours after returning from a three-day trip to Caracas, the capital. "I came to break the tension, to warm up a chilled relationship."

The visit by Jackson Lee, a member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, which paid for the trip, was the first by a member of the U.S. Congress since the Democrats took control of the House and Senate and since Chavez won re-election. It also came in the wake of announcements by Chavez to move Venezuela toward what he calls "21st century socialism" — including plans by his government to take a majority stake of U.S.-run oil operations in the country.

"Houston jobs are directly related to our relationship with Venezuela," Jackson Lee said. "I don't want to give up on this very important regional partner."

Venezuela supplies about 11 percent of America's oil imports. Major U.S. petroleum companies, some based in Houston, have invested billions in the country.

But ever since an aborted coup in 2002 that Chavez charges was supported by the Bush administration, relations between Washington and Caracas have gone downhill.

For his part, Chavez has alienated many members of Congress, especially after his infamous speech in September at the United Nations when he called President Bush "the devil."

The last high-profile U.S. delegation to Venezuela, led by Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., who has since retired, was initially refused permission by the Chavez government to de-plane at the international airport in November 2005 and abruptly flew back to the U.S., further damaging ties.

Even so, said Cynthia Arnson, who heads the Latin America program at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington, "there are people on both sides of the aisle in Congress who recognize that there are U.S. interests that need to be protected and that it requires a more pragmatic approach."

Opening door to dialogue?Jackson Lee pressed the same point at a news conference Wednesday at the U.S. Embassy in Caracas, saying, "Venezuela has many friends in this new Congress."

But Arnson cautioned that "Chavez has not shown any interest in engaging the United States in any kind of constructive way."

In addition, there is growing concern in the U.S. about the health of Venezuela's democracy under Chavez, who also controls the military, the legislature and the courts and has moved to clamp down on some media outlets.

Jackson Lee met with Vice President Jorge Rodriguez as well as with officials at the National Assembly and Foreign Ministry and members of the Venezuelan media. She did not meet with Chavez in Caracas but said she would speak with him by telephone later Thursday.

Jackson Lee also conferred with executives from Chevron, Exxon Mobil Corp. and Venezuela's state-run oil company to discuss compensation as the government moves to become the majority shareholder of operations in the oil-rich Orinco River basin.

"I think we opened a door to dialogue," she said, "though it's not open far enough,"

Jackson Lee called on the Bush administration to lift a ban on arms sales to Venezuela. That would clear the way for the sale of spare parts and technological upgrades for Venezuela's aging F-16 fighter jets, which were purchased in the early 1980s and were made by Lockheed Martin Aeronautics of Fort Worth.

According to the Center for Responsive Politics in Washington, Jackson Lee, a seven-term lawmaker, has received about $7,000 in campaign contributions from Lockheed Martin since 1989. However, according to the center, she received far less than several other members of Congress from Texas, including Rep. Nick Lampson, D-Stafford — $28,259 — and Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas — $32,707.

Last year, the State Department banned the arms sales on grounds that Venezuela had failed to cooperate in the fight against drugs and terrorism. Chavez's government has also refused to sign agreements stating that U.S.-developed technologies would not be passed on to third countries.

Venezuela has purchased a new fleet of Russian-made Sukhoi fighter jets, and Chavez has talked of selling the F-16s to Iran, which Washington says would be illegal.

As for growing concerns in Washington about Chavez's leftist politics, Jackson Lee said: "The U.S. government has relations with many governments where we question human rights and press freedoms.

"China comes to mind."

Cuba's Visa Denials Signal Reluctance On Reforms (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

MEXICO CITY -- The Cuban government refused to renew the visas of at least two resident foreign journalists, dimming hopes it will move forward with reforms as Fidel Castro fades from power.

The refusals were "part of a political tightening in the expectation that when Fidel dies they will have total control and there won't be any opposition or resistance," said Jaime Suchlicki, an expert on Cuba at the University of Miami.

Mr. Castro, 80 years old, handed power over to his brother, longtime Defense Minister Raúl Castro, 75, on a provisional basis after undergoing surgery in July. Since then, many analysts have speculated that the younger Castro, who is believed to be more pragmatic than his brother, would experiment with reforms and fresh thinking.

Since the younger Castro assumed power, there have been some signals of a domestic thaw. In one speech, Raúl Castro urged university students to question authority. On another occasion, intellectuals took the unprecedented action of demanding an apology from the government for seeming to bring back a hard-line official who had been involved in censuring writers decades ago. The younger Castro also has called for negotiations with the U.S. to resolve the differences between the two countries.

While Raúl Castro has sounded like a moderate, Ramiro Valdez, a hard-line former interior minister who is information and technology minister, has been cracking down on the use of parabolic antennas used by Cubans to pick up television signals from the U.S. He also defended the restrictions Cuba places on its citizens to access the Internet.

Cuba recently announced regulations that it would require correspondents to renew permits every 30 days, enabling the government to keep a tighter leash on journalists.

Gary Marx, who has been based in Havana for the Chicago Tribune since 2002, and Cesar Gonzalez Calero, a reporter for the Mexico City daily El Universal, were told this week by Cuban officials that their visas wouldn't be renewed and they could no longer report from the island, according to the Chicago Tribune and El Universal.

The Chicago Tribune said a reporter for the South Florida Sun-Sentinel will continue to staff the Tribune Co. bureau in Havana, and the Cuban government had told Mr. Marx that the government would welcome an application from a new Chicago Tribune correspondent.

The Tribune quoted Mr. Marx as saying the Cuban government said it had revoked his visa because he had been on the island too long, and didn't give any examples of stories to which they objected.

Julia Sweig, a Cuba specialist at the Council on Foreign Relations, said the Cuban government often exhibits a contradictory pattern of opening up in one area and battening down in another. "It's like, 'Just in case someone is getting too excited that we might have process of reform, we'll take a whack at the foreign press to show who we are -- a closed society,' " she said.

Chadian Prime Minister Yoadimnadji Dies (AP)

Chadian Prime Minister Pascal Yoadimnadji died Friday at a Paris hospital where he was being treated for cardiovascular problems, the African nation's embassy said. He was 56.

Kadallah Ousman, the embassy spokesman, said Yoadimnadji died at midnight at Val de Grace military hospital in Paris.

The cause of death was not immediately known.

Ousman said he had no immediate information on a funeral service or on who would replace Yoadimnadji.

Chadian President Idriss Deby appointed Yoadimnadji, a lawyer, as head of government in 2005. He replaced Moussa Faki Mahamat, who had resigned.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Al-Arian Hunger Strike Continues. The Washington Post (2/26, B3, Markon) reports, "A former Florida professor has not eaten for more than a month to protest prosecutors' efforts to make him cooperate with their investigation into whether a network of Herndon-based Muslim charities financed terrorist organizations." The Post continues, "Sami al-Arian, 49, who has twice refused to testify before a federal grand jury in Alexandria, has lost more than 30 pounds and collapsed in jail from the effects of his water-only diet. His hunger strike has drawn the support of Muslim organizations, which held a news conference last week at Justice Department headquarters in Washington and called for a worldwide fast in support of al-Arian." The Post adds, "Tracy Billingsley, a spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons, said prison officials will force-feed al-Arian through a tube if he appears close to death. 'We would not let an inmate die,' she said. " The Post notes, "A federal jury in Tampa deadlocked in 2005 on nine charges that al-Arian aided terrorists and acquitted him of eight other counts. He then pleaded guilty to one count of supporting a Palestinian terrorist organization. Sentenced to 57 months, including time already served, he was expected to be released from prison and deported this year. … But prosecutors want al-Arian to testify in their probe into whether the network of Muslim charities, businesses and think tanks was financing terrorist organizations, according to court documents. He has twice refused and been held in contempt by a federal judge. As much as 18 months could be added to his prison term unless he agrees to testify. … On Jan. 21, al-Arian stopped eating, supporters said. He has had only water since then, and several days not that. Federal marshals recently moved him from Northern Neck Regional Jail in Warsaw, Va., to a federal medical prison in Butner, N.C., federal officials and supporters said. … Al-Arian is trying to rally public support so prosecutors will stop trying to make him testify, said Agha Saeed, chairman of the American Muslim Taskforce for Civil Rights and Elections, a coalition of Muslim groups. The former University of South Florida professor has accused prosecutors of violating his plea agreement with the Justice Department, which he contends does not require his cooperation. … David N. Kelley, a former U.S. attorney who prosecuted terrorism cases in New York, said it is a common tactic for prosecutors to seek additional testimony from someone already convicted. 'In many instances, you are remiss if you don't pursue that,' he said."

UK Report Warns Of Growing Threat From Al Qaeda. The Washington Times/London Sunday Telegraph (2/26, Rayment) reports, "Al Qaeda has established a foothold in most countries across North Africa and the Middle East and poses a far graver threat to Britain than previously thought, according to a report being circulated among British security departments. Titled 'Extremist Threat Assessment,' the document, which was drawn up this month, also predicts that Afghanistan will supersede Iraq as the main location for terrorists planning violent acts against the West. The secret intelligence document says that the number of locally based Islamist terrorists involved in plotting suicide attacks against 'soft' targets in Britain could number more than 2,000."

WSJournal Says Europe Undermining War On Terror. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, 2.04M) editorializes, "The capture of an alleged Islamist terrorist recruiter in Milan four years ago in an operation carried out by U.S. and Italian intelligence could have been a model for transatlantic cooperation in counterterrorism. Instead, it is becoming Exhibit A in how European politicians are working against the U.S., undermining the fight against Islamic terrorism and endangering the NATO alliance. ... If the CIA agents did anything wrong, that's up to American authorities to decide. ... Since the 9/11 attacks in the U.S., many European leaders have been playing a double game, working with the U.S. to root out terrorist plots on the sly -- and saving countless lives -- while publicly condemning 'American methods' in rhetoric that has fed rising anti-Americanism."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

NYPD Concerned Over Potential Attack By Iranian Agents. Newsweek (3/5, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports, "Increasing tensions between Washington and Tehran have revived New York Police Department concerns that Iranian agents may already have targeted the city for terror attacks. Such attacks could be aimed at bridges and tunnels, Jewish organizations and Wall Street, NYPD briefers told security execs last fall, according to a person with access to the briefing materials who asked for anonymity because of the sensitive subject matter." Newsweek notes, "NYPD officials have worried about possible Iranian-sponsored attacks since a series of incidents involving officials of the Iranian Mission to the United Nations. In November 2003, Ahmad Safari and Alireaza Safi, described as Iranian Mission 'security' personnel, were detained by transit cops when they were seen videotaping subway tracks from Queens to Manhattan at 1:10 in the morning. The men later left New York."

Most Passengers Consent To Scan By "X-Ray Machine." The Christian Science Monitor (2/26, Bowers, 59K) reports, "Most passengers asked to submit to a full-body X-ray at Security Checkpoint B didn't bat an eyelash. Nine in 10 gamely stepped up to a scanner about the size of a vending machine, placed their feet on the red footprints painted on the carpet, and raised their arms – all in the name of airport security. The aim of the new technology unveiled Friday at Phoenix Sky Harbor International Airport: to allow officials to detect weapons – such as plastic explosives strapped to the body – that metal detectors and other security measures might miss. … A traveler would have to have set off alarms on the routine metal detector, or be randomly selected for further screening. Even then, travelers have two options: the new X-ray machine, or a pat-down, which has caused passenger complaints about invasiveness."

Bees Used To Detect Explosives. The CBS Evening News (2/25, story 7, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "In the wild bee's acute sense of smell helps them find flower nectar. In the lab that sense of smell can be retrained to recognize anything from explosives to rotten food. … Animals, especially dogs are already used to sniff out drugs or weapons. But they're not 100 percent reliable. They get bored. And they're only as good as their handler. Bees, say scientists, are foolproof. … As for detecting explosives, it's even attracted the attention of the US Weapons Testing Lab in Los Alamos."

Expanded DHS Fingerprinting System Spurs Privacy Concerns. The New York Times (2/26, Liptak, 1.16M) writes, "Foreigners arriving at the American border must present both index fingers for fingerprinting, but that will soon change. The Department of Homeland Security now wants 10 fingers. The two-print system was largely a biometric backup, an added level of security to supplement and verify a passport or a visa. The 10-print system adds a powerful investigative tool. 'When we have a fingerprint of a terrorist who has left behind a bomb or an I.E.D. in Iraq or has left his fingerprint in a safe house somewhere, we don't always have the two index fingers,' Paul Rosenzweig, a Department of Homeland Security official, said at a briefing in December." However, the Times adds that "people concerned about privacy and civil liberties say they fear the creation of gigantic biometric databases ripe for data-mining abuse. They note that Mr. Rosenzweig was a supporter of the Total Information Awareness program at the Defense Department, which had planned, as the Pentagon put it, to create 'ultralarge all-source information repositories.'"

Scope Of DHS Personnel System Overhaul Reduced. The Washington Post (2/26, Barr, 690K) "Federal Diary" column reports, "MaxHR is out. Human Capital Operational Plan is in. The name change at the Homeland Security Department reflects a new set of priorities aimed at improving how thousands of Border Patrol, customs and immigration officers are hired and how career leaders are chosen and trained. But the name change -- from trendy branding to prosaic government jargon -- also can be taken as a symbol of how one of the Bush administration's signature efforts to shake up the federal workforce lost momentum because of overly ambitious goals, adverse court rulings and budget cuts. The shift to the new plan means that a key goal of the Bush White House -- to use about 110,000 Homeland Security employees as a model for a rigorous pay system with raises linked to job performance ratings -- will not be completed before the presidential election in 2008, leaving it to a new White House team to forge on or abandon that effort."

WAR NEWS:

Democrats To Take On War Authorization Without GOP Help. Coverage of Democratic efforts to rewrite the 2002 resolution authorizing the use of force in Iraq focused on the unlikelihood of their winning any GOP support, even from Republicans skeptical of the war.

NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 4, 2:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The political war of words over Iraq is escalating in Washington, D.C. This week, Senate Democrats could take the debate to a new level." NBC

(Yang) adds that Sens. Sen. Carl Levin and Joseph Biden "will propose a resolution that would revoke President Bush's sweeping military authority in Iraq, say US forces could only be used to guard the borders, train Iraqi forces and go after al Qaeda, and set a March 2008 goal for withdrawing combat troops." Biden: "It explicitly says what it is not. It is not to send troops into the middle of Baghdad, 6.2 million people, to get involved in the midst of a civil war." Yang: "Senate Democrats know they'd probably don't have enough votes to overcome the objections of Senate Republicans to this issue. But what they're hoping for" is to "pick up enough Republican votes to ratchet up the pressure on President Bush."

The Washington Times (2/26, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, appearing on both Fox News Sunday (2/25, Wallace) and ABC's This Week (2/25, Stephanopoulos), called the Democrats' intentions "the worst of micromanagement." The Los Angeles Times (2/26, Hennessey-Fiske, 850K) also quotes Rice's remark, observing that she "said the restrictions were impractical given the nature of war and counterterrorism in Iraq."

In the Washington Post (2/26, A15, 690K), Robert Novak writes, "Republican senators who have turned against the U.S. military intervention in Iraq are not interested in bailing out Democrats by approving their proposal to repeal the authorization overwhelmingly passed by Congress in 2002." If Sen. Chuck Hagel refuses to back the Levin-Biden effort, Democrats "might fall short of the 50 votes necessary for final passage, much less the 60 necessary to close off debate." President Bush "may be an unpopular president fighting an unpopular war, but Democrats are finding it hard to make war policy from Capitol Hill."

Roll Call (2/26, Pierce) reports that even as Democrats "ready a bill to rewrite President Bush's authorization for the Iraq War, Senate Judiciary ranking member Arlen Specter" is "raising constitutional questions about just what Congress can do to restrict the commander in chief's ability to wage war." In a letter to Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, Specter "called for more hearings on Congress' options regarding Iraq and specifically questioned the Democrats' nascent plan to rewrite the 2002 Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Iraq." He also "also outlined a number of ways in which Congress previously has restricted or cut off funds for war efforts," notably against President Nixon in the early 1970s.

Levin Says Democrats Will Not Cut Off Funding. On NBC's Meet the Press (2/25), Levin said, "Our differences are with the Commander in Chief and his policies, and we're going to fund the troops as long as they're there."

Lieberman Urges Continued Commitment To War. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/26, A19, 2.04M), Sen. Joseph Lieberman writes that the US now has "a new strategy, a new commander, and more troops on the ground." Antiwar lawmakers "have already made up their minds about America's cause in Iraq, declaring their intention to put an end to the mission before we have had the time to see whether our new plan will work. ... halting the current security operation at midpoint, as virtually all of the congressional proposals seek to do, would have devastating consequences."

Brownback Supports "Three-State" Proposal. Sen. Sam Brownback, on CNN's Late Edition (2/25, Blitzer), said, "I think we have to get to a political solution and that we cannot impose a military solution. … The worst thing to happen would be for us to precipitously pull out. … I really think we need to push in Iraq for a three-state, one-country solution: a Kurdish region, a Sunni region and a Shia region, with Baghdad as the federal city."

UK Troops Withdrawal Insulates Democrats From "Cut And Run" Criticism. Newsweek (3/5, McGuire, Wolffe, Dehghanpisheh, 3.12M) reports, "Several officials on both sides of the Atlantic (who all declined to be named when discussing the internal debate on security issues) say there was real consternation among Bush's aides about the prospect of a British withdrawal at a time when the president was planning to make the case for a surge of troops. … After several rounds of talks, the Americans were eventually satisfied that Britain's phased withdrawal would truly be 'conditions-based'; that the reduction in force was geared to the security situation on the ground and not a politically inspired cut-and-run." Democrats "treated the news as a flak jacket against GOP accusations that they support a policy of retreat. 'No matter how the White House tries to spin it, the British government has decided to split with President Bush,' said Sen. Ted Kennedy. … One Downing Street source told NEWSWEEK that it's 'potentially the case' that all British troops could be out of Iraq by the end of 2008."

Cost Of Iraq War May Reach $2 Trillion. Newsweek (3/5, Samuelson, 3.12M) writes, "No one knows what the wars' ultimate costs might be. But suppose that they reach $2 trillion by 2017 (the figure is cumulative, not in any one year). That's a big number, perhaps too big. It's also a wild guess.

Still, CBO estimates all federal spending over the same period (2002-2017) will total $48 trillion; war spending would be about 4 percent. In the same period, the income of the U.S. economy (gross domestic product) would total an estimated $248 trillion; war spending would be less than 1 percent of that. The point, as I said in 2002, is that we're so wealthy we 'can wage war almost with pocket change.' With hindsight, it now seems almost incontestable that the Iraq war should never have been fought. … But I am certain—now as then—that budget consequences should occupy a minor spot in our war debates."

Closing Of State-Owned Factories Blamed For Instability. Newsweek (3/5, Zakaria, 3.12M) writes, "One of the less-remarked-upon blunders of the Coalition Provisional Authority was that -- consumed by free-market ideology -- it shut down all of Iraq's state-owned enterprises. This crippled the bulk of Iraq's non-oil economy, threw hundreds of thousands of workers into the streets and further alienated the Sunnis, who were the managerial class of the country. The economic effects of this decision have been seismic. For example, Iraq's agricultural productivity has plummeted because fertilizer plants were summarily closed. Unemployment in non-Kurdish Iraq remains close to 50 percent, which helps explain why so many young men are joining gangs, militias and insurgent groups. … Paul Brinkley, a talented deputy under secretary of Defense, is trying to get the bulk of these state-owned factories up and running."

Iran's Influence In Iraq Said To Be Often Overestimated. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Ajami, 2.03M) writes, "'A cemetery of dreams.' Iran is a radical player in the world of states, to be sure, but we should not overstate its power. We should not fall for the Persian bluff. It is important that we do all we can to thwart Iran's nuclear ambitions and to checkmate it in arenas that count, but we should always remember that this is a society swimming against the tide of history and confronting the limits of its capabilities. There is an Iranian role in Iraq, but it should not be exaggerated. It is not true that the Iraqi political class marches to the Iranian drummer. It is well known that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki spent his years of exile in Syria and kept his distance from the Iranians. … The Iranians dwell virtually alone in the House of Islam, separated by language and culture, marked by their Shiism."

Bush Said To Need To Overcome "Iraq Syndrome" In Making Case Against Iran. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Duffy, 2.03M) writes, "It took the Pentagon's highest-ranking soldier, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to flatly refute the unsupported 'highest levels' statement. Then President Bush finally got around to doing the same thing. 'We don't know ... whether the head leaders of Iran ordered' it, he conceded. For all the predictable-and, evidently, unfounded-criticism about the Bush administration's trying to make a case for attacking Iran, much as it made its flawed case for attacking Iraq, there is more at stake here than politics as usual, and perhaps President Bush's forthright rejection of the 'highest leaders' charge was a tentative first step toward acknowledging it. … As a result of the many misapprehensions and misstatements made before the invasion of Iraq and in its mismanaged aftermath, we are now beset by something that can only be called the Iraq syndrome. Its symptoms may be seen not just in the cynicism of so many Americans, as reflected in the opinion polls, but also in the reflexive rejection of American pronouncements by friends and allies even, as was the case with the unfortunate Baghdad briefing, when they are tenanted upon hard, credible evidence.'

Wounded Vets' Poor Care Seen As Undermining War On Terror. Newsweek (3/5, Ephron, Childress, 3.12M), in its cover story titled, "How U.S. Is Failing Its War Veterans, reports, "How well do we care for our wounded and impaired when they come home? For a country amid what President Bush calls a 'long war,' the question has profound moral implications. We send young Americans to the world's most unruly places to execute our national policies. About 50,000 service members so far have been banged up or burned, suffered disease, lost limbs or sacrificed something less tangible inside them. … The question of after-action care also has strategic consequences. Iraq marks the first drawn-out campaign we've fought with an all-volunteer military. In practice, that means far fewer Americans are taking part in this war (12 percent of the total population participated in World War II, 2 percent in Vietnam and less than half of 1 percent in Iraq and Afghanistan). Already, the war has made it harder for the military to recruit new soldiers and more expensive to retain the ones it has. If we fall down in the attention we provide them, who's to say volunteers will continue coming forward?"

Treatment Of Wounded Iraqi Troops Described. Newsweek (3/5, Dehghanpisheh, 3.12M) reports, "During a speech last year, the then secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld noted that Iraqi security forces take casualties at

'roughly twice the rate of all Coalition forces.' That's approximately 40,000 wounded and more than 6,000 dead, grim numbers by any measure. (Both the Iraqi Ministry of Defense and the U.S. military refuse to divulge data on Iraqi wounded for 'security reasons.') … Most of the Iraqi soldiers are first transferred to a hospital in central Baghdad that, by local standards, has decent equipment and well-trained doctors. Some Sunni troops are terrified of being absorbed into the public-healthcare system, which is run by officials with ties to the Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. All the Baghdad hospitals that receive Iraqi wounded have heavy security to guard against insurgents."

Female Suicide Bomber Kills More Than 40 At Baghdad College. Coverage of a suicide bombing at a Baghdad university noted the ability of suicide bombers to inflict massive death tolls despite the ongoing crackdown, as well as the first repudiation of the crackdown by cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

The CBS Evening News (2/25, story 4, :30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "A suicide car bombing at a Baghdad college killed 41 people while a car bomb that exploded near the Iranian Embassy killed at least two civilians and wounded four others." ABC World News (2/25, story 3, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "At least 40 died when a female suicide bomber set off an enormous bomb at a college."

NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 3, 2:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "This time the target was a college where the student body is mostly Shiite." NBC (Arraf) adds, "Insurgents look for any target that will stop normal life in its tracks and show Iraqis not even soldiers can protect them."

The New York Times (2/26, Cave, Habeeb, 1.16M) reports in the most detailed print coverage of the bombing that one student "blamed Syria, Saudi Arabia and other countries for sowing destruction in his country. ... Other colleges throughout Iraq have been made targets in the past year, reflecting what is widely viewed as an attempt by Sunni extremist groups like Al Qaeda to drive out Iraq's middle class, the secular and the educated."

The Washington Post (2/26, A12, Londono, 690K) reports, "At least 39 students and nine guards were killed ... The attack was one of the deadliest in the capital since stepped-up security measures in the capital officially took effect on Feb. 14. U.S. and Iraqi officials have taken measures to limit vehicle access to markets, government buildings and other sites frequently targeted by insurgents using car bombs. But the officials have expressed concern about the difficulty of intercepting suicide bombers with explosives strapped to their bodies."

The Los Angeles Times (2/26, Susman, 850K) reports, "The attack was the second in recent weeks to target the mainly Shiite Muslim Mustansiriya University. ... [nonetheless], the Iraqi government insisted that the U.S.-Iraqi security plan launched nearly two weeks ago was succeeding. ... Students say Sadr's Al Mahdi militia virtually controls the university, enforcing conservative dress codes for women and canceling classes to honor Shiite martyrs. The militia's presence has made Mustansiriya a sectarian battleground."

USA Today/AP (2/26, Murphy) reports, "A female suicide bomber triggered a ball bearing-packed charge Sunday, killing at least 41 people at a mostly Shiite college ... The attack came as the powerful Shiite militia leader Muqtada al-Sadr said an ongoing security crackdown in Baghdad was doomed to fail because of U.S. involvement and suggested he was rethinking his cooperation."

Sadr Urges Iraqi Security Forces Not To Work With US. The CBS Evening News (2/25, story 4, :30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported Sadr "complained today that if bombs continue in Baghdad, he predicted that the US-led security crackdown is doomed to fail."

ABC World News (2/25, story 3, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "There's recent signs that Sadr wants to cooperate with the operation bringing Baghdad under control. But there's questions about whether or not that cooperation is real, and how long it might last." ABC (Marquez) adds, The US, so far, is not moving into Sadr City in great force. Analysts worry Sadr could be using the time to ferry Mahdi army leaders out of Iraq or using the US to eliminate his rivals."

The New York Times (2/26, Cave, Habeeb, 1.16M) reports, "Iraq's most powerful Shiite militant cleric publicly repudiated the new Baghdad security plan for the first time on Sunday, according to a statement distributed by his aides that said the push to quell violence was doomed to fail as long as it was directed by the American military." Without his blessing, "the prospects for continued sectarian violence and a direct conflict with American troops could increase. ... It was unclear why he would turn against the joint American-Iraqi plan, but many of his followers have been losing patience with the failure of the security push to eliminate violence against Shiites." The Al-Sadr statement "is likely to put more pressure on Prime Minister Maliki, who recently called the security plan a 'dazzling success.'"

The Washington Times/AP (2/26, Salaheddin) reports, "Many Shi'ites think bombings have continued because the Shi'ite-led government bowed to American pressure and persuaded the radical cleric Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr to take his Mahdi's Army fighters off the streets." Al-Sadr's statement "is likely to add pressure on U.S. and Iraqi forces to show results in the nearly two-week-old crackdown."

USA Today (2/26, 8A, 2.27M) reports, "According to a statement attributed to Muqtada al-Sadr, the radical Iraqi Shiite cleric has withdrawn support for a security crackdown in Baghdad. ... His militia has avoided confrontation with U.S. forces this time. There was no indication in the statement that this position would change."

The AP (2/25, Murphy) reports, "A return to the streets by the Mahdi Army forces could effectively block the security effort and raise the chances of Baghdad falling into sectarian street battles — the apparent aim of Sunni extremists seeking any way to destroy the U.S.-backed government. ... Shiite anger at the United States is running high since American soldiers on Friday detained the son of the most powerful Shiite political leader for nearly 12 hours."

Maliki Blames Sunni Mosque Attack On Al Qaeda. AFP (2/26) reports, "Iraq's Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki on Sunday blamed Al-Qaeda for a deadly bomb attack on a Sunni mosque, saying the blast proved that 'terrorists' will attack anyone, regardless of their sect. ... Suicide bomb attacks on civilian targets have become a hallmark of Sunni extremist assaults on Iraq's Shiite majority, and it is relatively unusual for such a strike to target Sunni worshippers. Maliki was at pains to stress that the attack should not be seen as sectarian in nature."

New Iraqi Troops Fly To Baghdad. The AP (2/25, Gamel) reports, "About 130 fresh Iraqi troops from the country's Kurdish north flew into Baghdad on Sunday to join the fight for the nation's capital — with the promise of a $200 bonus, nearly a month's pay. The mostly Kurdish soldiers — the first to arrive from the northern city of Irbil — were greeted by Iraqi commanders as they filed off the gray C-130 troop transport. ... The drafting of troops from the north — most former Kurdish guerrillas who fought for decades against Saddam Hussein's regime — to participate in the security crackdown in the capital has raised concerns as many speak no Arabic and are unfamiliar with the territory and urban warfare." Besides the bonus, the troops "would only be deployed for three months, then allowed to go home," according to Iraq's ground forces commander. Bonuses "underscore the eagerness of the Iraqi government to show it can rally sufficient forces."

Omar Reportedly Planning Renewed Taliban Offensive. Newsweek (3/5, Yousafzai, Moreau, 3.12M) reports, "Mullah Omar has emerged from the shadows, his field officers say, and with his inspiration they're planning a military push against U.S.-led forces like never before. NEWSWEEK has viewed a new recruiting video in which the Taliban's most notoriously cruel commander, the one-legged Mullah Dadullah Akhund, addresses an audience of some 400 men who are described as trained suicide bombers, ready to die on his order. 'Our suicide bombers are countless,' he says in a videotaped response to questions from NEWSWEEK. 'Hundreds have already registered their names, and hundreds more are on the waiting list.' Those claims, while impossible to verify, can't be discounted, either. In an interview that aired on Al-Jazeera last week, Dadullah claimed to have more than 6,000 armed guerrillas in underground hideouts and other staging areas, awaiting the moment to strike."

Talabani Reportedly Hospitalized For Exhaustion. NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 3, 2:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "There are new concerns over the health of Iraq's President Jalal Talabani. He was rushed to an Iraqi hospital and later flown to Jordan for medical treatment. His son denied that Talabani had a stroke or heart attack and said his father was suffering from exhaustion and walked off the plane on his own." ABC World News (2/25, story 3, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Officials say he's exhausted. He's been working very hard. They deny reports of a heart attack or a stroke." The CBS Evening News (2/25, story 4, :30, Mitchell, 7.66M) briefly mentioned the hospitalization.

The AP (2/25) reports, "An official at Talabani's Patriotic Union of Kurdistan party said the president has a long history of fainting when he is exhausted - a condition dating back to his years as a Kurdish guerrilla leader fighting Saddam Hussein's regime decades ago." An anonymous Jordanian doctor noted that Talabani was "not being flown in by a helicopter or transported in an ambulance," a possible sign that "his medical condition is not worrisome."

The Washington Post (2/26, A12, Londono, 690K) reports his illness in two sentences at the end of an article about a college suicide bombing. USA Today (2/26, 8A, 2.27M) also reports his illness.

Targets Of Baghdad Patrols Prove Elusive. The Washington Post (2/26, Partlow, 690K) reports on its front page, "American military commanders in Iraq describe the security plan they began implementing in mid-February as a rising tide: a gradual influx of thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops whose extended presence in the city's violent neighborhoods will drown the militants' ability to stage bombings and sectarian killings. ... But U.S. troops, Iraqi soldiers and officials, and Baghdad residents say the plan is hampered because security forces cannot identify, let alone apprehend, the elusive perpetrators of the violence. Shiite militiamen in the capital say they are keeping a low profile to wait out the security plan. U.S. commanders have noted increased insurgent violence in the Sunni-dominated belt around Baghdad and are concerned that fighters are shifting their focus outside the city. ... Many people in Baghdad express deep reservations about the Iraqi security forces' ability and desire to battle their fellow citizens. U.S. soldiers say their Iraqi counterparts are swayed more by the anti-American speeches of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr than by the public appeals of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki for even-handed enforcement."

Marines Train For Iraq Civil Affairs Duty. The Christian Science Monitor (2/26, Sasser, 59K) reports from Trenton, North Carolina, "One elderly man seemed shaken at the sight of marines striding into the Realo drugstore. ... The 5th Battalion, 10th Marine Regiment is unusual – the first active-duty unit in the Marine Corps to retrain for civil affairs work in Iraq. That means the 250 soldiers in the group will be departing from their frontline combat role to help Iraqis rebuild their cities and neighborhoods. The 5/10's six-month retraining has included study of Arabic and the Iraqi culture. The unit will be important in determining whether the US's latest – and perhaps final – initiative in Iraq works. ... The transition isn't easy for marines, who are trained to kill the enemy rather than engage in the softer skills of negotiation."

Anbar Fratricide May Escalate. The AP (2/25, Murphy) reports, "To much of the world, the meltdown in Iraq is a two-act spectacle: insurgents versus U.S.-led forces and Iraqi allies, and the sectarian bloodletting between Sunni Muslims and the majority Shiites. Yet out in the desert of the western Anbar province there is another story — told one attack at a time — of an internal struggle among Sunnis, between militant factions and those who have stood up against them. It's a fratricide that may be escalating. ... Political and religious leaders are being pushed to choose between the insurgency or the U.S.-backed government. Heads of the province's powerful desert clans also must decide if they will assist or resist the militants — setting off mafia-style turf wars along tribal lines." While "the Pentagon has learned some painful lessons about dealing with the insurgency here," it remains "difficult to recruit nervous Sunnis to the government's side."

US Says Iraq Raid Supports Claim On Iran. In a front page article, the New York Times (2/26, Glanz, Oppel, 1.16M) reports a raid on a Shiite weapons cache in the southern city of Hilla last week "is providing what American officials call the best evidence yet that the deadliest roadside bombs in Iraq are manufactured in Iran, but critics contend that the forensic case remains circumstantial and inferential." The new evidence includes "infrared sensors, electronic triggering devices and information about plastic explosives used in bombs that the Americans say lead back to Iran." But critics assert that "nearly all the bomb components could have been produced in Iraq or somewhere else in the region. Even if the evidence were to establish that Iran is the source, they add, that does not necessarily mean that the Iranian leadership is responsible." The assertion that the latest find "greatly bolsters the theory of the Iranian origin" of the weapons is "significant" because it could provide the US with "a new justification to take action against Iran." However, the evidence is "unlikely to satisfy skeptics who have been suspicious that the Bush administration is trying to lay the groundwork for attacking Iran."

Oil Ministry Casts Doubts On Draft Law. The AP (2/25, Juhi) reports, "The Oil Ministry cast doubt Sunday on statements indicating the Kurds had agreed to support a draft oil law that would divide revenues among all Iraqi factions and meet a key U.S. benchmark in Iraq. ... An Oil Ministry spokesman ... stressed that the draft law still needed to be discussed at the Cabinet level. ... The Bush administration, facing growing pressure to end the Iraq conflict, has been urging the Iraqis to finish the new oil law." The Washington Post (2/26, A12, Londono, 690K) reports that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "had promised that the law would be passed by the end of 2006."

Troops' Mental Health Needs Allegedly Not Met. The Washington Post/AP (2/26, Borenstein) reports, "Many Iraq war soldiers, veterans and their families are not getting needed psychological help because a stressed military's mental health system is overwhelmed and understaffed, a task force of psychologists found. The panel's 67-page report calls for the immediate strengthening of the military mental health system," citing "a 40 percent vacancy rate in active duty psychologists in the Army and Navy. ... The Defense Department's mental health experts hadn't read the report," but "Pentagon spokeswoman Cynthia Smith said the military is proud of its mental health services record, including a new program this year that checks up on service members after they return home to their families," while the VA's Annette Zeiss "said her agency didn't have 'an opportunity to present data (to the panel) about what the VA is really doing.'" Several veterans' advocates are quoted expressing discontent with the mental health system.

USA Today (2/26, 8A, Zoroya, 2.27M) reports that "the American Psychological Association task force said families are particularly at risk" and that the report faulted the Pentagon for failing "to implement the best mental health treatment programs across the military."

Iraqi Student Obtains Scholarship. ABC World News (2/25, story 4, 1:40, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "We have some good news from Iraq. For weeks, we've been following the struggles of one Iraqi teenager. ... Dan, whose last name we can't use for safety reasons, now has a visa to come to the U.S." Dan: "Very excited to go to the US it's a big opportunity to study there. And make a big future in me." Harris: "And Dan is scheduled to fly from Jordan to the US in just a few days. He will enroll in Thomas College shortly after that."

Dionne Claims Libby Case Explains Why Bush Has Lost Credibility On Iraq. Washington Post (2/26, A15, 690K) columnist E. J. Dionne writes, "The fabricate-and-smear cycle illustrated so dramatically during" the Libby case "explains why President Bush is failing to rally support for the latest iteration of his Iraq policy. The administration's willingness at the outset to say anything, no matter how questionable, to justify the war has destroyed its credibility. Its habit of attacking those who expressed misgivings has destroyed any goodwill it might have enjoyed. Bush and Cheney have lost the benefit of the doubt."

Elders From Taliban-Held Town Plead For Help. The New York Times (2/26, Wafa, Gall, 1.16M) reports, "Taliban fighters who seized control of a remote town [Musa Qala] in southern Afghanistan three weeks ago have started a campaign of arrests and reprisals against tribal elders and townspeople, according to tribal elders. The elders called on NATO forces and the government to move against the insurgents, even if it means bombing the town." The elders traveled to Kabul and expressed "bitterness that neither Afghan forces nor NATO troops responded when Taliban forces overran the town on Feb. 2. ... Asadullah Wafa, the governor of Musa Qala's province, Helmand, was at the NATO airbase at Kandahar discussing the situation with NATO commanders. He said that he was not aware that the Taliban had begun making arrests but that the government and NATO were poised to act."

Former Warlords Rally For Amnesty. The Christian Science Monitor (2/26, Sappenfield, 59K) reports on a man attending a rally in a Kabul soccer stadium, "He has come here to rail against [President Hamid] Karzai and the tyranny of Western nations, which have opposed an Afghan bill that would grant the mujahideen amnesty for war crimes committed during the past 25 years. ... Away from the teeming streets around the stadium, the attitudes of average Afghans take on a different air. Many express frustration that former military leaders who killed thousands and destroyed Kabul in a four-year civil war might never be brought to justice. Yet in a country still divided by tribes, tongues, and traditions, Friday's rally sent a clear message – that even now, Afghanistan's onetime warlords alone have the power to muster the masses." The amnesty bill "has been portrayed as a self-serving political ploy. Those likely to benefit most from the legislation are legislators and government officials themselves, many of whom are former mujahideen who stepped into the political vacuum following the fall of the Taliban."

US Attorney Dismissals Said To Look Political. In an "Editorial Observer" column for the New York Times (2/26), Adam Cohen writes, "Carol Lam, the former United States attorney for San Diego, is smart and tireless and was very good at her job. Her investigation of Representative Randy Cunningham resulted in a guilty plea for taking more than $2 million in bribes from defense contractors and a sentence of more than eight years. Two weeks ago, she indicted Kyle Dustin Foggo, the former No. 3 official in the C.I.A. The defense-contracting scandal she pursued so vigorously could yet drag in other politicians. … In many Justice Departments, her record would have won her awards, and perhaps a promotion to a top post in Washington. In the Bush Justice Department, it got her fired." Cohen continues, "Ms. Lam is one of at least seven United States attorneys fired recently under questionable circumstances. The Justice Department is claiming that Ms. Lam and other well-regarded prosecutors like John McKay of Seattle, David Iglesias of New Mexico, Daniel Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona — who all received strong job evaluations — performed inadequately. … It is hard to call what's happening anything other than a political purge. And it's another shameful example of how in the Bush administration, everything — from rebuilding a hurricane-ravaged city to allocating homeland security dollars to invading Iraq — is sacrificed to partisan politics and winning elections." Cohen adds, "Three theories are emerging for why these well-qualified U.S. attorney were fired — all political, and all disturbing. … 1. Helping friends. Ms. Lam had already put one powerful Republican congressman in jail and was investigating other powerful politicians. The Justice Department, unpersuasively, claims that it was unhappy about Ms. Lam's failure to bring more immigration cases. Meanwhile, Ms. Lam has been replaced with an interim prosecutor whose résumé shows almost no criminal law experience, but includes her membership in the Federalist Society, a conservative legal group. … 2. Candidate recruitment. U.S. attorney is a position that can make headlines and launch political careers. Congressional Democrats suspect that the Bush administration has been pushing out long-serving U.S. attorneys to replace them with promising Republican lawyers who can then be run for Congress and top state offices. … 3. Presidential politics. The Justice Department concedes that Mr. Cummins was doing a good job in Little Rock. An obvious question is whether the administration was more interested in his successor's skills in opposition political research — let's not forget that Arkansas has been lucrative fodder for Republicans in the past — in time for the 2008 elections." Cohen concludes, "The politicization of government over the last six years has had tragic consequences — in New Orleans, Iraq and elsewhere. But allowing politics to infect U.S. attorney offices takes it to a whole new level. Congress should continue to pursue the case of the fired U.S. attorneys vigorously, both to find out what really happened and to make sure that it does not happen again."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Halliburton Official Will Not Face SEC Charges. The Wall Street Journal (2/26) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission moved to withdraw charges against a former Halliburton Co. chief financial officer after accusing him more than two years ago of failing to ensure that the company disclosed an accounting change that was material to investors. In a filing in federal court in Houston, the SEC said it wanted to dismiss its pending claims against Gary Morris 'in the interest of justice.'"

Shareholders Push For Voice On Executive Compensation. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, B1, White, Patrick) reports, "Some shareholders are angry about soaring executive pay. Soon, they may get a voice. … Ahead of this year's annual meetings, activist investors have submitted shareholder proposals at roughly 60 companies seeking an advisory vote on executive pay, according to Institutional Shareholder Services. Targets include Citigroup Inc., Wells Fargo & Co., WellPoint Inc. and Northrop Grumman Corp." The Journal continues, "The vote would be nonbinding, but activists hope that public censure, or the threat of it, would prompt directors to curb outsized awards and better link pay with performance. The proposals come as new Securities and Exchange Commission rules requiring greater disclosure promise to cast a brighter spotlight on compensation." The Journal adds, "One company facing a shareholder proposal, insurer Aflac Inc., agreed earlier this month to give investors a nonbinding vote on executive compensation, beginning in 2009. Others, including Pfizer Inc. and Schering-Plough Corp., are discussing the possibility of similar moves. … This week, U.S. Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.), the new chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, plans to introduce a revised version of his 2005 bill that aimed to give shareholders power to veto executive-pay deals. He will hold a hearing next week on his latest measure, which instead would require advisory votes." The Journal notes, "The activists are taking a page from the British. Since 2003, United Kingdom shareholders have cast advisory votes on corporate compensation policies and how much they pay executives. Investors and companies say the practice, which began after the British government passed a law requiring it for all public companies, has generated more discussion between shareholders and boards. … But it hasn't necessarily curbed compensation."

Corporations Seen As Trying To Derail DOJ's White-Collar Prosecutions. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/26, A15), University of Florida law professor Michael Seigel writes, "Last time the public was tuned in, the Justice Department was vigorously prosecuting corporate giants such as Enron for massive frauds committed during the waning days of the stock bubble. Assisted by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, government lawyers were racking up victories in the battle against white-collar crime. One recent highlight was the October sentencing of former Enron chief executive Jeffrey Skilling to 24 years in prison." Seigel continues, "Now that the public's attention has shifted to matters such as Iraq, however, corporate America has launched a counterattack. Its goal is to derail the Justice Department's efforts to maintain a heightened level of white-collar criminal enforcement. Its success thus far starkly illustrates how power and money influence our criminal justice system. … Big business, represented primarily by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, could not attack white-collar criminal enforcement head-on. Instead, it enlisted the aid of its lawyers, including the American Bar Association and the Association of Corporate Counsel, in a more oblique assault. Their strategy was to mount an all-out offensive against a seemingly obscure trend: the Justice Department's increasing insistence that corporations waive their attorney-client privilege as part of their cooperation with government investigators." Seigel adds, "Through experience, government lawyers have learned that the efficiency of white-collar criminal prosecution can be significantly improved when companies facing indictment cooperate and provide relevant information. This way, prosecutors can get to the bottom of complex criminality and promptly indict those responsible. However, unlike an ordinary criminal who cooperates by telling what he knows, a corporation only 'knows' what its employees tell it. Often, information relevant to a prosecution has been gathered by the corporation's counsel. Therefore, to cooperate, the corporation must waive its attorney-client privilege. … In a January 2003 document known as the 'Thompson Memorandum,' Justice told its prosecutors to consider a corporation's willingness to waive its attorney-client privilege in determining whether it ought to be indicted. This is where big business and its lawyers aimed their attack. Treating attorney-client privilege as if it were a sacrosanct American institution, akin to freedom of speech, they claimed that Justice was unfairly using its tremendous power to coerce corporations into privilege waivers. The resultant erosion of the privilege would be catastrophic, they contended. This tactic even garnered the support of the American Civil Liberties Union, and together the various lobbying groups formed the Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege. … But big business smells blood. Its reaction to the McNulty memo has been negative, and its goal continues to be the outright prohibition of waiver requests. Through reintroduction of the Specter bill, it is pressing its legislative 'fix' in the new Congress, and the newly empowered Democrats -- eager for lobbyists' money -- are likely to be as responsive as their Republican predecessors. The result of a waiver prohibition, of course, would be a significant slowdown of white-collar criminal prosecutions -- exactly what the business lobby wants. And the losers, once again, would be the victims of white-collar crime: the American people."

FBI Probe Of Alaskan Influence-Peddling Focuses On Oil Industry Player. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, Carlton) reports from Anchorage, AK, "The oil industry has long enjoyed a cozy relationship with the state government here -- not to mention the residents, who receive an annual dividend from the industry." The Journal continues, "A Federal Bureau of Investigation probe of influence peddling -- which has focused on one of the oil industry's most powerful players -- is shaking up those ties. … At the center of the turmoil is closely held VECO Corp., the state's largest oil-services company, which has provided construction, engineering, management and other services for pipelines, refineries and other facilities." The Journal adds, "VECO has long been one of Alaska's most prodigious campaign contributors; Chairman Bill Allen and top VECO executives have donated a total of more than $1 million to state campaigns since 1998. A year ago, a witness saw Mr. Allen in the gallery of the state legislature passing notes to a Republican politician backed by the company -- at the same time that legislators were debating a measure to cut taxes on the industry. … In August, FBI agents swarmed into legislative offices throughout the state seeking evidence of payments to state lawmakers by Mr. Allen and his executives, according to a warrant. Since then, a cloud from the investigation has hung over the state's capital, Juneau. … In recent months, a number of Alaska politicians have publicly distanced themselves from VECO and refused to take any donations from it. The new governor, Republican Sarah Palin, made a refusal to accept any VECO donations part of her platform when she challenged former Gov. Tony Knowles -- a Democrat who had made a similar pledge." The Journal notes, "No VECO executives have been charged in the probe. FBI officials and Mr. Allen declined requests for comment. Amy Menard, an Anchorage attorney representing VECO, said, 'There is no question that VECO and some VECO executives have always, from day one, had an interest in politics. But to suggest that there has been improper or inappropriate political contributions is an unfair charge.'"

Bruno's Mixed Business Record Seen As Important Issue For Grand Jury. The New York Times (2/26, McIntire, 1.16M) reports, "It is an oft-told tale that has become part of Albany lore. Long before he became the State Senate majority leader, Joseph L. Bruno borrowed $5,000 to start a telephone equipment company, built it into a profitable business and sold it for $23 million in 1990. Born into poverty, Mr. Bruno became a millionaire. … In fact, the company had been steadily losing money, and Mr. Bruno made less than $400,000 from the transaction. As a result, Mr. Bruno began to pursue other sources of money, and those pursuits are now the subject of a federal investigation." The Times notes, "Some of Mr. Bruno's other business ventures, before and after he sold Coradian, did poorly," and his "mixed success as a businessman might have important implications for a federal grand jury investigation into his financial dealings." The Times goes on to detail Bruno's business dealings that are under FBI scrutiny.

Three Sentenced To Prison For Running Seattle-Area Brothels. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (2/24, McDonald, 124K) reported, "The three leaders of a ring of Seattle-area brothels and escort services were sentenced in U.S. District Court on Friday to two and three years in prison." Kesheng Zhu, Rujing Jiang and Yong Jun Kang, "who are all Chinese citizens and in the U.S. illegally, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to transport individuals for prostitution and conspiracy to launder money. According to court documents, Zhu and his wife, Rujing, started in the prostitution business in 2003 with the opening of the Apple Spa massage parlor in Bellevue as the front for a brothel. The business was sold to Kang in early 2004 for $10,000, then raided that April by the Eastside Narcotics Task Force. Officers found hundreds of used condoms in the massage parlor's garbage." The P-I added, "Both Zhu and Kang used a national network of prostitutes and brothels. … Most of the women were in the United States on expired visas and came from across Asia." The Seattle Times (2/23, 118K) noted on its Web site, "The three people were among nine arrested in August following a 21-month investigation by the FBI, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Seattle Police Department." The AP (2/24) also reported on the sentences.

Judge Orders Continued Detention Of Alleged Texas Syndicate Members. The Houston Chronicle (2/24, George, 530K) reported, "A federal judge ordered detention Friday for four alleged Texas Syndicate gang members who sought release pending trial. Seventeen Houston-area men are charged in an indictment that alleges murders, armed robberies and drug trafficking. The four who will remain detained after a two-day hearing this week are: Francisco Nuncio Jr., 34; Johnny Perez Jr., 35 of Houston; Robbie Lee Danas, 35, of Rosenberg; George Duran, 39, of Baytown." The Chronicle noted, "Grounds for detention were based on testimony this week from an FBI agent who has worked for five years building the case. Special Agent Randy Durney said the agency began investigating murders credited to the Texas Syndicate in 2002. … Membership is lifelong, Durney said."

The AP (2/24) reported that "Durney said federal authorities began investigating the gang after learning from confidential sources the group was responsible for a series of murders in the Houston area. Using wire taps and confidential informants, some who were gang members, Durney said the FBI learned the Texas Syndicate would routinely rob drug dealers at their homes. … During his lengthy testimony, Durney described how gang members would meet, sometimes at bars or at family barbecues, to vote on whether to kill other members."

Louisiana Woman Pleads Guilty To FEMA Relief Fraud. The Baton Rouge Advocate (2/24, 98K) reported, "A Baton Rouge woman pleaded guilty in federal court to one count of making a false claim for disaster assistance benefits. According to court documents, Latoya Dunn submitted a fraudulent application for FEMA benefits, falsely claiming that her primary residence had been damaged during Hurricane Katrina. The Federal Emergency Management Agency mailed Dunn a $2,000 check."

Ohio Broker Charged With Investment Fraud. The Toledo Blade (2/17, Reiter) reported, "The former manager and vice president of a Toledo brokerage firm was charged…in federal court in a $17 million-to-$40 million investment scam. William A. Sirls of Grosse Ile, Mich., was charged in U.S. District Court in Toledo with money laundering and mail fraud. A bill of information filed in the court alleges Mr. Sirls, who was manager and vice president of a Toledo Wachovia Securities office, engaged in fraudulent investment transactions to bilk investors, co-workers, and others in a Ponzi scheme. … But Toledo attorney Stephen Hartman said the case against his client emerged only after Mr. Sirls went to authorities late last year and confessed. … 'He turned himself in and voluntarily came in and told authorities about his activities. He never did get caught,' Mr. Hartman said."

Montana Man Sentenced To Five Years In Prison For Online Solicitation. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (2/24, McNerthney, 124K) reported, "A Montana man was sentenced in federal court Friday to five years in prison and 15 years of supervised release for traveling to Washington state and attempting to have sex with a minor. Andy Maxfield , 55, was arrested…at a Holiday Inn in Kent, where police say he intended to meet a 13-year-old girl. He had been investigated since June 2006 when he entered an online chat room…and contacted a federal investigator posing as the girl's mother, Department of Justice officials said. … The former bus driver also made arrangements to engage in sexual activity with the minor, the documents said." The P-I noted, "Maxfield's case was brought as part of Project Safe Childhood -- a nationwide initiative designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse."

States Consider Easing Sex-Offender Residency Restrictions. USA Today (2/26, 1A, Koch) reports, "Oklahoma state Rep. Lucky Lamons was a police officer for 22 years. He calls himself a 'lock-'em-up kind of guy.' … Yet Lamons wants to loosen his state's law that bans registered sex offenders from living within 2,000 feet of a school or day care center. He says it forces many offenders to live in rural areas where they are difficult for authorities to monitor. Also, he says, it does not differentiate between real predators and the type of men he recalls arresting for urinating in public, a sex offense in Oklahoma. … 'We need to focus on people we're afraid of, not mad at,' says Lamons, a Tulsa Democrat who wants the rules to focus more on high-risk offenders." USA continues, "Lamons is among a growing number of officials who want to ease the 'not-in-my-backyard' policies that communities are using to try to control sex offenders. In the past decade, 27 states and hundreds of cities have reacted to public fear of sex crimes against children by passing residency restrictions that, in some cases, have the effect of barring sex offenders from large parts of cities. They can't live in most of downtown Tulsa, Atlanta or Des Moines, for example, because of overlapping exclusion zones around schools and day care centers." USA adds, "Now a backlash is brewing. Several states, including Iowa, Oklahoma and Georgia, are considering changes in residency laws that have led some sex offenders to go underground. Such offenders either have not registered with local police as the laws require or they have given fake addresses. Many complain they cannot find a place to live legally. … The push to ease residency restrictions has support from victims' advocates, prosecutors and police who say they spend too much time investigating potential violations. … They're battling a mountain of momentum, however, because residency restrictions remain popular. … New or expanded ones have been proposed in 20 states this year. Some legislators are reluctant to pare back restrictions they passed only recently."

Retired Georgia Teacher Becomes Whistleblower Over Reading Program. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/26) reports from Savannah, GA about reading teacher Cindy Cupp, who "rose to the top — becoming Georgia's director of reading instruction — before she retired and created her own brand of 'Dick and Jane' textbooks. But four years ago, Cupp found herself in a fight over her storybooks that led from her port city all the way to Washington." The AJC continues, "Cupp had no idea what she was getting into in 2003 when she tried to have her 'Dr. Cupp Readers' approved for use in Reading First, a major federal initiative promising to make all children successful readers by fourth grade. Cupp just figured her company could benefit from the $6 billion flowing to schools for new reading programs. … Now, after years of pursuing perceived wrongs that blocked Cupp Publishers from winning lucrative contracts, she stands as a key whistle-blower whose complaints helped touch off a federal audit of the Georgia Department of Education, a shake-up at the U.S. Department of Education and possible congressional hearings on conflicts of interest that may have compromised Reading First." The AJC adds, "Nearly 150 elementary schools, including some in Atlanta and in Clayton and DeKalb counties, are serving 53,000 Georgia students through Reading First. So far, nearly $100 million has been spent statewide on textbooks, training and reading specialists. … Cupp's curriculum — which teaches children to read with phonics instruction, where students decipher the sounds letters make, and by tutoring in common words — is used in about 80 elementary schools. Only three are part of Reading First. … State and federal officials have said mistakes made in implementing the program have been corrected, but deny taking any intentional actions that may have favored big national publishers with connections over smaller companies such as Cupp's. … Now Cupp is waiting to hear whether the U.S. Department of Justice will open another investigation as she continues her life's work: visiting schools to assist teachers, checking students' progress and prescribing remedies for those who struggle."

WPost Praises SCOTUS Decision On Tobacco Trial Award. The Washington Post (2/26, A14, 690K) editorializes that "regardless of what you think about tobacco companies, you should welcome last week's Supreme Court decision that repudiated an $80 million ruling against Philip Morris. … The issue…revolved around how the jury calculated the size of the punitive damages it awarded Mr. Williams's estate -- almost all of the $80 million package."

Virginia Officials Try To Make Ice Center Accessible. The AP (2/26, Karush) reports, "When Arlington County (VA) officials unveiled a new ice complex to serve as the Washington Capitals' practice facility, they emphasized it would also be a community resource serving diverse groups, particularly the disabled. … So Rosemary Ciotti, who lives nearby and uses a wheelchair, was particularly dismayed when she visited the new facility shortly after it opened in November and discovered there was no room in the bleachers for her to watch the action on the ice. Despite its $42.8 million price tag, the Kettler Capitals Iceplex is not compliant with the Americans with Disabilities Act." The AP continues, "Another disabled Arlington resident, Sheri Denkensohn, said she visited the iceplex after hearing about the problems from Ciotti. Outraged by what she saw, she filed a complaint with the Justice Department. … Arlington officials say such glitches are common in construction projects. They say they already have addressed most of the ADA problems that were noted by building inspectors before the facility opened and are working to correct the problem with the bleachers." The AP adds, "In April, the Special Hockey International Tournament is expected to draw 1,500 people to the iceplex. In March, USA Disabled Hockey and other groups are hosting a sled hockey clinic there. Officials said the bleachers should be fixed in time for both events. … Construction of the iceplex was paid for by the county, and the Capitals signed a long-term lease. The 137,000-square-foot facility, built atop a seven-story public parking garage in Arlington's Ballston neighborhood, has two NHL-sized rinks, office space and locker rooms, as well as a Capitals training center with a weight room and medical facilities. It also houses the front offices of the Capitals and the WNBA's Washington Mystics. …

Congress To Revisit Gays In Military Issue. ABC World News (2/25, story 5, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "On Capitol Hill this week, Congress is set to revisit the divisive issue of gays and lesbians in the military. ... Part of the rationale here, at a time when the military is struggling to fill its ranks, it can't afford to turn qualified people away." ABC (Tapper) added, "Decorated Air Force Staff Sergeant David Hall wants to fly missions in Iraq and was training to be a pilot." Hall: "To have that taken away from me, it was devastating." Tapper: "Hall is one of more than 11,000 gay and lesbian service members discharged under the 'don't ask/don't tell' policy enacted in 1993. ... One government study found that 8% of the discharged gay soldiers held critical occupations, including 322 with skills in an important language, such as Arabic, Farsi or Korean. Public opinion has shifted. In 1993, only 44% of the American people supported letting gays and lesbian troops serve openly. In 2004, 63% supported their serving openly."

Genealogist Says Thurmond Family Owned Sharpton's Ancestor. ABC World News (2/25, story 6, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Today, one of the country's most outspoken civil rights activists went public with what he calls a chilling discovery. The Rev. Al Sharpton has just found out slavery connects him to a long-serving US Senator, the late Strom Thurmond of South Carolina who once used his power to fight for segregation." ABC (Jamieson) added Sharpton's "ancestors were slaves to the family of Strom Thurmond, hardline opponent of civil rights during many of his 50 years in the Senate, and candidate of the Dixiecrat Segregationist Party in 1948." NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 10, ;20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported the New York Daily News "says it found documents showing that some of Sharpton's ancestors were slaves once owned by Thurmond's relatives. Sharpton called the report chilling."

The Washington Post (2/26, A1, Shulman, 690K) reports "revelation was particularly stunning for the juxtaposition of the two men's public lives." The New York Times (2/26, B3, Santos, 1.16M) reports Sharpton "said he had not heard from the Thurmonds and had no immediate plans of contacting them. 'This is not family,' he said firmly. 'This is property.'" USA Today/AP (2/26) reports, "Some of Thurmond's relatives said the nexus also came as a surprise to them. Doris Strom Costner, a distant cousin who said she knew the late senator all her life, said Sunday she 'never heard of such a thing.'"

UCLA To Create Chair For Sexual Orientation Law. The Los Angeles Times (2/26, Gordon) reports, "Thanks to a more than $1-million donation from a gay male couple who hope one day to marry in California, UCLA's law school is planning to establish what is described as the nation's first endowed academic chair in sexual orientation law." The Times continues, "The cash gift from John McDonald and Rob Wright will help fund the research of a still-to-be-named professor at UCLA Law School's Williams Institute on Sexual Orientation Law and Public Policy. That 5-year-old think tank investigates such topics as anti-homosexual discrimination, the impact of the military's don't ask-don't tell policies and the demographics of same-sex couples who have adopted children. … 'This is going to support legal scholarship, legal research and education that covers a whole area so fundamental to creating change,' said McDonald, a retired businessman and attorney who earned his bachelor's degree at UCLA. 'We just think this is one of the best things we've ever done.'" The Times adds, "The UC system recently approved an agreement to accept the money, but formal establishment of the chair awaits a review to ensure that it matches UC's research and teaching missions and is not too narrowly drawn, system officials said. Although the research topics may upset social conservatives, approval is expected. … The donation for the chair was announced publicly in connection with a Williams Institute conference Friday at the Westwood campus." The Times notes, "Though some universities have chairs in gay and gender studies, those have been in the humanities and social sciences and not in a law school, said Brad Sears, executive director of the Williams Institute. A professor from the current UCLA law faculty will be appointed to the chair in three to six months, and the funds will help pay for such things as teaching assistants and research costs, Sears said."

Republican Vern Buchanan won his seat by a mere 369 votes over Democratic challenger Christine Jennings, who has nonetheless refused to concede and has sued to demand a new election. TXU Board Accepts $45 Billion Takeover Bid From Private Equity Group. The Washington Post (2/26, A4, Mufson, Cho) reports, "TXU, the largest energy provider in Texas, agreed last night to a $45 billion buyout that would not only be the largest private-equity deal in history but would also feature an unusual twist: The buyers have promised environmental groups they would cancel a slew of coal-fired power plants on the firm's drawing boards." The Post continues, "The buyout firms' deal with environmental groups, which could become a landmark in the battle over climate-change policy, would force an abrupt turnaround in the strategy of TXU, which has defied environmentalists' and congressional criticism of its plans to expand coal use and carbon dioxide emissions." The Post adds, "The environmental agreement was the idea of the private-equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, which made it a condition of the acquisition, according to several sources involved in the negotiations, who gave details of the deal on condition of anonymity because it had not been announced yet. … Texas Pacific's head, David Bonderman, is no stranger to creative deals in the energy sector or in the cause of environmentalism. Bonderman sits on the boards of the World Wildlife Fund and the Grand Canyon Trust. He was a key figure in negotiating with power plants in Arizona to reduce air pollution over the Grand Canyon. In the TXU case, he tasked William K. Reilly, who had led the Environmental Protection Agency under President George H.W. Bush, to reach out and negotiate with environmental groups." The Post notes, "If shareholders approve the acquisition, TXU would back federal legislation that would require reductions in carbon dioxide emissions through a cap-and-trade system. It would shelve plans for eight of 11 coal-fired plants that current TXU executives had proposed for Texas and would drop plans to build new coal plants in Pennsylvania and Virginia. The company would also double its spending to promote energy efficiency, to $80 million a year, for five years."

The Dallas Morning News/AP (2/26) reports, "Final details were still being worked out late Sunday, and TXU was expected to announce a deal early Monday, said the people, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the companies had not officially announced the deal." The AP adds, "Since a turnaround that began in 2004, TXU has become highly profitable, but the dramatic rise in its stock price had stalled, making it an attractive takeover target. … KKR and Texas Pacific Group agreed over the weekend to drop most of TXU's ambitious plans for building eight new coal-fired power plants, a move designed to win support for the deal from environmentalists and other critics of the company. … The new buyers also agreed to support a mandatory national program to cap emissions of greenhouse gases and pledged not to build coal-fired plants outside Texas."

The Wall Street Journal (2/26, Smith, Berman, Sender) reports, "For years, cash-rich buyout firms have tried to break into the lucrative electricity business only to be rebuffed by wary regulators, consumer groups and environmentalists. Now, in what would be the biggest leveraged-buyout ever, an investor group is hoping it has cracked the code." The Journal continues,. "A total of seven firms -- led by Kohlberg, Kravis, Roberts & Co., Texas Pacific Group and Goldman Sachs Group -- are close to signing a deal to buy utility powerhouse TXU Corp. for $32 billion plus more than $12 billion in TXU debt, according to people familiar with the matter. In a creative twist, the firms have moved quickly to pre-empt opposition from powerful environmental groups while seeking support from various regulators and politicians. Already, the potential buyers have promised to cancel plans to build all but three of the company's 11 coal-fired plants under development. And they are planning to placate consumers with rate reductions." The Journal adds, "The deal marks a quantum leap in the political sophistication of the buyout world, and may signal a broader remaking of private equity's image in the utility industry. Buyout firms have generally received a chilly reception from utility regulators because they're seen as temporary, profit-driven caretakers not answerable to public shareholders or sensitive to consumers. If the prospective TXU buyers can overcome that perception, they could potentially open the door for more private-equity investors. … A successful deal will also create a chance to profit from a central predicament facing today's utility industry: a public that hungers for more and more electricity to burn, but has limited will to build new plants for providing it. … But it's far from a sure thing. Regulators at all levels of government could trip up the deal. It may also be subject to complaints from consumers who regard reasonably priced electrical service as a basic right."

Deal Is Unique In Corporate-Environmental Cooperation. The New York Times (2/26, Sorkin) reports, "About two weeks ago, Fred Krupp, the president of a nonprofit advocacy group called Environmental Defense, received an unusual phone call. … William K. Reilly, the former administrator for the Environmental Protection Agency under President George H. W. Bush, was on the other end. But before Mr. Reilly would explain the reason for his call, he said he needed an assurance from Mr. Krupp that he would keep the conversation confidential." The Times continues, "After receiving such a pledge, Mr. Reilly dropped a bombshell: the TXU Corporation, the Texas energy giant that had become the whipping boy of the nation's largest environmental groups, was in talks to be sold to a group led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and Texas Pacific Group, two large private equity firms. … Mr. Reilly, who works for Texas Pacific, said he wanted to negotiate a cease-fire. If the investors succeeded in taking over TXU, Mr. Reilly said, they would commit themselves to scale back significantly on TXU's plan to build 11 new coal plants and adhere to a strict set of environmental rules. In return, he wanted the support of Mr. Krupp and his peers, who had spent the past several months waging a bitter and public war against TXU." The Times adds, "Last night, after several weeks of marathon negotiations that brought together both environmentalists and Wall Street bankers, the board of TXU was moving toward a vote to accept the bid from Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific for about $45 billion, which would be the largest buyout in history. … The deal would be noteworthy not just for its size, but for the confluence of business decisions and environmental concerns that drove the ultimate transaction. Because private equity firms are unregulated and historically have valued their privacy, neither Kohlberg Kravis nor Texas Pacific were eager to become an "enemy combatant" of the environmental groups, people involved in the talks said. Reducing the coal plant initiative will also free up billions of dollars in planned spending that the firms will be able to use for other projects or to help finance the transaction."

Kravis An Old Hand At The Takeover Game. The New York Times (2/26, Thomas) reports, "He has been there, done that, and now, close to 20 years after clinching the grandest buyout deal ever, Henry R. Kravis seems to be doing it again." The Times continues, "As always, the raw numbers loom large: $45 billion for the proposed buyout of the TXU Corporation, compared to $39 billion for the Blackstone Group's recent deal with Equity Office Properties and $25 billion for his RJR Nabisco takeover in 1988. … As this era's generation of hedge fund executives and private equity moguls use their billions to buy art, assume leadership roles in New York's cultural institutions and publicly celebrate their successes, they are working from a two-decade-old playbook of one of Wall Street's oldest masters, Mr. Kravis himself." The Times adds, "In contrast to the giddy exuberance of this era's newly minted billionaires, however, Mr. Kravis, who is 63, is making his resurgence not only as a cornerstone of New York's social and financial landscape, but also as a seasoned executive whose survival of a series of tough business setbacks and personal tragedies during the 1990s has given him a more measured perspective. … 'Look, don't congratulate us when we buy a company, congratulate us when we sell it,' Mr. Kravis said in an interview he gave to the Academy of Achievement. 'Because any fool can overpay and buy a company, as long as money will last to buy it.' … It's a telling comment, and according to people who know him it has become a favored maxim for Mr. Kravis, one that he trots out whenever anyone tries to praise him for a large deal. In this heady period, a deal maker's time on the mountaintop can be short indeed."

Tribune Mulls Late Offer From Real Estate Magnate. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A12, Ellison) reports, "Despite considering a late-breaking bid from Chicago real-estate magnate Sam Zell, Tribune Co.'s board is inching closer to a "self-help" restructuring deal it will implement on its own, say people familiar with the situation." The Journal continues, "The board met with its advisers Saturday for an update on the five-month-old auction. Unlike the past couple of board meetings, it issued no statement afterward. Tribune -- which owns the Los Angeles Times, the Chicago Tribune and 23 television stations -- has promised shareholders a resolution of the auction by March 31." The Journal adds, "Mr. Zell's offer to take the company private emerged after the deadline for offers last month. People familiar with the situation noted that his proposal is structured in a way that would take time to implement, a strike against it for executives. … The board's preferred plan continues to be a recapitalization involving a spinoff of Tribune's TV stations and the payment of a big dividend to shareholders. Such a plan could involve buying out part of the 20% stake in Tribune held by the Chandler family, the company's biggest shareholder and the instigator for the sale process last year."

The New York Times (2/26, Seelye, Sorkin) reports, "Mr. Zell, 66, has never owned a major media property, but gained the nickname the 'Grave Dancer' for his ability to spot and exploit undervalued properties in the real estate business. … His proposal would involve buying the entire company with the participation of an employee stock ownership plan, these people said. Although the deal would be highly leveraged, the employee stock plans have many tax advantages, including the ability to write off interest on debt." The Times adds, "Tribune has received two other bids, but considered both inadequate and has been putting together what it called a self-help plan in which it would spin off its two dozen broadcast outlets, keep most if not all of its 11 newspapers, and borrow money to pay shareholders a large dividend. … It has also been considering ways to buy out the Chandler family, the company's biggest shareholder, possibly with the help of the McCormick Tribune Foundation, the second largest."

The Financial Times (2/26, Chaffin, Politi) reports, "Tribune, which owns 23 television stations as well as the Los Angeles Times, Chicago Tribune and other papers, put itself up for sale last year under pressure from one of its largest shareholders. So far, the sale has drawn scant interest, forcing Tribune's board to push back their self-imposed deadline to the end of the first quarter, and highlighting investors' concerns about the future of the newspaper business. … Until Mr Zell, a real estate mogul, stepped in, Tribune had been weighing a combined offer from two billionaires, Eli Broad and Ron Burkle, and one from the Chandler family, which had originally pressed for the company's break-up. Neither, however, represented a premium to Tribune investors. … As a result, Tribune officials were leaning toward a 'self-help plan,' according to people familiar with the matter, in which the company would be split into newspaper and broadcasting divisions and offer investors a dividend. The downside of the plan is that it would add to the company's debt load, and could limit its financial flexibility."

Fate Of XM's DC Headquarters Uncertain In Merger. The Washington Post (2/26, D1, Heath) reports, "XM Satellite Radio chief executive Hugh Panero and his top engineer were exploring an abandoned printing plant in Northeast Washington back in 1999, looking for a home for their growing space-age radio company. … 'This is the greatest place I can imagine,' Panero recalled saying to himself, noting its spacious rooms and 20-foot ceilings. Not even the spent bullets strewn across the roof dissuaded him, he said last week -- though the engineer, a retired Air Force brigadier general, 'thought I was nuts.'" The Post continues, "XM bought the building. The company invested $70 million in high-tech and aerospace hardware. And as it grew into a $4.3 billion enterprise that today employs more than 700 people, it helped turn the area around New York and Florida avenues NE from a strip of boarded-up buildings into a growing commercial center with a Metro stop, office and condo space and the future headquarters of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … But XM itself has been on a wild ride, losing more than $3 billion over the past seven years. Its stock, which had rocketed from $2 to nearly $40 a share , closed at $15.10 Friday, four days after the company announced its plan to merge with its New York-based rival, Sirius Satellite Radio." The Post adds, "The $13 billion deal is far from a lock, because the companies will have to overcome antitrust regulatory hurdles. But inside XM and elsewhere in Washington there was concern that the District might lose a company that had added some cutting-edge glamour to a business community better known for its government contractors. … Sirius chief executive Mel Karmazin, who would run the merged company, said in an interview that XM's headquarters building is a valuable asset and that he might even expand its workforce. But there was an anxious mood last week in the XM hallways -- where dimly lit studios have names like XM Kids and Liquid Metal, and the conference rooms are labeled Sinatra, Springsteen and Hendrix."

Western States To Sign Regional Climate Change Compact. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, 2.04M) reports that as leaders "at the state level decided much more needs to be done to address climate change, five Western states -- California, Arizona, New Mexico, Oregon and Washington -- will announce at the National Governors Association annual winter meeting today a regional strategy to reduce global-warming emissions." The state leaders "will sign a memorandum of understanding that commits them to pursue clean-energy technology and market-based solutions toward greenhouse-gas emissions."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Bonds Attorney Says He Will Not Cooperate With Steroid Probe. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/26, Fainaru-Wada, Williams) reports, "Major League Baseball's top steroids investigator has urged Giants star Barry Bonds and other players tied to the BALCO drug scandal to submit to interviews and turn over their medical records, The Chronicle has learned. … But Bonds' lawyer said Sunday that the Giants star cannot cooperate with baseball's steroids investigation as long as he remains the focus of a possible perjury indictment." The Chronicle continues, "In a Feb. 1 letter, George Mitchell, the former U.S. Senate majority leader who is threatening that Congress may intervene if his investigation of performance-enhancing drug use in baseball is thwarted by lack of cooperation, urged Bonds and the other players to cooperate for the sake of the game. … 'Nothing is more important than the integrity of the game of baseball,' he wrote." The Chronicle adds, "Copies of Mitchell's letter, which was read to The Chronicle by a person with knowledge of the investigation, were sent to Bonds, Detroit Tigers outfielder Gary Sheffield and other players. … Bonds, Sheffield and six other present and former players testified in 2003 before the federal grand jury that investigated the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid ring. The players were implicated in the use of BALCO's banned drugs, according to evidence in possession of federal investigators, but none was accused of a crime. … Mitchell's letters were accompanied by medical waiver forms that, if signed, would allow baseball investigators access to a player's past, current and future medical records." The Chronicle notes, "Contacted for comment, Michael Rains, Bonds' lawyer, said he had told Mitchell that Bonds wanted to help but was unavailable as long as he faces possible indictment. … 'I said, "I'm sorry, but I have to give him that advice," ' Rains said. … For almost two years, federal authorities have been investigating whether Bonds testified falsely when he told the BALCO grand jury that he had never knowingly used banned drugs. As recently as November, then-U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan refused to comment on the status of the probe, Rains said. … If Schools, the new U.S. attorney, seeks an indictment of Bonds, the government's evidence of steroid use in baseball might become public in court proceedings -- and thus available to Mitchell. If the perjury investigation is dropped, Mitchell might get access to the prosecutor's witnesses and documents from the government itself."

Former Fugitive Gets 12-Year Sentence In Drug Conspiracy Case. The Ashtabula (OH) Star-Beacon (2/25) reported "convicted drug dealer fugitive Thomas J. MacWilliams is headed to 12 years and seven months in federal prison after being sentenced Feb. 14…in Clarksburg, W.Va." MacWilliams "fled Ashtabula County in 2005 after being convicted…of drug-related conspiracy charges. … A year-long search ended on May 7, 2006 when MacWilliams was apprehended by Harrison County drug task force officers. TAG and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration officials had received numerous tips on MacWillaims whereabouts, according to TAG task force commander Sgt. Jeff Orr."

LATimes Profiles Cali Cartel "Betrayer." In a lengthy story out of Miami, the Los Angeles Times (2/24) reported the "official end of the notorious Cali cocaine cartel came late last year here with little more commotion than the rap of a judge's gavel. The Colombian drug lords Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, 63, and Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela, 67, entered guilty pleas and were ushered off to federal prison for the next 30 years. … But behind the bloodless fall of the ruthless Orejuela brothers and collapse of their $7-billion-a-year empire lies a little-known story of daring and betrayal. Aiding U.S. drug agents unexpectedly and at great risk was a senior cartel official, the head of security and intelligence for the syndicate. … He used to be Jorge Salcedo."

"Guru Of Ganja" To Get Help Paying Legal Fees. In a widely reported story, the AP (2/26) reports comedian Tommy Chong "will help raise money to defend the self-proclaimed 'Guru of Ganja,' who is charged with growing hundreds of marijuana plants for a dispensary. Chong…will appear at a $125-per-person event for Ed Rosenthal." Rosenthal is "scheduled to appear in federal court March 19." Federal prosecutors "accused Rosenthal of growing marijuana, laundering money and falsifying tax returns from October 2001 through February 2002."

Hells Angels Racketeering Case Heads To Trial In Seattle. The Seattle Times (2/26, Bowermaster) reports, "Jury selection begins today in a massive federal racketeering case being brought against current and former members of the Washington Nomads chapter of the Hells Angels." The Times continues, "Prosecutors allege that the Nomads' president and three others engaged in a long list of crimes, from murder, kidnapping and witness tampering to extortion, robbery and interstate trafficking of stolen Harley Davidson motorcycles, according to a 19-count indictment filed in the case. … The government intends to call 125 to 150 witnesses and take 10 weeks to present its case in U.S. District Court in Seattle, according to a pre-trial brief filed last week." The Times adds, "It is the latest in a string of racketeering cases that the Justice Department has brought against motorcycle gangs around the country in recent years, including a sweeping case filed against 26 members of the Bandidos Motorcycle Club in U.S. District Court in Seattle in June 2005. … George Wegers, the national president of the Bandidos Motorcycle Club, last May pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit racketeering. Wegers received a 20-month prison sentence in October, which included credit for time served." The Times notes, "Last week, two Hells Angels motorcycle-club members were sentenced to 12 to 30 months in Nevada state prison for their roles in a bloody brawl in 2002 with rival biker-gang members at Harrah's Laughlin hotel-casino in southern Nevada that left two Hells Angels and a rival Mongol gang member dead. … The core charge in the upcoming Seattle trial, which is scheduled to begin next Monday, is that the Washington Nomads is a highly organized, criminal enterprise whose members are punishable under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO) Act, which was created to prosecute organized-crime syndicates such as the Mafia."

IMMIGRATION:

Fed Program Helps Illegal Immigrants Wire Money To Mexico. The Los Angeles Times (2/26, A1, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "Even as the federal government is starting to crack down on companies that hire illegal immigrants, it's been helping those same workers send money home, cheap. Dubbed Directo a Mexico, the Federal Reserve-sponsored service allows customers without Social Security numbers to wire money through the Fed system to Mexico's central bank at little cost." In September, the Fed "expanded the remittance program by allowing immigrants, legal or not, to open accounts at participating banks and credit unions in the U.S. or Mexico. About 27,000 transfers are made through the program each month." The program has "attracted the attention of conservative immigration activists and members of Congress, who say financial institutions shouldn't cater to illegal immigrants."

Mexican Wives Seek Return Of Husbands Working In US. The Washington Times (2/26, A1, Dinan, 88K) reports, "The women of Tecalpulco, Mexico, want the U.S. government to enforce its immigration laws because they want to force their husbands to come back home from working illegally in the United States. They have created an English-language Web page where they identify themselves as the 'wetback wives' and broadcast their pleas, both to their men and to the U.S. government. … In poignant public messages to their husbands, the women talk about their children who feel abandoned, and worry that the men have forsaken their families for other women and for the American lifestyle." According to the Times, " It's a stark reminder of an often forgotten voice in the U.S. immigration debate -- the wives, children, parents and villages left behind as millions of workers come to the U.S., many of them illegally. The plea also underscores the dual effects of migration on Mexico: Its economy needs American jobs as an outlet for workers, but determined, able-bodied workers get siphoned out of Mexico."

TAX:

California Dentist Sentenced For Tax Fraud. The AP (2/26) reports, "A Danville (CA) dentist convicted of hiding $300,000 from the IRS in a secret offshore bank account has been sentenced to two years in prison, the Justice Department said." The AP continues, "Roy Albert Lewis was sentenced Friday in U.S. District Court for income tax evasion and conspiracy to defraud the government after being found guilty in August. Judge Susan Illston also ordered Lewis to participate in a mental health treatment program and perform 100 hours of community service." The AP adds, "Lewis' medical practice paid bogus expenses over a 10-year period to Denver-based Tower Executive Resources for items such as franchise, consulting, or management fees to generate huge tax deductions, according to the Justice Department. … Tower then allegedly funneled the money into the secret account, which Lewis controlled, authorities said. … In April 2005, two Tower promoters were convicted of conspiracy and assisting in the preparation of fraudulent tax returns after a trial in Denver. … Lewis' father, Leroy Albert Lewis, 72, an oral surgeon from Danville, is still awaiting trial on fraud and tax-evasion charges, according to prosecutors."

IRS "Telephone Tax" Refunds To Cost $13 Billion. NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 8, 1:50, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Last year, the Federal Government finally stopped collecting this century old telephone tax. Now the IRS is giving some of the money back." NBC (Epperson) adds, "This is an opportunity for millions to get $30 to $60 back with this telephone tax refund. The problem is a lot of folks don't know about it and don't realize how easy it is to get this refund. All you have to do is fill out one line on the tax return to get the standard refund. If you think you're due more than $30 to $60, you'll need bills to substantiate it." Seigenthaler: "This one time refund is expected to cost the government some $13 billion."

Treasury Department Eases Tax Hike On Expatriate Workers. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A2, Wells, Herman, 2.04M) reports a new Treasury Department notice "affecting some Americans working abroad further chips away at a controversial tax increase enacted last May." Accountants say it is "too soon to gauge the precise impact on expatriates and employers, but business leaders say the move could provide significant relief in numerous cases." At issue are "details of the May law, which raised taxes on many Americans working abroad, retroactive to the start of 2006."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Members Still Taking Trips Paid For By Outside Interests. USA Today (2/26, 1A, Schouten, 2.27M) reports, "Lawmakers have continued to take trips paid for by outside groups since the House voted last month to restrict who can pay for such travel" House travel records "show that 19 members since Jan. 5 have accepted airfare, meals and lodging from special interests, including groups that employ lobbyists." Melanie Sloan, executive director "of the liberal-leaning watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington," said "the trips demonstrate that lawmakers 'are trying to see what they are going to get away with.'" Most of the travel "reported by House members would be exempt from the rules because it was paid for by groups that don't hire lobbyists." Five trips were "sponsored by organizations that lobby Congress and would face greater scrutiny by the House ethics committee."

USA Today (2/26, 5A, Schouten, 2.27M) reports that on one weekend in January, "a dozen House members gathered at a luxury Miami hotel to learn more about health care issues." They "assembled at the Mandarin Oriental, which boasts Biscayne Bay views and rooms starting at $469 a night. The trip, sponsored by the non-profit Alliance for Health Reform, is among the travel allowed under ethics rules that go into effect Thursday." Top Democrats "led by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi also agreed to exemptions that allow House members to continue taking trips to destinations such as Miami and San Juan, Puerto Rico."

House To Take Up Contentious Debate Over Union Organizing. The Los Angeles Times (2/26, Matthews, 850K) reports, "It has become the central question in union organizing fights across the country: Will the employer recognize a union after a majority of its workers sign union cards? Or will the employer insist that its workers cast secret ballots in federally supervised elections? These questions — of paper and power — move from the workplace to Congress this week, when the House is scheduled to cast the first vote in what could be a years-long legislative battle between the country's largest labor unions and most powerful business lobbies. The stakes: deciding the manner in which Americans join unions. The proposed Employee Free Choice Act would take from employers the right to decide whether to accept the signing of cards — generally called 'card check' — or demand an election. Instead, a workplace could unionize if labor persuaded a majority of employees to sign cards — without an election of all employees." The Times notes that "unions and their political allies, which for 70 years championed the secret ballot for unionizing workers, are all but abandoning the election process, arguing that aggressive anti-union tactics by businesses make such elections too difficult and costly. And business leaders, generally hostile to any government intervention in their companies, are preparing to spend millions to defend federal supervision of elections in which workers choose whether to unionize. … The House is expected to approve the legislation as soon as Thursday, but Senate prospects are less certain. Even if the bill passes Congress, President Bush has pledged to veto it."

House Committees Seeking Average 10.7% Funding Increase. Roll Call (2/26, Brotherton, McArdle) reports House committees are "proving to be a little more ambitious, at least financially, than their Senate counterparts, according to budget requests submitted to the chambers' respective administrative panels." With most committees "having turned in their requests, House panels are seeking an overall budget boost of 10.7 percent, nearly double the average Senate request of about 5 percent over funding provided during the 109th Congress." The Oversight and Government Reform Committee is "seeking an 11.6 percent increase, to $22.9 million from $20.5 million. Chairman Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) has made it clear in recent weeks he intends to increase the level of oversight done by the committee."

Roll Call (2/26, Davis) reports the House ethics committee "has requested a $6.1 million operating budget for the 110th Congress, nearly a 43 percent increase from the previous Congress. If approved by the House Administration Committee, which has jurisdiction over all House committee budgets, the investigative panel will have doubled its funding since the 108th Congress, when it had a $3 million budget."

Study Finds Congressional Web Sites Lacking. Roll Call (2/26, Brotherton) reports the Senate is "more Web savvy than the House, and Republicans are superior to Democrats when it comes to maintaining their Congressional sites — but, overall, the legislative branch is performing poorly, according to a report scheduled to be released today by the Congressional Management Foundation." The Foundation, "working with experts from Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government, the University of California at Riverside and Ohio State University," studied "615 Congressional Web sites from April to August 2006. Only 85 sites -- 14 percent -- received an 'A' compared with nearly 40 percent that received a 'D' or 'F' ranking." The results "show little improvement from 2003, the last time the foundation handed out similar awards."

Proposal To Define National Standards For NCLB Gains Momentum. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Green, 2.03M) reports that the 2002 No Child Left Behind Act "requires all states to draft standards…and to annually assess how well those standards are being met. But critics of the law argue that all the tests that have followed have not clarified matters at all. Every state administers a different test tied to different standards, and few of the state standards seem to match national ideas about what kids should know. … With hearings on No Child Left Behind starting in March, two top Senate Democrats have introduced legislation that would require the federal government to define the standards against which all states would be measured. Groups from the conservative Thomas B. Fordham Institute to the National Education Association, a teachers union, support the idea."

NCLB Said To Lack Incentives For Establishing Charter Schools. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/26, A19, 2.04M), Nelson Smith, president of the National Alliance for Public Charter Schools, writes, "The NCLB has laid bare the troubling gaps in student achievement among racial and socioeconomic groups, and it has spurred some improvement, particularly in the early grades. Yet its prescriptions for reform have provoked meager change in schools and systems that produce chronically weak results. … The act's coup de grâce, after years of failure, is to require 'restructuring' a dysfunctional school from scratch, through state takeover, contracting-out, or re-opening as a public charter school. But its impact has been stifled by legislative language allowing 'any other' step as well. Districts and states have opted to switch principals, give pep talks and hire 'turnaround specialists' instead of coming to terms with intractable failure. Indeed, according to a recent analysis by SRI International for the U.S. Department of Education, only one of 12 states with Title I schools identified for restructuring as of 2004 had reopened a school as a public charter; one turned over operations to the state; two states replaced school staff and eight took no action. Ironically, the best illustration of the NCLB's mission may be outside this whole 'turnaround' apparatus, in the open sector of public education called charter schooling, where parents, teachers and entrepreneurs are creating new schools that are publicly accountable but independent of bureaucratic rules."

Analysis Finds Welfare State Expanding. The AP (2/25, Ohlemacher) reports the welfare state "is bigger than ever despite a decade of policies designed to wean poor people from public aid." The number of families "receiving cash benefits from welfare has plummeted since the government imposed time limits on the payments a decade ago. But other programs for the poor, including Medicaid, food stamps and disability benefits, are bursting with new enrollees." The result, "according to an Associated Press analysis: Nearly one in six people rely on some form of public assistance, a larger share than at any time since the government started measuring two decades ago."

Poll Suggests Bush Remains Overwhelmingly Popular Among Republicans. USA Today (2/26, 11A, 2.27M) columnist Richard Benedetto writes, "The Washington punditocracy has proclaimed far and wide that Republicans, disenchanted with the war in Iraq, are abandoning President Bush in droves, leaving him the lamest of lame ducks. However, the latest USA TODAY/Gallup Poll suggests Bush might not be as wounded as he appears — at least not among his party faithful. The Feb. 9-11 poll puts Bush's job approval at 37%, but among people who identify themselves as Republican or leaning Republican, his approval rating is 76%. Thus, despite bad news from Baghdad and carefully crafted hand-wringing by high-profile GOP war critics in Congress such as Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, three of four Republicans in the country are hanging in there with the president."

Army Chaplains In Short Supply. The Washington Times (2/26, Altamirano, 88K) reports, "The Army Chaplain Corps now has about 520 vacancies, its most severe shortage in history. ... Despite the three-year shortage, the Army and the Army Reserve has celebrated two consecutive years of record-breaking chaplain recruitment, closing the gap between authorized and assigned positions, Lt. Col. [Kevin] Beale said. ... He credits the recent recruiting successes to post-September 11 patriotism. To attract chaplains, the Army Reserve is offering $10,000 signing bonuses for first-time officers. The Army National Guard has similar incentives, such as student loan repayment and college scholarships." Army Chaplain Ran Dolinger "said it is more difficult to recruit chaplains into the reserves than into active duty. 'A lot of churches don't want their senior [chief executive officer] to be gone,' he said."

Univision Gets Record FEC Fine Over Children's Programming. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A5, Schatz, 2.04M) reports Federal regulators "appear to be turning more attention to a perennial concern: making sure television is safer for kids. " Last week, Spanish-language broadcaster Univision Communications Inc. "agreed in principle to pay an unusually steep $24 million fine for violating the Children's Television Act, which requires broadcasters to show three hours of educational programming a week, Federal Communications Commission officials said. In exchange, the FCC will approve Univision's sale to a consortium of private-equity groups for $12.3 billion." It is "the largest fine assessed by the FCC against a company."

Smithsonian Boss Under Fire For Extravagant Expenses. The CBS Evening News (2/25, story 3, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "A Smithsonian Institution audit is focusing attention this evening on the expenses of the museum group's top officer, Lawrence Small." CBS (Attkisson) added the Smithsonian Institution is "supported by donors and $700 billion tax dollars a year. Now an independent audit and inspector general's report obtained by CBS News raise questions as to whether" Small "is being allowed extravagances that are inappropriate for a public-supported charity. Questioned expenses and policies include the method by which Small has been paid up to $179,000 a year on top of his salary to live in the house he owns. Small's wife accompanied him on a business trip to China, but auditors said she was not authorized to expense $5,000 for a side trip to Cambodia with Smithsonian donors. And they flagged Small's $14,000 charter flight to Texas, saying a first class commercial ticket would have cost just $2,000. At the time Small reportedly claimed he paid for the charter himself. But the inspector general said that's inaccurate. The trip was paid for with Smithsonian funds. While Small is living in a material world could make some corporate CEO's green with envy, the charity is said to be strapped by a tight budget."

Fed Changing Assumption On Relationship Of Inflation, Unemployment. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A1, lp, 2.04M) reports that for "decades, a simple rule has governed how the Federal Reserve views the nation's economy: When unemployment falls too low, inflation goes up, and vice versa." But Fed officials "have rethought that notion. They believe it takes a far bigger change in unemployment to affect inflation today than it did 25 years ago. Now, when inflation fluctuates, they are far more likely to blame temporary factors, such as changes in oil prices or rents, than a change in the jobless rate." One explanation "for why inflation is influenced less by changes in unemployment is that the American public has come to expect inflation to remain stable. When inflation moves up or down, it is less likely to get stuck at the new level because companies and workers don't factor the change into their expectations -- or their behavior. Another explanation is that the Fed is better at adjusting interest rates in anticipation of swings in unemployment before those swings can affect inflation."

Gasoline Prices Up 13 Cents In Two Weeks. The Houston Chronicle/AP (2/26) reports gasoline prices "soared nearly 13 cents a gallon on average nationwide in the past two weeks as the price of crude oil rose." The national average "for self-serve regular was $2.35 per gallon, up 12.8 cents since Feb. 9, industry analyst Trilby Lundberg said Sunday." Oil prices "reached a new high for the year Friday. Light, sweet crude for April delivery added 19 cents to settle on the New York Mercantile Exchange at $61.14, its highest closing price since Dec. 22."

NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 7, ;20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The latest Lundberg Survey finds gas prices have gone up nearly 13 cents a gallon in the past two weeks. And are expected to climb further as a result of disruptions over oil refineries. On average, self-service gasoline now costs 2.35 for regular."

Retired Federal Judge Sporkin Hangs Out Shingle. The Washington Post (2/26, D1, Johnson) reports, "For the first time in a legal career that spans nearly half a century, Stanley Sporkin is striking out on his own." The Post continues, "In the 1960s and '70s, Sporkin was one of the first enforcement watchdogs at the Securities and Exchange Commission. Next he became the top lawyer at the CIA. President Ronald Reagan several years later named him to a high-profile federal judgeship in the District." The Post adds, "Until his retirement in 2000, Sporkin cultivated a reputation for being an outspoken, results-oriented judge. From the bench he famously threw out an early antitrust settlement that the Justice Department struck with Microsoft and rejected on procedural grounds the Senate's bid to impeach U.S. District Judge Alcee L. Hastings (currently a member of the House of Representatives). … Now, at 75, Sporkin is trying something new." The Post notes, "He's hung out his own shingle as a lawyer and consultant, signing on as a part-time ombudsman for troubled petroleum giant BP and filling out his time by working as an arbitrator and mediator at Gavel Consulting Group. He says his favorite part of the job involves advising companies on how to keep in line with securities laws. … Sporkin continues to work out of the I Street NW office of Weil, Gotshal & Manges, the law firm where he was a partner before resigning last year because of client conflicts with his BP assignment."

Governors Seek More Funding For Children's Health Insurance. The Washington Post/AP (2/26, A5, Tanner) reports governors "from both parties appealed yesterday for the Bush administration and Congress to provide more money for a health-care program that insures millions of children." The issue concerns "coverage for 6 million people, overwhelmingly children, as well as the hopes of many governors in tackling the challenge of uninsured working families." The governors "want two things: enough money -- estimated at $745 million -- to keep the program float through October, and changes to President Bush's budget. Analysts say the president's spending plan would shortchange the program even if the number of people served does not grow."

USA Today Says Health Care Reform Gaining Traction. USA Today (2/26, 10A, 2.27M) says in an editorial that since President and Hillary Clinton's healthcare plan failed to pass Congress in the 1990s, "health-care reform has been considered too costly, in dollars and political capital, for most politicians to touch. But the beleaguered system's problems — one in seven people without insurance, rising premiums and lower reimbursements for those who have insurance, endless payment hassles — haven't gone away. Attempts at fixing them have been incremental and timid at best." That "could be about to change. Several groups that usually are at odds on health care now agree on the need for broad reform. These strange bedfellows are still a long way from agreeing on a plan, but the fact that they now see a common need signals a shift in the political dynamic." The "important point is that for the first time since the early 1990s, the stars appear to be aligning for a major effort to reshape health care in America. It's about time."

"Money Primary" Already Winnowing Presidential Field. Two national newspapers run features on the "money primary" in the 2008 presidential race. USA Today (2/26, 5A, Lawrence, 2.27M) says a "daunting mix of celebrity candidates, rich candidates and early nomination contests is prompting long-shot presidential hopefuls to give up months and even years" before the election, and since this time, "measured by polls, name recognition and money, each party has three front-runners," it will be hard for others to emerge. Political scientist Dante Scala said, "It's tough to be fourth or fifth. If Hillary falters, Obama's there. If Obama falters, Edwards is there. That's a lot to overcome." Both USA Today and the Christian Science Monitor (2/26, Feldmann, 59K) note Tom Vilsack's blunt statement that money was the only reason why he quit the race. The Monitor says "the money that donors are willing to shell out to candidates represents an important signal of a candidate's viability. Even if much of the public is not fully engaged in the intense nomination races under way in both parties, wealthy donors are. And they're voting with their checkbooks."

Early GOP Leader, But Not Early Democrat, Tends To Win Nomination. The AP (2/25, Lester) writes that while Sen. Hillary Clinton "is the clear favorite in early polls" for the Democratic nomination, that might not mean much. Republican Rudy Giuliani, "however, is sitting pretty. For at least three decades, Republicans have been far better than Democrats in early polls at getting behind the candidates who end up winning the party's presidential nomination."

Krugman Says "Early Signs Aren't Encouraging" That Campaign Will Be About Substance. In his New York Times (2/26, 1.16M) column, Paul Krugman writes, "Six years ago a man unsuited both by intellect and by temperament for high office somehow ended up running the country. How did that happen? First, he got the Republican nomination by locking up the big money early. Then, he got within chad-and-butterfly range of the White House because the public, enthusiastically encouraged by many in the news media, treated the presidential election like a high school popularity contest. The successful candidate received kid-gloves treatment -- and a free pass on the fuzzy math of his policy proposals -- because he seemed like a fun guy to hang out with, while the unsuccessful candidate was subjected to sniggering mockery over his clothing and his mannerisms. Today, with thousands of Americans and tens of thousands of Iraqis dead thanks to presidential folly, with Al Qaeda resurgent and Afghanistan on the brink, you'd think we would have learned a lesson. But the early signs aren't encouraging. … Enough already. Let's make this election about the issues."

Most Governors Holding Off On Endorsing Presidential Candidates. The New York Times (2/26, Pear, 1.16M) writes Sen. Hillary Clinton "is the front-runner and will probably win the Democratic presidential nomination." Rudy Giuliani "could do well in Mississippi. And the length of the presidential campaign is insane. Those were the views expressed Sunday by some of the foremost experts on American politics: governors gathered here for the winter meeting of the National Governors Association. A few governors have endorsed presidential candidates, but many said they were reserving judgment." Democratic governors "pleaded with their presidential candidates to ignore the fringes of the party and focus instead on the 'middle 20 percent' of the electorate with a pragmatic, problem-solving agenda." Gov. Phil Bredesen said, "Democrats certainly could not win in Tennessee with just a hard-nosed Nancy Pelosi-style Democratic agenda." But Gov. Haley Barbour "toasted the political prowess of Mrs. Clinton," saying, "She will be a formidable opponent if she is the Democratic nominee. And I think she probably will be." Barbour said "on the Republican side, 'we don't have a front-runner.' … As a result, he said, 'an unusually large number of governors are keeping their powder dry.'"

Perry, Rendell Say They Are Not Interested In Vice Presidency. The AP (2/25, Zuckerbrod) reports Govs. Rick Perry and Ed Rendell both said they are not interested in their parties' vice presidential nominations. Texas Republican Perry said, "I got the best job in the world. Ask President Bush," while Pennsylvania Democrat Rendell said, "I like to be my own boss."

Geffen Comments Introduce Bill Clinton's Indiscretions As Campaign Issue. Newsweek (3/5, Thomas, 3.12M) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign "can ill afford another scandal swirling around her husband. … They doubtless anticipate an assault from Clinton's old foes, but they may have been caught unawares by the attack from one of Bill's old friends" – David Geffen. In an interview with New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd, Hollywood mogul…Geffen tore into the Clintons' integrity and Hillary's electability. … The reaction to Geffen's remarks from the Clinton campaign was immediate and outraged." According to Newsweek, "the Clintonites were serving notice -- not for the first time -- that anyone who brings up Bill and Hillary's past marital problems will be branded a character assassin. … Dowd tells NEWSWEEK that Geffen did not seem out to get the Clintons." Dowd "says she was the one who brought up questions about Bill Clinton's past as a campaign issue. Geffen acknowledged that some big donors and celebrity Clinton supporters were fretting, as Dowd put it, 'that Bill will 'pull the focus' and shelve his wife's campaign.'"

Nevada Caucus Shakes Up Democrats' Campaigns. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Lo Scalzo, 2.03M) reports, "The state of Nevada displayed its newfound political muscle last week, with the appearance of eight Democratic presidential hopefuls (Sen. Barack Obama was the sole exception) at a forum in Carson City. With Nevada's caucus scheduled-for now, anyway-just after the Iowa caucus and just ahead of the New Hampshire primary, this quirky state seems poised to be a crucial Democratic battlefield for the '08 elections. …Citing the state's ethnic diversity (nearly a quarter of Nevada's residents are Hispanic), concentration of organized labor (about 14 percent of the workforce), and economic growth (consistently one of the nation's strongest performers), Democratic leaders believe the state offers an alternative to Iowa and New Hampshire's mostly white, rural populations." US News notes that "aside from Nevada's potential political value, it's an unusual locale to say the least, featuring legal gambling and prostitution, a booming big city and desolate hinterlands."

Clyburn Assumes Role As South Carolina Powerbroker. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Brush, 2.03M) reports Rep. Jim Clyburn "is at the center of the Democrats' most pressing concerns on Capitol Hill. As the majority whip, the No. 3 Democratic position in the House of Representatives, he's in charge of keeping the party together on votes and reaching out to the Democrats' famously broad set of interest groups. And for presidential candidates, his endorsement could swing the South Carolina primary. For the next year or two, Jim Clyburn is going to be a very popular- and powerful-man."

Democrats Work To Attract Religious Voters. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports, "One of…Clinton's first campaign hires was a top evangelical staffer on Capitol Hill. U.S. News has learned that an aide in…Obama's office tasked with religious outreach is joining his presidential campaign this week. And former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards is framing poverty relief as a moral issue that's helping to drive his campaign."

Gore Candidacy Rumors Fueled By His Personal Wealth. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Bedard, 2.03M) "Washington Whispers" reports, "If you're wondering why, despite his denials, Al Gore remains the most talked about nonpresidential candidate, it's this: His friends think he's done so well in the private world that he could bankroll the start of his own 2008 bid. 'If Al Gore wants to run, he will come with all the means necessary,' says longtime ally Donna Brazile. 'Al Gore is someone who can pull it off at half time,' she said. But he's got competing interests for his wallet: Friends say he also wants to expand his global climate change campaign."

Clinton's Stance On 2002 Iraq Vote Defended. Newsweek (3/5, Alter, 3.12M) writes, "Hillary Clinton is right to resist efforts to make her cry uncle and apologize for her 2002 vote in favor of the Iraq-war resolution; that would look weak. Her mistake was in not anticipating this problem with the liberal base of her party last summer and cauterizing the wound in advance, before it festered. Instead, she offered lame rationalizations. She should have taken a leaf from John McCain and her husband, each skilled in the subtle politics of contrition. This skill will be essential to the success of the next president."

Democrats Worry Clinton-Obama Fight Will Hurt Party's Chances. Under the headline "Hillary-Obama Feud Imperils Party For '08," the Washington Times (2/26, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Democratic strategists say the bitter fight between Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama could undermine their party's bid to win back the White House if it continues." Democratic media adviser Bud Jackson said, "I think the Democrats in general, particularly party activists and leaders, do not want to see a knife fight between these two which results in blood all over the Democrats. We want a strong nominee coming out of this primary process, not one that is beaten and bloodied." Jackson's view "summed up what many Democrats were thinking last week." Pollster John Zogby said, "The opening kickoff has been made. Clinton's the kicker and Obama's the receiver, who kicked back. What's clear is that it's going to be nasty from here on, which doesn't help the Democrats. At this stage, anything that threatens party unity or alienates Democrats or annoys swing voters can hurt."

Edwards Calls Frontrunners' Spat "A Bunch Of Silliness." The AP (2/25, Zuckerbrod) reports Sen. John Edwards said on CBS' Face The Nation that the spat between Clinton and Obama over comments by Hollywood mogul David Geffer is "a bunch of silliness." Edwards "said the topic was not on the minds of voters during a stop Saturday in New Hampshire. 'I met probably over a thousand New Hampshire primary voters in the course of having a bunch of house parties. And you'd be shocked to hear the only people who asked me about this were reporters.'"

Clinton Leads Obama By 11 Points In California Primary Poll. A Datamar poll of 865 likely California Democratic primary voters conducted February 9-13 (+/- 3.3%), finds Clinton at 34.3%, Obama 23.6%, Edwards 16.2%, Gov. Bill Richardson 7.2%, Rep. Dennis Kucinich 4.2%, Sen. Joseph Biden 3.9%, Sen. Christopher Dodd 0.8%, Mike Gravel 0.3%, and Tom Vilsack 0.2%, with 9.2% undecided.

South Carolina Momentum Said To Be With Clinton, Obama. South Carolina political reporter Lee Bandy writes at The Politico (2/26) that Clinton and Obama "drew huge crowds on recent campaign swings through South Carolina. Together, they made a statement: The Democratic Party is back." A "sizable number of South Carolinians have been showing up at the rallies of Democratic candidates, catching party establishment types off guard. But it is foolhardy for candidates and their followers to suggest victory is in the air." Many in attendance "at the candidate rallies are curiosity seekers," who are "a long ways off from picking a horse to ride." But right now, "the momentum is with Obama and Clinton."

Geffen's "Precision Ruthlessness" Seen As Danger To Process. In a New York Times (2/26, 1.16M) media column headlined "Someone Give Geffen a Day Job," David Carr writes, "There is a danger that if the coming election" becomes Geffen's "full-time hobby, his precision ruthlessness will distort the public process. After all, this is not a movie sale, a busted deal or a Don Henley album; this is about the duly elected leader of the United States. … But if kings are to be made or undone, you can bet that Mr. Geffen is standing at the ready."

Herbert Calls Clintons "Connivers." In his New York Times (2/26, 1.16M) column, Bob Herbert writes, "If Bill and Hillary Clinton were the stars of a reality TV show, it would be a weekly series called 'The Connivers.' The Clintons, the most powerful of power couples, are always scheming at something, and they're good at it. Their latest project is to contrive ways to knock Barack Obama off his white horse and muddy him up a little. A lot, actually. Most of the analyses after last week's dust-up…have focused on whether the Clintons succeeded in tarnishing the junior senator from Illinois. What I found interesting was that no one questioned whether the Clintons would be willing to get down in the muck and start flinging it around. That was a given."

Clinton Woos Black Voters In New York. Newsday (2/26, Epstein) reports, "It wasn't officially a campaign event, and she didn't mention the presidency," but Sen. Hillary Clinton spent Sunday "working to position herself as the candidate for African-Americans." Clinton "presided over an African-American heritage celebration hosted by District Council 37, New York City's largest public employee union." At the event, "Clinton spoke mostly about local issues not likely to earn her attention in early presidential battleground states like Iowa and New Hampshire."

Rice Says Support For Obama Shows US Has Made Strides On Race. The AP (2/25) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "finds Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama appealing and says it won't be much longer before race isn't a barrier to becoming president." On Fox News Sunday, Rice said, "I do think we've come a long way in overcoming stereotypes, role stereotypes about African-Americans. I will say race is still a factor. … But it's less and less of a barrier to believing that that person can be your doctor or your lawyer or a professor in your university or the CEO of a company. And it will not be long, I think, before it's no longer a barrier to being president of the United States."

Rothenberg Says Race Unlikely To Doom Obama's Chances. In his Roll Call (2/26) column, Stuart Rothenberg writes, "Many of us who write about politics -- and as a group we are overwhelmingly white -- have concluded" that Mitt Romney's Mormon religion "is a greater impediment to his presidential hopes" than is Sen. Hillary Clinton's gender or Obama's race. "But some in the black community remain deeply skeptical about Obama's electability. Their view is simple: Whether those being surveyed about their willingness to vote for an African-American are deceiving themselves or intentionally misleading pollsters, a lot of white voters won't vote for a black nominee." Rothenberg says he remains "convinced that Obama's race is not an insurmountable problem for him," because the "question…is whether Obama can carry enough white voters in enough Democratic or politically competitive states to win 270 electoral votes," and in many of those states, prominent blacks have been elected.

Obama Hardens Antiwar Stance In Presidential Bid. The New York Times (2/26, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports Obama "is running for president as one of the few candidates who opposed the Iraq war from the beginning, a simple position unburdened by expressions of regret or decisions over whether to apologize for initially supporting the invasion." But while Obama "is framing his candidacy to appeal to Democrats who have long opposed the war, until recently he was not among his party's most outspoken voices against it. He campaigned strongly against the war in his bid for the Senate in 2004, but when he arrived in Washington he waited 11 months to deliver a major speech on Iraq. And only after Mr. Obama opened a presidential exploratory committee did he introduce legislation to withdraw American combat brigades from Iraq by March 31, 2008." The four Democratic presidential hopefuls who were in the Senate at the time of the 2002 vote all "voted to authorize the invasion." But Obama "was not always so critical" of their votes. In interviews "before the Democratic National Convention in 2004, where his national political ascent began, he said he did not place blame on Democrats who had voted to authorize the war."

Obama Speaks To 3,000 At Rally In Kentucky. The AP (2/25) reports Obama "spoke Sunday night to a crowd of at least 3,000 supporters who waited nearly two hours for him to arrive for his first campaign stop in Kentucky. Obama apologized for the delay, saying snow in Chicago kept him from arriving sooner. … 'There was no way I was not going to make 3,000 people coming out,' he said to audience members who paid $25 a ticket for the event."

Obama Effort To Quit Smoking Cited. In a Los Angeles Times (2/26, 850K) op-ed, Harvard professor of medical history uses Obama's effort to quit smoking to examine the cigarette industry's supposed efforts to help smokers give up the habit, saying that "if Obama quits, no doubt Philip Morris will be the first to congratulate him. After all, won't that prove that anyone can stop anytime he wants to? If only that were true."

Conservative Leaders Look Beyond Three 2008 Frontrunners. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports, "Whether McCain and the other leaders of the GOP presidential pack -- Giuliani and Romney -- can make enough converts among the Republican Party's base of religious conservatives may determine whether any of them can win the presidential nomination. Because of their political records and personal lives, all three have raised abundant doubts within the Christian right. … McCain and Romney-and, to a lesser extent, Giuliani-have launched Christian conservative outreach plans. But some powerful Christian right activists are skeptical. And others are determined to stop the front-runners in their tracks." According to US news, "Some heavyweights within the Council for National Policy and other conservative coalitions are weighing an effort to galvanize behind a socially conservative second-tier candidate, such as" former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee or Sen. Sam Brownback.

New Book Explores Bush-Cheney Campaign's Evangelical Outreach Effort. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, 2.03M) reports that in his new book "The Jesus Machine: How James Dobson, Focus on the Family, and Evangelical America Are Winning the Culture War," U.S. News Senior Editor Dan Gilgoff "details how George W. Bush's evangelical outreach machine, and John Kerry's failure to connect with evangelicals and other religious voters, may have determined the outcome."

Vilsack Exit Raises Iowa Pressure On Edwards. The Des Moines Register (2/26, Beaumont, 160K) writes that "if any candidate inherits something from Tom Vilsack's departure from the Democratic presidential campaign, it's John Edwards. What he gets: Pressure." Vilsack's decision to exit the race "shifts much of the burden of expectations in the caucuses to Edwards, the front-runner in early Iowa polls." While Edwards' "popularity among Iowa party activists has endured since his strong second-place finish in the 2004 caucuses" and his run for vice president, he is "not entirely the same Edwards that Iowans remember from his 2004 campaign. He has moved noticeably to the left since then" on issues like Iraq and health care. Edwards "rejected the idea that Vilsack's withdrawal puts particular pressure on him to win in Iowa." He said, "It raises expectations for everyone. … Other candidates might have used it as an excuse for not doing well. That excuse is now gone."

Gore Documentary Wins Academy Award. The AP (2/26, Gentile) reports, "'An Inconvenient Truth,' the documentary that turned former vice president Al Gore's power-point presentation on global warming into an engaging and entertaining film, won the Oscar Sunday night. The best-documentary win was a triumph for Gore."

Gore Seen As Potential Alternative Candidate For Democrats. In the New Yorker (3/5), David Remnick says, "Despite the burden of injury and injustice," Gore, "more than any other major Democratic Party figure, including the many candidates assembled for next year's Presidential nomination, has demonstrated in opposition precisely the quality of judgment that Bush has lacked in office." In the "view of former aides still close to him, Gore can't lose by staying on the electoral sidelines. While Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama start competing -- warily at first, and then, inevitably, taking direct aim at one another's weaknesses -- Gore can stand unbruised, nursing the lingering glamour of his popular margin in 2000."

Warner To Endorse McCain For President, Despite Iraq Differences. Roll Call (2/26, Whittington) reports Sen. John McCain, who has been among the staunchest supporters of President Bush's effort to increase troop levels in Iraq, is set to receive the endorsement of one of the most prominent critics of the 'surge' plan." Sen. John Warner "will announce his support of McCain's 2008 presidential bid today, lending the name of one of the chamber's most respected old bulls to the Republican frontrunner's developing Capitol Hill support." Warner "cited his long personal history with McCain -- as well as the importance of national security issues in the 2008 campaign -- as the chief factors that led to his endorsement." Warner said, "To me, voters are going to seek out that candidate, be it Republican or Democrat, that's got the proven credentials on issues that concern security abroad and here at home."

Romney Health Care Plan Said To Be In Trouble In Massachusetts. In a Wall Street Journal (2/26, A19, 2.04M) op-ed, Sally Pipes, president and CEO of the Pacific Research Institute says that when "then-Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, introduced a universal health-insurance plan in the Bay State early last year, it was widely acclaimed. But less than a year after passage, RomneyCare is in the intensive care unit, soon to be wheeled into hospice." Reality "fully hit in late January of this year, when private insurers submitted bids to the bureaucracy that would administer the new program. The average premium for the unsubsidized plans was not $200 per month -- as Mr. Romney promised from the stump -- but rather $380. That's more than 15% of the target audiences' income -- and for a plan with a $2,000 deductible and a total cost sharing of $5,000. People were stunned, outraged. Naturally, 'greedy' private insurers were blamed. Politicians called for price controls." Pipes adds, "There's a slim chance that the new Democratic governor Deval Patrick and the Democratic legislature will implement this plan and enforce the mandate. But if they do, an individual with a $30,000 income would be on the hook for 32% of his or her income before being fully covered by insurance. Yet there is an equally small chance that the politicians will deregulate the state's insurance market."

Paul Campaigns In New Hampshire. The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/26, Kepple) reports Rep. Ron Paul "brought his anti-war and limited government message to a gathering of largely like-minded activists" in Concord, New Hampshire, Sunday, "and condemned the Republican establishment for forsaking principles it claims to uphold. Paul, who ran as the Libertarian Party's presidential candidate in 1988, is now exploring a run for the Republican Party's presidential nomination. Should he decide to enter the race, he would prove a long shot at best, and run at a considerable disadvantage in terms of fundraising."

Hagel "Flirting With Running For President." USA Today (2/26, 8A, Kiely, 2.27M) reports Sen. Chuck Hagel "seems to be paying no great political price for his apostasy" in his home state of Nebraska. While there "have been some angry letters to the editor of the Omaha World-Herald, no Republican has emerged to challenge Hagel next year, when he will be up for election to a third term." Hagel "has not only emerged as a leading critic of the administration's foreign policy, he's also flirting with running for president next year -- possibly on a hybrid ticket that would include a Democrat."

New Blog Tracks Candidates' Web Presence. Newsweek (3/5, Briscoe, 3.12M) reports Sen. Barack Obama "can take comfort in at least one tally: MySpace, apparently, is Obama country. About 48,000 members of the wildly popular social-networking site have added Obama to their online profiles as a 'friend,' while only 25,000 have 'friended' Clinton. It may seem a trivial statistic. But to the political junkies who run techPresident.com, a new 'group blog' that obsessively follows how the presidential campaign is playing on the Internet, no Web trend is too small to track. Micah Sifry, the site's cofounder and editor, says he's trying to make sense of 'how candidates are using the Web and how the Web is using them.' … TechPresident's stable of bloggers includes Zephyr Teachout, the Internet director of Dean's 2004 campaign, and Mike Turk, the e-campaign director for Bush-Cheney 2004."

Candidates Urged To Articulate Concrete Policies. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Barone, 2.03M) writes, "so far, candidates have told us very little about where they think the world is headed and what we should do about it. And they've shown us little to indicate that they've thought seriously about governance and long-term problems like Social Security and Medicare. Let's hope they do better as they make their way through Iowa's 99 counties and New Hampshire's 234 cities and towns."

Cole's Strategy For 2008 To Balance Local Issues, National Picture. Roll Call (2/26, Duran, Drucker) reports National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Cole (Okla.) "believes a strategy combining the 'all races are local' mantra of his predecessor with the nationalized campaign Democrats employed is the way to undo the drubbing the GOP took at the polls this past year." Cole said that for this cycle, "the NRCC will spread the wealth among consultants and pollsters, giving political professionals inside and outside the Beltway a crack at consulting contracts." Cole "did not disavow the localized approach to House races preferred by former NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), but said his 2008 plan will include key elements of a nationalized campaign." Cole said, "The 'you have a national campaign or a local campaign' is a false dichotomy. There's no question that good campaigns address both things. I tell our members: 'Know your locality, but also you are going to have to address the big national issues.'"

Perdue Sets Date For GA10 Special Election. Roll Call (2/26, Whittington) reports Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) "has asked that June 19 be the date for a special election to fill the 10th district seat of Rep. Charlie Norwood (R), who died Feb. 13." State Sens. Ralph Hudgens (R) and Jim Whitehead (R) "have emerged as the early frontrunners in the race for the Augusta-based seat, which leans heavily toward Republicans." Both men "will have to relinquish their state legislative seats once they qualify to run in the special election under Georgia law."

Gilchrest May Face Conservative Primary Challenger In MD1. Roll Call (2/26, Kurtz) reports conservative Maryland state Sen. Andrew Harris "is taking steps to challenge Rep. Wayne Gilchrest in the 2008 Republican primary, though he said Friday that he has not completely decided whether to make the race." Harris said he "has thought about challenging the Congressman for several months and was leaning against it until two weeks ago, when Gilchrest joined 16 other House Republicans in voting for a resolution that criticized President Bush's proposal to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq." Harris said, "That has changed the calculus a little bit." Roll Call adds Gilchrest "easily turned back conservative challengers in 2002 and 2004, but Harris, the sole physician in the state Senate, could be more formidable because he is no stranger to tough races."

Farrakhan Delivers "Final" Major Speech. The CBS Evening News (2/25, story 5, :20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Ailing Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan today gave a speech that was billed as his final major speech. He called for unity between Christians and Muslims in Detroit where the nation of Islam was founded back in 1930. The 73-year-old Farrakhan has had prostate cancer and recently had abdominal surgery."

The AP (2/25, Karoub) reports Farrakhan "was greeted by cheers, tears and chants from tens of thousands as he returned to the public eye just long enough to say he would be leaving it soon." Farrakhan, who "ceded leadership duties last year because of illness, spoke for nearly two hours Sunday."

NYTimes Calls On States To Require HPV Vaccine. The New York Times (2/26, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "Debate over a new vaccine to prevent cervical cancer and genital warts has reached a high pitch. State legislatures are debating whether to mandate the vaccine or insist that its use be kept voluntary. The manufacturer stopped a vigorous lobbying campaign lest it provoke more opposition than support. And some health professionals who had been championing the vaccine flinched at making it mandatory, at least for now. Even so, state legislatures should require that all young girls be given this vaccine, which protects against a virus that causes some 10,000 new cases of cervical cancer in the United States each year — and 3,700 cancer deaths."

Bush To Warn Musharraf To Crackdown On Terror Groups. On its front page, the New York Times (2/26, A1, Sanger, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports President Bush "has decided to send an unusually tough message" to Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, "warning him that the newly Democratic Congress could cut aid to his country unless his forces become far more aggressive in hunting down operatives with Al Qaeda, senior administration officials say." The decision came "after the White House concluded that General Musharraf is failing to live up to commitments." On senior administration official said Musharraf has "made a number of assurances over the past few months, but the bottom line is that what they are doing now is not working. The message we're sending to him now is that the only thing that matters is results." For now, officials say, the White House "has ruled out unilateral strikes against the training camps that American spy satellites are monitoring in North Waziristan," fearing "that such strikes would result in what one administration official referred to as a 'shock to the stability' of General Musharraf's government."

The AP (2/25, Hunt) reports the move comes "amid growing concern in Congress and the Administration that terrorist forces are regrouping in the border area and preparing for a spring offensive in Afghanistan." In an interview Sunday with ABC's "This Week," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "I don't doubt that al-Qaeda has tried to regenerate some of its leadership. … But we have to be vigilant, and that's why we are working with the Pakistanis, we are working with the Afghans." Asked about Musharraf's efforts, Rice said, "I'm certainly aware that there are political issues in Pakistan. To not say that would be not to face reality."

Rice Condemns Iran's Vow To Continue Nuclear Program. NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 5, 0:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "To Iran now where it's ever defiant leader is going forward with his nuclear enrichment program. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad compared the program to a train without a reverse gear or brakes. In response, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice recommitted her offer to personally meet with Iranian officials, but only if they stop nuclear enrichment and reprocessing. This week the United Nations Security Council will meet to consider new sanctions against Iran."

The Washington Post/AP (2/26, A11, Karimi) reports Ahmadinejad announcement prompted Secretary Rice to respond that Iran needs "a stop button." In an appearance on "Fox News Sunday," the Secretary said, "They don't need a reverse gear. They need a stop button" so "we can sit down and talk about whatever is on Iran's mind." Rice said it "should be a clear signal" that "I've said that I am prepared to meet my counterpart or an Iranian representative at any time if Iran will suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities." USA Today (2/26, 8A, 2.27M) and the Los Angeles Times/AP also note briefly the Secretary's comments on talks with Iran.

In a separate interview with ABC's "This Week," AFP (2/26, Milliken) reports Rice said sanctions imposed on Tehran were beginning to fuel dissatisfaction among Iranians with Ahmadinejad. "If you just read the press you see the criticism of President Ahmadinejad by people inside Iran, knowledgeable and authoritative people in Iran, that (his) policies are isolating Iran," she told ABC. Meanwhile, the New Yorker (3/5, Hirsh) says "US covert actions against Iran had increased under a major recent shift in US Middle East strategy, with the unintended result of exacerbating regional Sunni-Shiite sectarian tensions and bolstering Sunni radicals hostile to the United States." Reporter Seymour Hersh wrote in the magazine that the strategy, guided by Vice President Dick Cheney and reliant on Saudi Arabia's national security advisor Prince Bandar bin Sultan, "had complicated the war in Iraq, where the rise to power of Shiites over the previously dominant Sunnis has empowered Iran."

The Financial Times (2/26, Dombey) says the "extent to which Iran has mastered such technology remains one of the most important questions in the controversy over the nuclear program, together with other factors such as Tehran's true intentions and the difficulty of forging a common front on the issue among big powers."

As US Pressure On Tehran Mounts, Religious Divide In Gulf Widens. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A1, Higgins, 2.04M) reports in a front page article that "at a time of rising tension between Washington and Tehran," America's "geopolitical standoff with Iran is paralleled by much older animosities between the Muslim world's two great traditions, Sunni and Shiite." In a "dangerous dynamic, legitimate concerns about Tehran's intentions are being overlain with phobias and political calculation as Arab governments, rabble-rousing politicians and clerics fan sectarian fears." Some experts on the region warn that America's "standoff with Iran is exacerbating Sunni-Shiite rivalry and pushing the US into some unruly company. Indeed, America now unintentionally finds itself on the same page as Sunni firebrands who loathe America but sometimes hate Shiites even more."

Iran Launches First Rocket Into Space. The New York Times (2/26, A12, Fathi, 1.16M) reports Iran announced Sunday that it had launched "a research rocket that attained a suborbital altitude, a test that appeared to move it closer toward its aim of putting its own satellites into space." A test rocket "capable of reaching greater altitudes would have had significant meaning not only for Iran's effort to put satellites into orbit, but also for developing a transcontinental ballistic missile, making it a topic of keen interest to other countries."

Harman Claims Bush Needs Congressional Approval For Strike Against Iran. Rep. Jane Harman, on CNN's Late Edition (2/25, Blitzer), said, "I think if we are ever to initiate military action in Iran, Congress needs to approve it. I support legislation that would make that crystal clear. … And I think we have a real shot here of changing the policy in Iran in a way that would be very constructive and much more effective than this notion of initiating military action where we don't have a day after scenario that makes any sense whatsoever."

Rep. Duncan Hunter, also on CNN's Late Edition (2/25, Blitzer), said that "with respect to Iran, our number one role here, our number one goal is, we must stand firm. We must protect Israel. And right now, this is a military challenge that we have. One, to protect against the developing missile capability of Iran. Number two, to watch very closely this emergence of an incipient nuclear capability. And this could well…at some point, require American military forces in Iran. We should never take that card off the table."

Cheney Arrives In Oman For Talks. The AP (2/25, Krane) reports Vice President Cheney arrived in Oman Sunday for talks the nation's foreign minister on "regional security issues, including the US standoff with Iran," an Omani government official said. The AP notes that Oman allows the US to use its air bases "for refueling, logistics and storage of pre-positioned military supplies," however "little has been revealed publicly about US military ties with the reclusive country." While Oman's cooperation with the US military "appears to have dwindled over the past few years," renewed US access to its bases would give "a huge boost to any American action on Iran."

Hezbollah Strengthening Positions Along Peacekeeping Zone. The Christian Science Monitor (2/26, Blanford, 59K) reports Hezbollah militants have relocated along the northern border of the zone UN peacekeeping forces and Lebanese troops have been policing since last summer "to build a new line of defense." Hezbollah's "strengthening presence…coincides with a series of land purchases here by a Shiite businessman with ties to the militant group and, critics say, with funds from Tehran." While analysts say the military buildup "does not necessarily signal any intention by the Iranian-supported militants to launch a fresh round of fighting," they say it is "a troubling sign that Hezbollah is rearming just out of sight of the United Nations."

Israeli Troops Launch Operation In West Bank City. The New York Times (2/26, A6, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports the Israeli Army put the West Bank city of Nablus "under curfew on Sunday in one of the biggest military operations there in two years." Israeli forces "discovered an explosives laboratory in Nablus, the second one found in two days," containing "a hand-held Lau guided missile and launcher that apparently had belonged to the Israeli Army." However, it was not immediately clear whether the missile had been stolen or purchased.

USA Today (2/26, 8A, 2.27M) reports an Israeli military official said the operation "was crucial to stop militant attacks against Israel."

Plight Of Gaza Settlers Signals Troubles With West Bank Evacuation. The Los Angeles Times (2/26, Bekker, 850K) reports on Israeli settlers evacuated from the Gaza Strip in 2005 who today are "straining to meet daily expenses." Many of the evacuees "are older than 50 and unskilled for available jobs." The evacuees' predicament is seen as "a measure of the decline in political power of Israel's settler movement" and as "an indication of the difficulties Israel may encounter in any evacuation of the much larger number of settlements in the West Bank, considered an inevitable part of any final peace accord with the Palestinians."

Israeli Supreme Court To Rule On Status Of Border Crossing. The Christian Science Monitor (2/26, Mitnick, 59K) reports the Karni crossing at the Israel-Gaza border has become "the focus of a dispute in Israel's Supreme Court between human rights groups and the government" over Israel's "invisible hand" in Gaza by regulating commercial goods coming or leaving the territory. The dispute "underscores the tradeoff between Israeli security needs and the Palestinian need for the passage of people and commercial goods."

Rice, Lavrov Seek To Down Play Tensions. The AP (2/25, Butler) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "Sunday tried to play down concerns about a Cold War revival set off by Russian President Vladimir Putin's claim that Washington is fostering a global arms race." But they "could not put aside disagreements about a proposed US missile defense system in Europe." Lavrov wrote in Sunday's Washington Post that Putin's recent remarks "have been widely misinterpreted," while Rice "also denied the rhetoric could push the countries back to Cold War-era relations." In an interview with "Fox News Sunday," Rice said it is "a ludicrous claim" by Russia to "suggest that somehow 10 interceptors deployed in Poland are going to threaten the thousands of warheads in the Russian deterrent."

Missile Shield Gaining Support Among European Nations. The Christian Science Monitor (2/25, White, 59K) reports the US missile-defense program is "gaining acceptance among governments" in Europe "despite Russia's mounting opposition." For example, the Czech Republic, Poland, and Britain "have all expressed serious interest in hosting parts of the shield," while "other countries traditionally cool to the idea have been notably quiet." The trigger, the Monitor says, is "concern about a nuclear Iran."

Prodi Set To Resume Control Of Italian Government. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A6, Kahn, 2.04M) reports, "After resigning as Italy's prime minister last week, Romano Prodi is preparing to resurrect his government with his old cabinet intact and push ahead with his political program." But in recent days, Prodi "has lured a few new allies to his side in order to bolster his narrow majority in Parliament." However, he still must address Parliament this week before facing confidence votes in the upper and lower houses. AFP (2/26) also reports the developments.

UN Court To Issue Ruling In Bosnian Genocide Case. The Washington Times/AP (2/26, Max) reports the U.N.'s International Court of Justice is expected to rule today in what is seen as "one of the most momentous cases in its 60 years" -- Bosnia's "demand to make Serbia accountable for the slaughter, terrorizing, rape and displacement of Bosnian Muslims in the early 1990s." If it rules for Bosnia, the Court "could open the way for compensation amounting to billions of dollars from Serbia."

NYTimes Urges US, Europe To Back Kosovo Plan. The New York Times (2/26, 1.16M) editorializes, "Earlier this month, a United Nations envoy, Martti Ahtisaari, presented a sensible plan for the future of Kosovo. ... Mr. Ahtisaari's proposal would effectively grant Kosovo independence, but with strict limits, extensive international supervision, and protection for the ethnic Serbs and other minorities who live there. ... The United States and Europe should press the Security Council to quickly endorse the Ahtisaari plan."

Treasury Delegation In Macau To Discuss North Korean Funds. The AP (2/25, Lee) reports a US Treasury Department delegation was in Macau Monday "briefing local officials about the investigation of North Korean bank accounts in the Chinese territory," an American official said. On Monday, Dale Kreisher, spokesman at the US Consulate General in Hong Kong, told the AP that the US Treasury delegation was in Macau briefing local officials about North Korean funds frozen by Banco Delta Asia. "Discussions (with North Korea) along with the US investigation have brought Treasury to the point where they think they can begin taking steps to resolve the BDA matter," said Kreisher, but declined to say if Washington was ready to lift the sanctions on the bank.

Zoellick Says Nuclear Deal Moves Korean Peninsula Towards Reconciliation. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/26, A18, 2.04M) Robert Zoellick, former U.S. trade representative and deputy secretary of state, writes, "North Korea needs to fulfill its September 2005 commitment to abandon all nuclear weapons and programs. North Korea's steps are likely to be halting as it weighs the risks of opening with those of isolation. Yet even if Pyongyang chooses belligerence, U.S. cooperation with the other four parties will position it better to quarantine the dangers. The five can best deter North Korea. They will be best able to prevent the selling of nuclear materials. President Bush does not view this move as another accord limited to nonproliferation objectives. It opens the way for peace and reconciliation on the peninsula and a means to shape the future security arrangements in East Asia."

Thai Government Fails To Stem Muslim Insurgency. The New York Times (2/26, Mydans, 1.16M) reports, "Some are already calling it war, a brutal Muslim separatist insurgency in southern Thailand that has taken as many as 2,000 lives in three years with almost daily bombings, drive-by shootings, arson and beheadings. It is a conflict the government admits it is losing. A harsh crackdown and martial law in recent years seem only to have fueled the insurgency by generating fear and anger and undermining moderate Muslim voices. A new policy of conciliation in the past four months has been met by increased violence, including a barrage of 28 coordinated bombings in the south that killed or wounded about 60 people on Feb. 18."

UN Security Council Mulls Sending Force To Chad. USA Today/AP (2/26) reports, "Tribal leaders are desperate for the deployment of a U.N. peacekeeping force along Chad's border with Sudan to protect refugees and stop increasing spillover from the violence in Darfur. The U.N. Security Council is considering a mission, with up to 10,000 troops, largely because Sudan's government has resisted efforts to send U.N. peacekeepers to Darfur itself. But Chad's president is worried about inflaming tensions with Sudan, while U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon has warned the Security Council that peacekeepers would face 'serious risks' of rebel attacks."

ICC Prepares Darfur-Related Indictments. The New York Times (2/26, Simons, 1.16M) reports that on the International Criminal Court's "plans to file its first criminal charges linked to the conflict between the Sudanese government and the rebel fighters. The prosecution will disclose the names of several senior figures it believes to be among those most responsible for Darfur's devastating bloodshed and human disaster. Other names are expected to follow. … Thomas Lubanga, a Congolese citizen and once a powerful militia leader, has been charged with conscripting and abusing children, some as young as 10, during the fighting in the country's Ituri region. He is the only suspect in the court's custody, and his trial, expected later this year, will be the first since the tribunal opened for business in 2002."

Economic Boom Said To Have Exacerbated Sudanese Refugees' Misery. The Washington Post (2/26, A10, McCrummen, 690K) reports, "These days, Khartoum has palm trees wrapped in lights, new Toyota dealerships and an outdoor cafe where patrons can sip lattes under a delicately refreshing mist spray. This week marks the opening of Khartoum's first five-star hotel, Al Salam Rotana -- a swank, $300-a-night palace of marble and haute cuisine for the jet set. At the city's edges, however, is the detritus of power struggles dating back decades -- a dozen or so squalid, off-the-map camps, most without running water or electricity, and filled with more than 2 million people. Most of the residents are non-Arab Africans who fled the conflict in the south. More recently, people have come here to escape the conflict in Darfur, now in its fourth year. For people in the camps, the economic boom has had the perverse effect of further undermining their already precarious existence. With land at a premium, the local government of Khartoum state periodically sends police and bulldozers into the camps to plow under swaths of mud houses, pushing people even farther out into the desert, and then sells the cleared land to developers."

Senegal President Leading In Bid For Second Term. The AP (2/25, Callimachi) reports, "The president of one of Africa's most stable democracies sought another five-year term Sunday, jostling with 14 contenders in a race that may hinge on the votes of young people hungry for jobs. Early results reported by state-run Senegalese Press Agency indicated President Abdoulaye Wade was in the lead but did not say by how much. It was not known how many votes had been counted, but they included polling stations in key cities including the capital Dakar and Thies, the agency said. The first official results are not expected until later Monday."

Election Upsets Relatively Stable Senegal. The New York Times (2/26, Polgreen, 1.16M) reports, "In the more than four decades since it won its independence from France, Senegal has never had a coup and suffers from almost none of the ethnic strife that has dragged many West African countries into civil war. It is one of Africa's oldest and most open democracies, with genteel politics that have been the envy of many of its neighbors. But this election has been different. The campaign was marred by accusations that the government was trying to stifle opposition. One opposition rally was barred from taking place, though others were allowed."

Kenyan Education Program Draws Mixed Reactions. On its front page, the Los Angeles Times (2/26, Sanders, 850K) reports on a "growing public education crisis" in Kenya "spurred by a national decision in 2003 to make primary education free to all." Since the school fees were eliminated, "more than 1 million additional youngsters have entered public schools" and the move "has won international praise for President Mwai Kibaki." So far, however, officials "have failed to back their ambitious policy with adequate resources. Enrollment is up 24% since the fees were dropped, but the number of school facilities has barely expanded and the number of teachers has fallen 6%, according to the Education Ministry."

Bush's Fast-Track Trade Authority Expires June 30. Roll Call (2/26, Ackley) reports, "President Bush's fast-track trade negotiating authority expires June 30, but a new business coalition pushing for its renewal has crafted a long-term plan, indicating that pro-trade lobbyists expect a much longer slog than they would like to admit. The Trade for America Coalition, according to sources familiar with the effort, has planned for a new set of co-chairmen to take over six months into the campaign, which would take it beyond the deadline for fast-track renewal. A lobbyist whose clients are involved in the coalition said that even though Members and Bush administration officials continue to negotiate to renew it before the authority lapses, this likely will be no quick lobbying battle. … Opponents of trade promotion authority — emboldened by the Democratic-controlled Congress — have geared up their own effort, working closely with the office of

CAFTA Considered A Success On Its First Anniversary. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A18, 2.04M) Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes, "As the Central American Free Trade Agreement marks its one-year anniversary Friday, it's a good time to remind Capitol Hill protectionists how wrong they were when they tried to kill the deal in 2005. Every country that entered into Cafta is enjoying new benefits, including the U.S. The U.S. and El Salvador were the first two countries to begin trading under Cafta last March. In the months that followed, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Honduras made it official. The Dominican Republic and Costa Rica have yet to join. Both have signed onto the negotiated agreement, but without implementing legislation before Feb. 29, 2008, they could end up shut out of the free-trade area. Costa Rica hasn't even ratified the deal yet. The early results from Cafta's first year are promising. Central Americans are importing more than ever from the U.S. and the region is also attracting new capital. Both developments are helping participants grow more competitive and improving the quality of life for consumers."

US Urged To Develop Economic Relations With China. Lawrence H. Summers, a contributing editor to Opinion, writes in a Los Angeles Times (2/26, 850K) op-ed that economic advancements happening in China reflect events in the Japanese economy in the late 1980s and early 1990s. Although there are "obvious differences," Summers says the similarities "are striking enough to invite an effort to draw some lessons from the Japanese experience." Given China's "scale, rapid growth and the greater level of imbalances in today's global economy," he says Chinese economic policy and its international economic relations "are even more important. By learning from a rather unfortunate history, policymakers on both sides of the Pacific can avoid repeating its mistakes."

Columnist Says Allies, Not Enemies, Hate US Most. Los Angeles Times (2/26, 850K) columnist Niall Ferguson explores why Americans are so hated. The "best explanation," he says, "is the simplest. Being hated is what happens to dominant empires." Therefore, Ferguson says one might assume those who hate us the most are "people in countries that the United States has recently attacked or threatened to attack." However, a recent Gallup Center for Muslim Studies' poll suggests that it's "not the United States' enemies that hate it most," bur rather "people in countries that are supposed to be friendly, if not allies." There is, he says, "after all, a reason why they say it's lonely at the top."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Al-Arian Hunger Strike Continues. The Washington Post (2/26, B3, Markon) reports, "A former Florida professor has not eaten for more than a month to protest prosecutors' efforts to make him cooperate with their investigation into whether a network of Herndon-based Muslim charities financed terrorist organizations." The Post continues, "Sami al-Arian, 49, who has twice refused to testify before a federal grand jury in Alexandria, has lost more than 30 pounds and collapsed in jail from the effects of his water-only diet. His hunger strike has drawn the support of Muslim organizations, which held a news conference last week at Justice Department headquarters in Washington and called for a worldwide fast in support of al-Arian." The Post adds, "Tracy Billingsley, a spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons, said prison officials will force-feed al-Arian through a tube if he appears close to death. 'We would not let an inmate die,' she said. " The Post notes, "A federal jury in Tampa deadlocked in 2005 on nine charges that al-Arian aided terrorists and acquitted him of eight other counts. He then pleaded guilty to one count of supporting a Palestinian terrorist organization. Sentenced to 57 months, including time already served, he was expected to be released from prison and deported this year. … But prosecutors want al-Arian to testify in their probe into whether the network of Muslim charities, businesses and think tanks was financing terrorist organizations, according to court documents. He has twice refused and been held in contempt by a federal judge. As much as 18 months could be added to his prison term unless he agrees to testify. … On Jan. 21, al-Arian stopped eating, supporters said. He has had only water since then, and several days not that. Federal marshals recently moved him from Northern Neck Regional Jail in Warsaw, Va., to a federal medical prison in Butner, N.C., federal officials and supporters said. … Al-Arian is trying to rally public support so prosecutors will stop trying to make him testify, said Agha Saeed, chairman of the American Muslim Taskforce for Civil Rights and Elections, a coalition of Muslim groups. The former University of South Florida professor has accused prosecutors of violating his plea agreement with the Justice Department, which he contends does not require his cooperation. … David N. Kelley, a former U.S. attorney who prosecuted terrorism cases in New York, said it is a common tactic for prosecutors to seek additional testimony from someone already convicted. 'In many instances, you are remiss if you don't pursue that,' he said."

UK Report Warns Of Growing Threat From Al Qaeda. The Washington Times/London Sunday Telegraph (2/26, Rayment) reports, "Al Qaeda has established a foothold in most countries across North Africa and the Middle East and poses a far graver threat to Britain than previously thought, according to a report being circulated among British security departments. Titled 'Extremist Threat Assessment,' the document, which was drawn up this month, also predicts that Afghanistan will supersede Iraq as the main location for terrorists planning violent acts against the West. The secret intelligence document says that the number of locally based Islamist terrorists involved in plotting suicide attacks against 'soft' targets in Britain could number more than 2,000."

WSJournal Says Europe Undermining War On Terror. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, 2.04M) editorializes, "The capture of an alleged Islamist terrorist recruiter in Milan four years ago in an operation carried out by U.S. and Italian intelligence could have been a model for transatlantic cooperation in counterterrorism. Instead, it is becoming Exhibit A in how European politicians are working against the U.S., undermining the fight against Islamic terrorism and endangering the NATO alliance. ... If the CIA agents did anything wrong, that's up to American authorities to decide. ... Since the 9/11 attacks in the U.S., many European leaders have been playing a double game, working with the U.S. to root out terrorist plots on the sly -- and saving countless lives -- while publicly condemning 'American methods' in rhetoric that has fed rising anti-Americanism."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

NYPD Concerned Over Potential Attack By Iranian Agents. Newsweek (3/5, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports, "Increasing tensions between Washington and Tehran have revived New York Police Department concerns that Iranian agents may already have targeted the city for terror attacks. Such attacks could be aimed at bridges and tunnels, Jewish organizations and Wall Street, NYPD briefers told security execs last fall, according to a person with access to the briefing materials who asked for anonymity because of the sensitive subject matter." Newsweek notes, "NYPD officials have worried about possible Iranian-sponsored attacks since a series of incidents involving officials of the Iranian Mission to the United Nations. In November 2003, Ahmad Safari and Alireaza Safi, described as Iranian Mission 'security' personnel, were detained by transit cops when they were seen videotaping subway tracks from Queens to Manhattan at 1:10 in the morning. The men later left New York."

Most Passengers Consent To Scan By "X-Ray Machine." The Christian Science Monitor (2/26, Bowers, 59K) reports, "Most passengers asked to submit to a full-body X-ray at Security Checkpoint B didn't bat an eyelash. Nine in 10 gamely stepped up to a scanner about the size of a vending machine, placed their feet on the red footprints painted on the carpet, and raised their arms – all in the name of airport security. The aim of the new technology unveiled Friday at Phoenix Sky Harbor International Airport: to allow officials to detect weapons – such as plastic explosives strapped to the body – that metal detectors and other security measures might miss. … A traveler would have to have set off alarms on the routine metal detector, or be randomly selected for further screening. Even then, travelers have two options: the new X-ray machine, or a pat-down, which has caused passenger complaints about invasiveness."

Bees Used To Detect Explosives. The CBS Evening News (2/25, story 7, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "In the wild bee's acute sense of smell helps them find flower nectar. In the lab that sense of smell can be retrained to recognize anything from explosives to rotten food. … Animals, especially dogs are already used to sniff out drugs or weapons. But they're not 100 percent reliable. They get bored. And they're only as good as their handler. Bees, say scientists, are foolproof. … As for detecting explosives, it's even attracted the attention of the US Weapons Testing Lab in Los Alamos."

Expanded DHS Fingerprinting System Spurs Privacy Concerns. The New York Times (2/26, Liptak, 1.16M) writes, "Foreigners arriving at the American border must present both index fingers for fingerprinting, but that will soon change. The Department of Homeland Security now wants 10 fingers. The two-print system was largely a biometric backup, an added level of security to supplement and verify a passport or a visa. The 10-print system adds a powerful investigative tool. 'When we have a fingerprint of a terrorist who has left behind a bomb or an I.E.D. in Iraq or has left his fingerprint in a safe house somewhere, we don't always have the two index fingers,' Paul Rosenzweig, a Department of Homeland Security official, said at a briefing in December." However, the Times adds that "people concerned about privacy and civil liberties say they fear the creation of gigantic biometric databases ripe for data-mining abuse. They note that Mr. Rosenzweig was a supporter of the Total Information Awareness program at the Defense Department, which had planned, as the Pentagon put it, to create 'ultralarge all-source information repositories.'"

Scope Of DHS Personnel System Overhaul Reduced. The Washington Post (2/26, Barr, 690K) "Federal Diary" column reports, "MaxHR is out. Human Capital Operational Plan is in. The name change at the Homeland Security Department reflects a new set of priorities aimed at improving how thousands of Border Patrol, customs and immigration officers are hired and how career leaders are chosen and trained. But the name change -- from trendy branding to prosaic government jargon -- also can be taken as a symbol of how one of the Bush administration's signature efforts to shake up the federal workforce lost momentum because of overly ambitious goals, adverse court rulings and budget cuts. The shift to the new plan means that a key goal of the Bush White House -- to use about 110,000 Homeland Security employees as a model for a rigorous pay system with raises linked to job performance ratings -- will not be completed before the presidential election in 2008, leaving it to a new White House team to forge on or abandon that effort."

WAR NEWS:

Democrats To Take On War Authorization Without GOP Help. Coverage of Democratic efforts to rewrite the 2002 resolution authorizing the use of force in Iraq focused on the unlikelihood of their winning any GOP support, even from Republicans skeptical of the war.

NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 4, 2:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The political war of words over Iraq is escalating in Washington, D.C. This week, Senate Democrats could take the debate to a new level." NBC (Yang) adds that Sens. Sen. Carl Levin and Joseph Biden "will propose a resolution that would revoke President Bush's sweeping military authority in Iraq, say US forces could only be used to guard the borders, train Iraqi forces and go after al Qaeda, and set a March 2008 goal for withdrawing combat troops." Biden: "It explicitly says what it is not. It is not to send troops into the middle of Baghdad, 6.2 million people, to get involved in the midst of a civil war." Yang: "Senate Democrats know they'd probably don't have enough votes to overcome the objections of Senate Republicans to this issue. But what they're hoping for" is to "pick up enough Republican votes to ratchet up the pressure on President Bush."

The Washington Times (2/26, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, appearing on both Fox News Sunday (2/25, Wallace) and ABC's This Week (2/25, Stephanopoulos), called the Democrats' intentions "the worst of micromanagement." The Los Angeles Times (2/26, Hennessey-Fiske, 850K) also quotes Rice's remark, observing that she "said the restrictions were impractical given the nature of war and counterterrorism in Iraq."

In the Washington Post (2/26, A15, 690K), Robert Novak writes, "Republican senators who have turned against the U.S. military intervention in Iraq are not interested in bailing out Democrats by approving their proposal to repeal the authorization overwhelmingly passed by Congress in 2002." If Sen. Chuck Hagel refuses to back the Levin-Biden effort, Democrats "might fall short of the 50 votes necessary for final passage, much less the 60 necessary to close off debate." President Bush "may be an unpopular president fighting an unpopular war, but Democrats are finding it hard to make war policy from Capitol Hill."

Roll Call (2/26, Pierce) reports that even as Democrats "ready a bill to rewrite President Bush's authorization for the Iraq War, Senate Judiciary ranking member Arlen Specter" is "raising constitutional questions about just what Congress can do to restrict the commander in chief's ability to wage war." In a letter to Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, Specter "called for more hearings on Congress' options regarding Iraq and specifically questioned the Democrats' nascent plan to rewrite the 2002 Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Iraq." He also "also outlined a number of ways in which Congress previously has restricted or cut off funds for war efforts," notably against President Nixon in the early 1970s.

Levin Says Democrats Will Not Cut Off Funding. On NBC's Meet the Press (2/25), Levin said, "Our differences are with the Commander in Chief and his policies, and we're going to fund the troops as long as they're there."

Lieberman Urges Continued Commitment To War. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/26, A19, 2.04M), Sen. Joseph Lieberman writes that the US now has "a new strategy, a new commander, and more troops on the ground." Antiwar lawmakers "have already made up their minds about America's cause in Iraq, declaring their intention to put an end to the mission before we have had the time to see whether our new plan will work. ... halting the current security operation at midpoint, as virtually all of the congressional proposals seek to do, would have devastating consequences."

Brownback Supports "Three-State" Proposal. Sen. Sam Brownback, on CNN's Late Edition (2/25, Blitzer), said, "I think we have to get to a political solution and that we cannot impose a military solution. … The worst thing to happen would be for us to precipitously pull out. … I really think we need to push in Iraq for a three-state, one-country solution: a Kurdish region, a Sunni region and a Shia region, with Baghdad as the federal city."

UK Troops Withdrawal Insulates Democrats From "Cut And Run" Criticism. Newsweek (3/5, McGuire, Wolffe, Dehghanpisheh, 3.12M) reports, "Several officials on both sides of the Atlantic (who all declined to be named when discussing the internal debate on security issues) say there was real consternation among Bush's aides about the prospect of a British withdrawal at a time when the president was planning to make the case for a surge of troops. … After several rounds of talks, the Americans were eventually satisfied that Britain's phased withdrawal would truly be 'conditions-based'; that the reduction in force was geared to the security situation on the ground and not a politically inspired cut-and-run." Democrats "treated the news as a flak jacket against GOP accusations that they support a policy of retreat. 'No matter how the White House tries to spin it, the British government has decided to split with President Bush,' said Sen. Ted Kennedy. … One Downing Street source told NEWSWEEK that it's 'potentially the case' that all British troops could be out of Iraq by the end of 2008."

Cost Of Iraq War May Reach $2 Trillion. Newsweek (3/5, Samuelson, 3.12M) writes, "No one knows what the wars' ultimate costs might be. But suppose that they reach $2 trillion by 2017 (the figure is cumulative, not in any one year). That's a big number, perhaps too big. It's also a wild guess. Still, CBO estimates all federal spending over the same period (2002-2017) will total $48 trillion; war spending would be about 4 percent. In the same period, the income of the U.S. economy (gross domestic product) would total an estimated $248 trillion; war spending would be less than 1 percent of that. The point, as I said in 2002, is that we're so wealthy we 'can wage war almost with pocket change.' With hindsight, it now seems almost incontestable that the Iraq war should never have been fought. … But I am certain—now as then—that budget consequences should occupy a minor spot in our war debates."

Closing Of State-Owned Factories Blamed For Instability. Newsweek (3/5, Zakaria, 3.12M) writes, "One of the less-remarked-upon blunders of the Coalition Provisional Authority was that -- consumed by free-market ideology -- it shut down all of Iraq's state-owned enterprises. This crippled the bulk of Iraq's non-oil economy, threw hundreds of thousands of workers into the streets and further alienated the Sunnis, who were the managerial class of the country. The economic effects of this decision have been seismic. For example, Iraq's agricultural productivity has plummeted because fertilizer plants were summarily closed. Unemployment in non-Kurdish Iraq remains close to 50 percent, which helps explain why so many young men are joining gangs, militias and insurgent groups. … Paul Brinkley, a talented deputy under secretary of Defense, is trying to get the bulk of these state-owned factories up and running."

Iran's Influence In Iraq Said To Be Often Overestimated. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Ajami, 2.03M) writes, "'A cemetery of dreams.' Iran is a radical player in the world of states, to be sure, but we should not overstate its power. We should not fall for the Persian bluff. It is important that we do all we can to thwart Iran's nuclear ambitions and to checkmate it in arenas that count, but we should always remember that this is a society swimming against the tide of history and confronting the limits of its capabilities. There is an Iranian role in Iraq, but it should not be exaggerated. It is not true that the Iraqi political class marches to the Iranian drummer. It is well known that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki spent his years of exile in Syria and kept his distance from the Iranians. … The Iranians dwell virtually alone in the House of Islam, separated by language and culture, marked by their Shiism."

Bush Said To Need To Overcome "Iraq Syndrome" In Making Case Against Iran. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Duffy, 2.03M) writes, "It took the Pentagon's highest-ranking soldier, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to flatly refute the unsupported 'highest levels' statement. Then President Bush finally got around to doing the same thing. 'We don't know ... whether the head leaders of Iran ordered' it, he conceded. For all the predictable-and, evidently, unfounded-criticism about the Bush administration's trying to make a case for attacking Iran, much as it made its flawed case for attacking Iraq, there is more at stake here than politics as usual, and perhaps President Bush's forthright rejection of the 'highest leaders' charge was a tentative first step toward acknowledging it. … As a result of the many misapprehensions and misstatements made before the invasion of Iraq and in its mismanaged aftermath, we are now beset by something that can only be called the Iraq syndrome. Its symptoms may be seen not just in the cynicism of so many Americans, as reflected in the opinion polls, but also in the reflexive rejection of American pronouncements by friends and allies even, as was the case with the unfortunate Baghdad briefing, when they are tenanted upon hard, credible evidence.'

Wounded Vets' Poor Care Seen As Undermining War On Terror. Newsweek (3/5, Ephron, Childress, 3.12M), in its cover story titled, "How U.S. Is Failing Its War Veterans, reports, "How well do we care for our wounded and impaired when they come home? For a country amid what President Bush calls a 'long war,' the question has profound moral implications. We send young Americans to the world's most unruly places to execute our national policies. About 50,000 service members so far have been banged up or burned, suffered disease, lost limbs or sacrificed something less tangible inside them. … The question of after-action care also has strategic consequences. Iraq marks the first drawn-out campaign we've fought with an all-volunteer military. In practice, that means far fewer Americans are taking part in this war (12 percent of the total population participated in World War II, 2 percent in Vietnam and less than half of 1 percent in Iraq and Afghanistan). Already, the war has made it harder for the military to recruit new soldiers and more expensive to retain the ones it has. If we fall down in the attention we provide them, who's to say volunteers will continue coming forward?"

Treatment Of Wounded Iraqi Troops Described. Newsweek (3/5, Dehghanpisheh, 3.12M) reports, "During a speech last year, the then secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld noted that Iraqi security forces take casualties at 'roughly twice the rate of all Coalition forces.' That's approximately 40,000 wounded and more than 6,000 dead, grim numbers by any measure. (Both the Iraqi Ministry of Defense and the U.S. military refuse to divulge data on Iraqi wounded for 'security reasons.') … Most of the Iraqi soldiers are first transferred to a hospital in central Baghdad that, by local standards, has decent equipment and well-trained doctors. Some Sunni troops are terrified of being absorbed into the public-healthcare system, which is run by officials with ties to the Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. All the Baghdad hospitals that receive Iraqi wounded have heavy security to guard against insurgents."

Female Suicide Bomber Kills More Than 40 At Baghdad College. Coverage of a suicide bombing at a Baghdad university noted the ability of suicide bombers to inflict massive death tolls despite the ongoing crackdown, as well as the first repudiation of the crackdown by cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

The CBS Evening News (2/25, story 4, :30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "A suicide car bombing at a Baghdad college killed 41 people while a car bomb that exploded near the Iranian Embassy killed at least two civilians and wounded four others." ABC World News (2/25, story 3, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "At least 40 died when a female suicide bomber set off an enormous bomb at a college."

NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 3, 2:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "This time the target was a college where the student body is mostly Shiite." NBC (Arraf) adds, "Insurgents look for any target that will stop normal life in its tracks and show Iraqis not even soldiers can protect them."

The New York Times (2/26, Cave, Habeeb, 1.16M) reports in the most detailed print coverage of the bombing that one student "blamed Syria, Saudi Arabia and other countries for sowing destruction in his country. ... Other colleges throughout Iraq have been made targets in the past year, reflecting what is widely viewed as an attempt by Sunni extremist groups like Al Qaeda to drive out Iraq's middle class, the secular and the educated."

The Washington Post (2/26, A12, Londono, 690K) reports, "At least 39 students and nine guards were killed ... The attack was one of the deadliest in the capital since stepped-up security measures in the capital officially took effect on Feb. 14. U.S. and Iraqi officials have taken measures to limit vehicle access to markets, government buildings and other sites frequently targeted by insurgents using car bombs. But the officials have expressed concern about the difficulty of intercepting suicide bombers with explosives strapped to their bodies."

The Los Angeles Times (2/26, Susman, 850K) reports, "The attack was the second in recent weeks to target the mainly Shiite Muslim Mustansiriya University. ... [nonetheless], the Iraqi government insisted that the U.S.-Iraqi security plan launched nearly two weeks ago was succeeding. ... Students say Sadr's Al Mahdi militia virtually controls the university, enforcing conservative dress codes for women and canceling classes to honor Shiite martyrs. The militia's presence has made Mustansiriya a sectarian battleground."

USA Today/AP (2/26, Murphy) reports, "A female suicide bomber triggered a ball bearing-packed charge Sunday, killing at least 41 people at a mostly Shiite college ... The attack came as the powerful Shiite militia leader Muqtada al-Sadr said an ongoing security crackdown in Baghdad was doomed to fail because of U.S. involvement and suggested he was rethinking his cooperation."

Sadr Urges Iraqi Security Forces Not To Work With US. The CBS Evening News (2/25, story 4, :30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported Sadr "complained today that if bombs continue in Baghdad, he predicted that the US-led security crackdown is doomed to fail."

ABC World News (2/25, story 3, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "There's recent signs that Sadr wants to cooperate with the operation bringing Baghdad under control. But there's questions about whether or not that cooperation is real, and how long it might last." ABC (Marquez) adds, The US, so far, is not moving into Sadr City in great force. Analysts worry Sadr could be using the time to ferry Mahdi army leaders out of Iraq or using the US to eliminate his rivals."

The New York Times (2/26, Cave, Habeeb, 1.16M) reports, "Iraq's most powerful Shiite militant cleric publicly repudiated the new Baghdad security plan for the first time on Sunday, according to a statement distributed by his aides that said the push to quell violence was doomed to fail as long as it was directed by the American military." Without his blessing, "the prospects for continued sectarian violence and a direct conflict with American troops could increase. ... It was unclear why he would turn against the joint American-Iraqi plan, but many of his followers have been losing patience with the failure of the security push to eliminate violence against Shiites." The Al-Sadr statement "is likely to put more pressure on Prime Minister Maliki, who recently called the security plan a 'dazzling success.'"

The Washington Times/AP (2/26, Salaheddin) reports, "Many Shi'ites think bombings have continued because the Shi'ite-led government bowed to American pressure and persuaded the radical cleric Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr to take his Mahdi's Army fighters off the streets." Al-Sadr's statement "is likely to add pressure on U.S. and Iraqi forces to show results in the nearly two-week-old crackdown."

USA Today (2/26, 8A, 2.27M) reports, "According to a statement attributed to Muqtada al-Sadr, the radical Iraqi Shiite cleric has withdrawn support for a security crackdown in Baghdad. ... His militia has avoided confrontation with U.S. forces this time. There was no indication in the statement that this position would change."

The AP (2/25, Murphy) reports, "A return to the streets by the Mahdi Army forces could effectively block the security effort and raise the chances of Baghdad falling into sectarian street battles — the apparent aim of Sunni extremists seeking any way to destroy the U.S.-backed government. ... Shiite anger at the United States is running high since American soldiers on Friday detained the son of the most powerful Shiite political leader for nearly 12 hours."

Maliki Blames Sunni Mosque Attack On Al Qaeda. AFP (2/26) reports, "Iraq's Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki on Sunday blamed Al-Qaeda for a deadly bomb attack on a Sunni mosque, saying the blast proved that 'terrorists' will attack anyone, regardless of their sect. ... Suicide bomb attacks on civilian targets have become a hallmark of Sunni extremist assaults on Iraq's Shiite majority, and it is relatively unusual for such a strike to target Sunni worshippers. Maliki was at pains to stress that the attack should not be seen as sectarian in nature."

New Iraqi Troops Fly To Baghdad. The AP (2/25, Gamel) reports, "About 130 fresh Iraqi troops from the country's Kurdish north flew into Baghdad on Sunday to join the fight for the nation's capital — with the promise of a $200 bonus, nearly a month's pay. The mostly Kurdish soldiers — the first to arrive from the northern city of Irbil — were greeted by Iraqi commanders as they filed off the gray C-130 troop transport. ... The drafting of troops from the north — most former Kurdish guerrillas who fought for decades against Saddam Hussein's regime — to participate in the security crackdown in the capital has raised concerns as many speak no Arabic and are unfamiliar with the territory and urban warfare." Besides the bonus, the troops "would only be deployed for three months, then allowed to go home," according to Iraq's ground forces commander. Bonuses "underscore the eagerness of the Iraqi government to show it can rally sufficient forces."

Omar Reportedly Planning Renewed Taliban Offensive. Newsweek (3/5, Yousafzai, Moreau, 3.12M) reports, "Mullah Omar has emerged from the shadows, his field officers say, and with his inspiration they're planning a military push against U.S.-led forces like never before. NEWSWEEK has viewed a new recruiting video in which the Taliban's most notoriously cruel commander, the one-legged Mullah Dadullah Akhund, addresses an audience of some 400 men who are described as trained suicide bombers, ready to die on his order. 'Our suicide bombers are countless,' he says in a videotaped response to questions from NEWSWEEK. 'Hundreds have already registered their names, and hundreds more are on the waiting list.' Those claims, while impossible to verify, can't be discounted, either. In an interview that aired on Al-Jazeera last week, Dadullah claimed to have more than 6,000 armed guerrillas in underground hideouts and other staging areas, awaiting the moment to strike."

Talabani Reportedly Hospitalized For Exhaustion. NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 3, 2:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "There are new concerns over the health of Iraq's President Jalal Talabani. He was rushed to an Iraqi hospital and later flown to Jordan for medical treatment. His son denied that Talabani had a stroke or heart attack and said his father was suffering from exhaustion and walked off the plane on his own." ABC World News (2/25, story 3, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Officials say he's exhausted. He's been working very hard. They deny reports of a heart attack or a stroke." The CBS Evening News (2/25, story 4, :30, Mitchell, 7.66M) briefly mentioned the hospitalization.

The AP (2/25) reports, "An official at Talabani's Patriotic Union of Kurdistan party said the president has a long history of fainting when he is exhausted - a condition dating back to his years as a Kurdish guerrilla leader fighting Saddam Hussein's regime decades ago." An anonymous Jordanian doctor noted that Talabani was "not being flown in by a helicopter or transported in an ambulance," a possible sign that "his medical condition is not worrisome."

The Washington Post (2/26, A12, Londono, 690K) reports his illness in two sentences at the end of an article about a college suicide bombing. USA Today (2/26, 8A, 2.27M) also reports his illness.

Targets Of Baghdad Patrols Prove Elusive. The Washington Post (2/26, Partlow, 690K) reports on its front page, "American military commanders in Iraq describe the security plan they began implementing in mid-February as a rising tide: a gradual influx of thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops whose extended presence in the city's violent neighborhoods will drown the militants' ability to stage bombings and sectarian killings. ... But U.S. troops, Iraqi soldiers and officials, and Baghdad residents say the plan is hampered because security forces cannot identify, let alone apprehend, the elusive perpetrators of the violence. Shiite militiamen in the capital say they are keeping a low profile to wait out the security plan. U.S. commanders have noted increased insurgent violence in the Sunni-dominated belt around Baghdad and are concerned that fighters are shifting their focus outside the city. ... Many people in Baghdad express deep reservations about the Iraqi security forces' ability and desire to battle their fellow citizens. U.S. soldiers say their Iraqi counterparts are swayed more by the anti-American speeches of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr than by the public appeals of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki for even-handed enforcement."

Marines Train For Iraq Civil Affairs Duty. The Christian Science Monitor (2/26, Sasser, 59K) reports from Trenton, North Carolina, "One elderly man seemed shaken at the sight of marines striding into the Realo drugstore. ... The 5th Battalion, 10th Marine Regiment is unusual – the first active-duty unit in the Marine Corps to retrain for civil affairs work in Iraq. That means the 250 soldiers in the group will be departing from their frontline combat role to help Iraqis rebuild their cities and neighborhoods. The 5/10's six-month retraining has included study of Arabic and the Iraqi culture. The unit will be important in determining whether the US's latest – and perhaps final – initiative in Iraq works. ... The transition isn't easy for marines, who are trained to kill the enemy rather than engage in the softer skills of negotiation."

Anbar Fratricide May Escalate. The AP (2/25, Murphy) reports, "To much of the world, the meltdown in Iraq is a two-act spectacle: insurgents versus U.S.-led forces and Iraqi allies, and the sectarian bloodletting between Sunni Muslims and the majority Shiites. Yet out in the desert of the western Anbar province there is another story — told one attack at a time — of an internal struggle among Sunnis, between militant factions and those who have stood up against them. It's a fratricide that may be escalating. ... Political and religious leaders are being pushed to choose between the insurgency or the U.S.-backed government. Heads of the province's powerful desert clans also must decide if they will assist or resist the militants — setting off mafia-style turf wars along tribal lines." While "the Pentagon has learned some painful lessons about dealing with the insurgency here," it remains "difficult to recruit nervous Sunnis to the government's side."

US Says Iraq Raid Supports Claim On Iran. In a front page article, the New York Times (2/26, Glanz, Oppel, 1.16M) reports a raid on a Shiite weapons cache in the southern city of Hilla last week "is providing what American officials call the best evidence yet that the deadliest roadside bombs in Iraq are manufactured in Iran, but critics contend that the forensic case remains circumstantial and inferential." The new evidence includes "infrared sensors, electronic triggering devices and information about plastic explosives used in bombs that the Americans say lead back to Iran." But critics assert that "nearly all the bomb components could have been produced in Iraq or somewhere else in the region. Even if the evidence were to establish that Iran is the source, they add, that does not necessarily mean that the Iranian leadership is responsible." The assertion that the latest find "greatly bolsters the theory of the Iranian origin" of the weapons is "significant" because it could provide the US with "a new justification to take action against Iran." However, the evidence is "unlikely to satisfy skeptics who have been suspicious that the Bush administration is trying to lay the groundwork for attacking Iran."

Oil Ministry Casts Doubts On Draft Law. The AP (2/25, Juhi) reports, "The Oil Ministry cast doubt Sunday on statements indicating the Kurds had agreed to support a draft oil law that would divide revenues among all Iraqi factions and meet a key U.S. benchmark in Iraq. ... An Oil Ministry spokesman ... stressed that the draft law still needed to be discussed at the Cabinet level. ... The Bush administration, facing growing pressure to end the Iraq conflict, has been urging the Iraqis to finish the new oil law." The Washington Post (2/26, A12, Londono, 690K) reports that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "had promised that the law would be passed by the end of 2006."

Troops' Mental Health Needs Allegedly Not Met. The Washington Post/AP (2/26, Borenstein) reports, "Many Iraq war soldiers, veterans and their families are not getting needed psychological help because a stressed military's mental health system is overwhelmed and understaffed, a task force of psychologists found. The panel's 67-page report calls for the immediate strengthening of the military mental health system," citing "a 40 percent vacancy rate in active duty psychologists in the Army and Navy. ... The Defense Department's mental health experts hadn't read the report," but "Pentagon spokeswoman Cynthia Smith said the military is proud of its mental health services record, including a new program this year that checks up on service members after they return home to their families," while the VA's Annette Zeiss "said her agency didn't have 'an opportunity to present data (to the panel) about what the VA is really doing.'" Several veterans' advocates are quoted expressing discontent with the mental health system.

USA Today (2/26, 8A, Zoroya, 2.27M) reports that "the American Psychological Association task force said families are particularly at risk" and that the report faulted the Pentagon for failing "to implement the best mental health treatment programs across the military."

Iraqi Student Obtains Scholarship. ABC World News (2/25, story 4, 1:40, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "We have some good news from Iraq. For weeks, we've been following the struggles of one Iraqi teenager. ... Dan, whose last name we can't use for safety reasons, now has a visa to come to the U.S." Dan: "Very excited to go to the US it's a big opportunity to study there. And make a big future in me." Harris: "And Dan is scheduled to fly from Jordan to the US in just a few days. He will enroll in Thomas College shortly after that."

Dionne Claims Libby Case Explains Why Bush Has Lost Credibility On Iraq. Washington Post (2/26, A15, 690K) columnist E. J. Dionne writes, "The fabricate-and-smear cycle illustrated so dramatically during" the Libby case "explains why President Bush is failing to rally support for the latest iteration of his Iraq policy. The administration's willingness at the outset to say anything, no matter how questionable, to justify the war has destroyed its credibility. Its habit of attacking those who expressed misgivings has destroyed any goodwill it might have enjoyed. Bush and Cheney have lost the benefit of the doubt."

Elders From Taliban-Held Town Plead For Help. The New York Times (2/26, Wafa, Gall, 1.16M) reports, "Taliban fighters who seized control of a remote town [Musa Qala] in southern Afghanistan three weeks ago have started a campaign of arrests and reprisals against tribal elders and townspeople, according to tribal elders. The elders called on NATO forces and the government to move against the insurgents, even if it means bombing the town." The elders traveled to Kabul and expressed "bitterness that neither Afghan forces nor NATO troops responded when Taliban forces overran the town on Feb. 2. ... Asadullah Wafa, the governor of Musa Qala's province, Helmand, was at the NATO airbase at Kandahar discussing the situation with NATO commanders. He said that he was not aware that the Taliban had begun making arrests but that the government and NATO were poised to act."

Former Warlords Rally For Amnesty. The Christian Science Monitor (2/26, Sappenfield, 59K) reports on a man attending a rally in a Kabul soccer stadium, "He has come here to rail against [President Hamid] Karzai and the tyranny of Western nations, which have opposed an Afghan bill that would grant the mujahideen amnesty for war crimes committed during the past 25 years. ... Away from the teeming streets around the stadium, the attitudes of average Afghans take on a different air. Many express frustration that former military leaders who killed thousands and destroyed Kabul in a four-year civil war might never be brought to justice. Yet in a country still divided by tribes, tongues, and traditions, Friday's rally sent a clear message – that even now, Afghanistan's onetime warlords alone have the power to muster the masses." The amnesty bill "has been portrayed as a self-serving political ploy. Those likely to benefit most from the legislation are legislators and government officials themselves, many of whom are former mujahideen who stepped into the political vacuum following the fall of the Taliban."

US Attorney Dismissals Said To Look Political.

In an "Editorial Observer" column for the New York Times (2/26), Adam Cohen writes, "Carol Lam, the former United States attorney for San Diego, is smart and tireless and was very good at her job. Her investigation of Representative Randy Cunningham resulted in a guilty plea for taking more than $2 million in bribes from defense contractors and a sentence of more than eight years. Two weeks ago, she indicted Kyle Dustin Foggo, the former No. 3 official in the C.I.A. The defense-contracting scandal she pursued so vigorously could yet drag in other politicians. … In many Justice Departments, her record would have won her awards, and perhaps a promotion to a top post in Washington. In the Bush Justice Department, it got her fired." Cohen continues, "Ms. Lam is one of at least seven United States attorneys fired recently under questionable circumstances. The Justice Department is claiming that Ms. Lam and other well-regarded prosecutors like John McKay of Seattle, David Iglesias of New Mexico, Daniel Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona — who all received strong job evaluations — performed inadequately. … It is hard to call what's happening anything other than a political purge. And it's another shameful example of how in the Bush administration, everything — from rebuilding a hurricane-ravaged city to allocating homeland security dollars to invading Iraq — is sacrificed to partisan politics and winning elections." Cohen adds, "Three theories are emerging for why these well-qualified U.S. attorney were fired — all political, and all disturbing. … 1. Helping friends. Ms. Lam had already put one powerful Republican congressman in jail and was investigating other powerful politicians. The Justice Department, unpersuasively, claims that it was unhappy about Ms. Lam's failure to bring more immigration cases. Meanwhile, Ms. Lam has been replaced with an interim prosecutor whose résumé shows almost no criminal law experience, but includes her membership in the Federalist Society, a conservative legal group. … 2. Candidate recruitment. U.S. attorney is a position that can make headlines and launch political careers. Congressional Democrats suspect that the Bush administration has been pushing out long-serving U.S. attorneys to replace them with promising Republican lawyers who can then be run for Congress and top state offices. … 3. Presidential politics. The Justice Department concedes that Mr. Cummins was doing a good job in Little Rock. An obvious question is whether the administration was more interested in his successor's skills in opposition political research — let's not forget that Arkansas has been lucrative fodder for Republicans in the past — in time for the 2008 elections." Cohen concludes, "The politicization of government over the last six years has had tragic consequences — in New Orleans, Iraq and elsewhere. But allowing politics to infect U.S. attorney offices takes it to a whole new level. Congress should continue to pursue the case of the fired U.S. attorneys vigorously, both to find out what really happened and to make sure that it does not happen again."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Halliburton Official Will Not Face SEC Charges. The Wall Street Journal (2/26) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission moved to withdraw charges against a former Halliburton Co. chief financial officer after accusing him more than two years ago of failing to ensure that the company disclosed an accounting change that was material to investors. In a filing in federal court in Houston, the SEC said it wanted to dismiss its pending claims against Gary Morris 'in the interest of justice.'"

Shareholders Push For Voice On Executive Compensation. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, B1, White, Patrick) reports, "Some shareholders are angry about soaring executive pay. Soon, they may get a voice. … Ahead of this year's annual meetings, activist investors have submitted shareholder proposals at roughly 60 companies seeking an advisory vote on executive pay, according to Institutional Shareholder Services. Targets include Citigroup Inc., Wells Fargo & Co., WellPoint Inc. and Northrop Grumman Corp." The Journal continues, "The vote would be nonbinding, but activists hope that public censure, or the threat of it, would prompt directors to curb outsized awards and better link pay with performance. The proposals come as new Securities and Exchange Commission rules requiring greater disclosure promise to cast a brighter spotlight on compensation." The Journal adds, "One company facing a shareholder proposal, insurer Aflac Inc., agreed earlier this month to give investors a nonbinding vote on executive compensation, beginning in 2009. Others, including Pfizer Inc. and Schering-Plough Corp., are discussing the possibility of similar moves. … This week, U.S. Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.), the new chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, plans to introduce a revised version of his 2005 bill that aimed to give shareholders power to veto executive-pay deals. He will hold a hearing next week on his latest measure, which instead would require advisory votes." The Journal notes, "The activists are taking a page from the British. Since 2003, United Kingdom shareholders have cast advisory votes on corporate compensation policies and how much they pay executives. Investors and companies say the practice, which began after the British government passed a law requiring it for all public companies, has generated more discussion between shareholders and boards. … But it hasn't necessarily curbed compensation."

Corporations Seen As Trying To Derail DOJ's White-Collar Prosecutions. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/26, A15), University of Florida law professor Michael Seigel writes, "Last time the public was tuned in, the Justice Department was vigorously prosecuting corporate giants such as Enron for massive frauds committed during the waning days of the stock bubble. Assisted by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, government lawyers were racking up victories in the battle against white-collar crime. One recent highlight was the October sentencing of former Enron chief executive Jeffrey Skilling to 24 years in prison." Seigel continues, "Now that the public's attention has shifted to matters such as Iraq, however, corporate America has launched a counterattack. Its goal is to derail the Justice Department's efforts to maintain a heightened level of white-collar criminal enforcement. Its success thus far starkly illustrates how power and money influence our criminal justice system. … Big business, represented primarily by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, could not attack white-collar criminal enforcement head-on. Instead, it enlisted the aid of its lawyers, including the American Bar Association and the Association of Corporate Counsel, in a more oblique assault. Their strategy was to mount an all-out offensive against a seemingly obscure trend: the Justice Department's increasing insistence that corporations waive their attorney-client privilege as part of their cooperation with government investigators." Seigel adds, "Through experience, government lawyers have learned that the efficiency of white-collar criminal prosecution can be significantly improved when companies facing indictment cooperate and provide relevant information. This way, prosecutors can get to the bottom of complex criminality and promptly indict those responsible. However, unlike an ordinary criminal who cooperates by telling what he knows, a corporation only 'knows' what its employees tell it. Often, information relevant to a prosecution has been gathered by the corporation's counsel. Therefore, to cooperate, the corporation must waive its attorney-client privilege. … In a January 2003 document known as the 'Thompson Memorandum,' Justice told its prosecutors to consider a corporation's willingness to waive its attorney-client privilege in determining whether it ought to be indicted. This is where big business and its lawyers aimed their attack. Treating attorney-client privilege as if it were a sacrosanct American institution, akin to freedom of speech, they claimed that Justice was unfairly using its tremendous power to coerce corporations into privilege waivers. The resultant erosion of the privilege would be catastrophic, they contended. This tactic even garnered the support of the American Civil Liberties Union, and together the various lobbying groups formed the Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege. … But big business smells blood. Its reaction to the McNulty memo has been negative, and its goal continues to be the outright prohibition of waiver requests. Through reintroduction of the Specter bill, it is pressing its legislative 'fix' in the new Congress, and the newly empowered Democrats -- eager for lobbyists' money -- are likely to be as responsive as their Republican predecessors. The result of a waiver prohibition, of course, would be a significant slowdown of white-collar criminal prosecutions -- exactly what the business lobby wants. And the losers, once again, would be the victims of white-collar crime: the American people."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Probe Of Alaskan Influence-Peddling Focuses On Oil Industry Player. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, Carlton) reports from Anchorage, AK, "The oil industry has long enjoyed a cozy relationship with the state government here -- not to mention the residents, who receive an annual dividend from the industry." The Journal continues, "A Federal Bureau of Investigation probe of influence peddling -- which has focused on one of the oil industry's most powerful players -- is shaking up those ties. … At the center of the turmoil is closely held VECO Corp., the state's largest oil-services company, which has provided construction, engineering, management and other services for pipelines, refineries and other facilities." The Journal adds, "VECO has long been one of Alaska's most prodigious campaign contributors; Chairman Bill Allen and top VECO executives have donated a total of more than $1 million to state campaigns since 1998. A year ago, a witness saw Mr. Allen in the gallery of the state legislature passing notes to a Republican politician backed by the company -- at the same time that legislators were debating a measure to cut taxes on the industry. … In August, FBI agents swarmed into legislative offices throughout the state seeking evidence of payments to state lawmakers by Mr. Allen and his executives, according to a warrant. Since then, a cloud from the investigation has hung over the state's capital, Juneau. … In recent months, a number of Alaska politicians have publicly distanced themselves from VECO and refused to take any donations from it. The new governor, Republican Sarah Palin, made a refusal to accept any VECO donations part of her platform when she challenged former Gov. Tony Knowles -- a Democrat who had made a similar pledge." The Journal notes, "No VECO executives have been charged in the probe. FBI officials and Mr. Allen declined requests for comment. Amy Menard, an Anchorage attorney representing VECO, said, 'There is no question that VECO and some VECO executives have always, from day one, had an interest in politics. But to suggest that there has been improper or inappropriate political contributions is an unfair charge.'"

Bruno's Mixed Business Record Seen As Important Issue For Grand Jury. The New York Times (2/26, McIntire, 1.16M) reports, "It is an oft-told tale that has become part of Albany lore. Long before he became the State Senate majority leader, Joseph L. Bruno borrowed $5,000 to start a telephone equipment company, built it into a profitable business and sold it for $23 million in 1990. Born into poverty, Mr. Bruno became a millionaire. … In fact, the company had been steadily losing money, and Mr. Bruno made less than $400,000 from the transaction. As a result, Mr. Bruno began to pursue other sources of money, and those pursuits are now the subject of a federal investigation." The Times notes, "Some of Mr. Bruno's other business ventures, before and after he sold Coradian, did poorly," and his "mixed success as a businessman might have important implications for a federal grand jury investigation into his financial dealings." The Times goes on to detail Bruno's business dealings that are under FBI scrutiny.

Three Sentenced To Prison For Running Seattle-Area Brothels. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (2/24, McDonald, 124K) reported, "The three leaders of a ring of Seattle-area brothels and escort services were sentenced in U.S. District Court on Friday to two and three years in prison." Kesheng Zhu, Rujing Jiang and Yong Jun Kang, "who are all Chinese citizens and in the U.S. illegally, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to transport individuals for prostitution and conspiracy to launder money. According to court documents, Zhu and his wife, Rujing, started in the prostitution business in 2003 with the opening of the Apple Spa massage parlor in Bellevue as the front for a brothel. The business was sold to Kang in early 2004 for $10,000, then raided that April by the Eastside Narcotics Task Force. Officers found hundreds of used condoms in the massage parlor's garbage." The P-I added, "Both Zhu and Kang used a national network of prostitutes and brothels. … Most of the women were in the United States on expired visas and came from across Asia." The Seattle Times (2/23, 118K) noted on its Web site, "The three people were among nine arrested in August following a 21-month investigation by the FBI, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Seattle Police Department." The AP (2/24) also reported on the sentences.

Judge Orders Continued Detention Of Alleged Texas Syndicate Members. The Houston Chronicle (2/24, George, 530K) reported, "A federal judge ordered detention Friday for four alleged Texas Syndicate gang members who sought release pending trial. Seventeen Houston-area men are charged in an indictment that alleges murders, armed robberies and drug trafficking. The four who will remain detained after a two-day hearing this week are: Francisco Nuncio Jr., 34; Johnny Perez Jr., 35 of Houston; Robbie Lee Danas, 35, of Rosenberg; George Duran, 39, of Baytown." The Chronicle noted, "Grounds for detention were based on testimony this week from an FBI agent who has worked for five years building the case. Special Agent Randy Durney said the agency began investigating murders credited to the Texas Syndicate in 2002. … Membership is lifelong, Durney said."

The AP (2/24) reported that "Durney said federal authorities began investigating the gang after learning from confidential sources the group was responsible for a series of murders in the Houston area. Using wire taps and confidential informants, some who were gang members, Durney said the FBI learned the Texas Syndicate would routinely rob drug dealers at their homes. … During his lengthy testimony, Durney described how gang members would meet, sometimes at bars or at family barbecues, to vote on whether to kill other members."

Louisiana Woman Pleads Guilty To FEMA Relief Fraud. The Baton Rouge Advocate (2/24, 98K) reported, "A Baton Rouge woman pleaded guilty in federal court to one count of making a false claim for disaster assistance benefits. According to court documents, Latoya Dunn submitted a fraudulent application for FEMA benefits, falsely claiming that her primary residence had been damaged during Hurricane Katrina. The Federal Emergency Management Agency mailed Dunn a $2,000 check."

Ohio Broker Charged With Investment Fraud. The Toledo Blade (2/17, Reiter) reported, "The former manager and vice president of a Toledo brokerage firm was charged…in federal court in a $17 million-to-$40 million investment scam. William A. Sirls of Grosse Ile, Mich., was charged in U.S. District Court in Toledo with money laundering and mail fraud. A bill of information filed in the court alleges Mr. Sirls, who was manager and vice president of a Toledo Wachovia Securities office, engaged in fraudulent investment transactions to bilk investors, co-workers, and others in a Ponzi scheme. … But Toledo attorney Stephen Hartman said the case against his client emerged only after Mr. Sirls went to authorities late last year and confessed. … 'He turned himself in and voluntarily came in and told authorities about his activities. He never did get caught,' Mr. Hartman said."

Montana Man Sentenced To Five Years In Prison For Online Solicitation. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (2/24, McNerthney, 124K) reported, "A Montana man was sentenced in federal court Friday to five years in prison and 15 years of supervised release for traveling to Washington state and attempting to have sex with a minor. Andy Maxfield , 55, was arrested…at a Holiday Inn in Kent, where police say he intended to meet a 13-year-old girl. He had been investigated since June 2006 when he entered an online chat room…and contacted a federal investigator posing as the girl's mother, Department of Justice officials said. … The former bus driver also made arrangements to engage in sexual activity with the minor, the documents said." The P-I noted, "Maxfield's case was brought as part of Project Safe Childhood -- a nationwide initiative designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse."

States Consider Easing Sex-Offender Residency Restrictions. USA Today (2/26, 1A, Koch) reports, "Oklahoma state Rep. Lucky Lamons was a police officer for 22 years. He calls himself a 'lock-'em-up kind of guy.' … Yet Lamons wants to loosen his state's law that bans registered sex offenders from living within 2,000 feet of a school or day care center. He says it forces many offenders to live in rural areas where they are difficult for authorities to monitor. Also, he says, it does not differentiate between real predators and the type of men he recalls arresting for urinating in public, a sex offense in Oklahoma. … 'We need to focus on people we're afraid of, not mad at,' says Lamons, a Tulsa Democrat who wants the rules to focus more on high-risk offenders." USA continues, "Lamons is among a growing number of officials who want to ease the 'not-in-my-backyard' policies that communities are using to try to control sex offenders. In the past decade, 27 states and hundreds of cities have reacted to public fear of sex crimes against children by passing residency restrictions that, in some cases, have the effect of barring sex offenders from large parts of cities. They can't live in most of downtown Tulsa, Atlanta or Des Moines, for example, because of overlapping exclusion zones around schools and day care centers." USA adds, "Now a backlash is brewing. Several states, including Iowa, Oklahoma and Georgia, are considering changes in residency laws that have led some sex offenders to go underground. Such offenders either have not registered with local police as the laws require or they have given fake addresses. Many complain they cannot find a place to live legally. … The push to ease residency restrictions has support from victims' advocates, prosecutors and police who say they spend too much time investigating potential violations. … They're battling a mountain of momentum, however, because residency restrictions remain popular. … New or expanded ones have been proposed in 20 states this year. Some legislators are reluctant to pare back restrictions they passed only recently."

Retired Georgia Teacher Becomes Whistleblower Over Reading Program. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/26) reports from Savannah, GA about reading teacher Cindy Cupp, who "rose to the top — becoming Georgia's director of reading instruction — before she retired and created her own brand of 'Dick and Jane' textbooks. But four years ago, Cupp found herself in a fight over her storybooks that led from her port city all the way to Washington." The AJC continues, "Cupp had no idea what she was getting into in 2003 when she tried to have her 'Dr. Cupp Readers' approved for use in Reading First, a major federal initiative promising to make all children successful readers by fourth grade. Cupp just figured her company could benefit from the $6 billion flowing to schools for new reading programs. … Now, after years of pursuing perceived wrongs that blocked Cupp Publishers from winning lucrative contracts, she stands as a key whistle-blower whose complaints helped touch off a federal audit of the Georgia Department of Education, a shake-up at the U.S. Department of Education and possible congressional hearings on conflicts of interest that may have compromised Reading First." The AJC adds, "Nearly 150 elementary schools, including some in Atlanta and in Clayton and DeKalb counties, are serving 53,000 Georgia students through Reading First. So far, nearly $100 million has been spent statewide on textbooks, training and reading specialists. … Cupp's curriculum — which teaches children to read with phonics instruction, where students decipher the sounds letters make, and by tutoring in common words — is used in about 80 elementary schools. Only three are part of Reading First. … State and federal officials have said mistakes made in implementing the program have been corrected, but deny taking any intentional actions that may have favored big national publishers with connections over smaller companies such as Cupp's. … Now Cupp is waiting to hear whether the U.S. Department of Justice will open another investigation as she continues her life's work: visiting schools to assist teachers, checking students' progress and prescribing remedies for those who struggle."

WPost Praises SCOTUS Decision On Tobacco Trial Award. The Washington Post (2/26, A14, 690K) editorializes that "regardless of what you think about tobacco companies, you should welcome last week's Supreme Court decision that repudiated an $80 million ruling against Philip Morris. … The issue…revolved around how the jury calculated the size of the punitive damages it awarded Mr. Williams's estate -- almost all of the $80 million package."

Virginia Officials Try To Make Ice Center Accessible. The AP (2/26, Karush) reports, "When Arlington County (VA) officials unveiled a new ice complex to serve as the Washington Capitals' practice facility, they emphasized it would also be a community resource serving diverse groups, particularly the disabled. … So Rosemary Ciotti, who lives nearby and uses a wheelchair, was particularly dismayed when she visited the new facility shortly after it opened in November and discovered there was no room in the bleachers for her to watch the action on the ice. Despite its $42.8 million price tag, the Kettler Capitals Iceplex is not compliant with the Americans with Disabilities Act." The AP continues, "Another disabled Arlington resident, Sheri Denkensohn, said she visited the iceplex after hearing about the problems from Ciotti. Outraged by what she saw, she filed a complaint with the Justice Department. … Arlington officials say such glitches are common in construction projects. They say they already have addressed most of the ADA problems that were noted by building inspectors before the facility opened and are working to correct the problem with the bleachers." The AP adds, "In April, the Special Hockey International Tournament is expected to draw 1,500 people to the iceplex. In March, USA Disabled Hockey and other groups are hosting a sled hockey clinic there. Officials said the bleachers should be fixed in time for both events. … Construction of the iceplex was paid for by the county, and the Capitals signed a long-term lease. The 137,000-square-foot facility, built atop a seven-story public parking garage in Arlington's Ballston neighborhood, has two NHL-sized rinks, office space and locker rooms, as well as a Capitals training center with a weight room and medical facilities. It also houses the front offices of the Capitals and the WNBA's Washington Mystics. …

Congress To Revisit Gays In Military Issue. ABC World News (2/25, story 5, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "On Capitol Hill this week, Congress is set to revisit the divisive issue of gays and lesbians in the military. ... Part of the rationale here, at a time when the military is struggling to fill its ranks, it can't afford to turn qualified people away." ABC (Tapper) added, "Decorated Air Force Staff Sergeant David Hall wants to fly missions in Iraq and was training to be a pilot." Hall: "To have that taken away from me, it was devastating." Tapper: "Hall is one of more than 11,000 gay and lesbian service members discharged under the 'don't ask/don't tell' policy enacted in 1993. ... One government study found that 8% of the discharged gay soldiers held critical occupations, including 322 with skills in an important language, such as Arabic, Farsi or Korean. Public opinion has shifted. In 1993, only 44% of the American people supported letting gays and lesbian troops serve openly. In 2004, 63% supported their serving openly."

Genealogist Says Thurmond Family Owned Sharpton's Ancestor. ABC World News (2/25, story 6, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Today, one of the country's most outspoken civil rights activists went public with what he calls a chilling discovery. The Rev. Al Sharpton has just found out slavery connects him to a long-serving US Senator, the late Strom Thurmond of South Carolina who once used his power to fight for segregation." ABC (Jamieson) added Sharpton's "ancestors were slaves to the family of Strom Thurmond, hardline opponent of civil rights during many of his 50 years in the Senate, and candidate of the Dixiecrat Segregationist Party in 1948." NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 10, ;20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported the New York Daily News "says it found documents showing that some of Sharpton's ancestors were slaves once owned by Thurmond's relatives. Sharpton called the report chilling."

The Washington Post (2/26, A1, Shulman, 690K) reports "revelation was particularly stunning for the juxtaposition of the two men's public lives." The New York Times (2/26, B3, Santos, 1.16M) reports Sharpton "said he had not heard from the Thurmonds and had no immediate plans of contacting them. 'This is not family,' he said firmly. 'This is property.'" USA Today/AP (2/26) reports, "Some of Thurmond's relatives said the nexus also came as a surprise to them. Doris Strom Costner, a distant cousin who said she knew the late senator all her life, said Sunday she 'never heard of such a thing.'"

UCLA To Create Chair For Sexual Orientation Law. The Los Angeles Times (2/26, Gordon) reports, "Thanks to a more than $1-million donation from a gay male couple who hope one day to marry in California, UCLA's law school is planning to establish what is described as the nation's first endowed academic chair in sexual orientation law." The Times continues, "The cash gift from John McDonald and Rob Wright will help fund the research of a still-to-be-named professor at UCLA Law School's Williams Institute on Sexual Orientation Law and Public Policy. That 5-year-old think tank investigates such topics as anti-homosexual discrimination, the impact of the military's don't ask-don't tell policies and the demographics of same-sex couples who have adopted children. … 'This is going to support legal scholarship, legal research and education that covers a whole area so fundamental to creating change,' said McDonald, a retired businessman and attorney who earned his bachelor's degree at UCLA. 'We just think this is one of the best things we've ever done.'" The Times adds, "The UC system recently approved an agreement to accept the money, but formal establishment of the chair awaits a review to ensure that it matches UC's research and teaching missions and is not too narrowly drawn, system officials said. Although the research topics may upset social conservatives, approval is expected. … The donation for the chair was announced publicly in connection with a Williams Institute conference Friday at the Westwood campus." The Times notes, "Though some universities have chairs in gay and gender studies, those have been in the humanities and social sciences and not in a law school, said Brad Sears, executive director of the Williams Institute. A professor from the current UCLA law faculty will be appointed to the chair in three to six months, and the funds will help pay for such things as teaching assistants and research costs, Sears said."

WSJournal Notes FL13 Voting Machine Study's Findings. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "we thought you'd like to know that an independent team of computer scientists has absolved touch-screen voting machines of stealing an election in Florida's 13th Congressional District last November. Republican Vern Buchanan won his seat by a mere 369 votes over Democratic challenger Christine Jennings, who has nonetheless refused to concede and has sued to demand a new election. Ms. Jennings claims that faulty software was the cause of 18,000 'undervotes,' or incidences where voters cast ballots in other races but not in the Congressional contest, in what is a mainly GOP district on the Florida Gulf Coast south of Tampa."

TXU Board Accepts $45 Billion Takeover Bid From Private Equity Group. The Washington Post (2/26, A4, Mufson, Cho) reports, "TXU, the largest energy provider in Texas, agreed last night to a $45 billion buyout that would not only be the largest private-equity deal in history but would also feature an unusual twist: The buyers have promised environmental groups they would cancel a slew of coal-fired power plants on the firm's drawing boards." The Post continues, "The buyout firms' deal with environmental groups, which could become a landmark in the battle over climate-change policy, would force an abrupt turnaround in the strategy of TXU, which has defied environmentalists' and congressional criticism of its plans to expand coal use and carbon dioxide emissions." The Post adds, "The environmental agreement was the idea of the private-equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, which made it a condition of the acquisition, according to several sources involved in the negotiations, who gave details of the deal on condition of anonymity because it had not been announced yet. … Texas Pacific's head, David Bonderman, is no stranger to creative deals in the energy sector or in the cause of environmentalism. Bonderman sits on the boards of the World Wildlife Fund and the Grand Canyon Trust. He was a key figure in negotiating with power plants in Arizona to reduce air pollution over the Grand Canyon. In the TXU case, he tasked William K. Reilly, who had led the Environmental Protection Agency under President George H.W. Bush, to reach out and negotiate with environmental groups." The Post notes, "If shareholders approve the acquisition, TXU would back federal legislation that would require reductions in carbon dioxide emissions through a cap-and-trade system. It would shelve plans for eight of 11 coal-fired plants that current TXU executives had proposed for Texas and would drop plans to build new coal plants in Pennsylvania and Virginia. The company would also double its spending to promote energy efficiency, to $80 million a year, for five years."

The Dallas Morning News/AP (2/26) reports, "Final details were still being worked out late Sunday, and TXU was expected to announce a deal early Monday, said the people, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the companies had not officially announced the deal." The AP adds, "Since a turnaround that began in 2004, TXU has become highly profitable, but the dramatic rise in its stock price had stalled, making it an attractive takeover target. … KKR and Texas Pacific Group agreed over the weekend to drop most of TXU's ambitious plans for building eight new coal-fired power plants, a move designed to win support for the deal from environmentalists and other critics of the company. … The new buyers also agreed to support a mandatory national program to cap emissions of greenhouse gases and pledged not to build coal-fired plants outside Texas."

The Wall Street Journal (2/26, Smith, Berman, Sender) reports, "For years, cash-rich buyout firms have tried to break into the lucrative electricity business only to be rebuffed by wary regulators, consumer groups and environmentalists. Now, in what would be the biggest leveraged-buyout ever, an investor group is hoping it has cracked the code." The Journal continues,. "A total of seven firms -- led by Kohlberg, Kravis, Roberts & Co., Texas Pacific Group and Goldman Sachs Group -- are close to signing a deal to buy utility powerhouse TXU Corp. for $32 billion plus more than $12 billion in TXU debt, according to people familiar with the matter. In a creative twist, the firms have moved quickly to pre-empt opposition from powerful environmental groups while seeking support from various regulators and politicians. Already, the potential buyers have promised to cancel plans to build all but three of the company's 11 coal-fired plants under development. And they are planning to placate consumers with rate reductions." The Journal adds, "The deal marks a quantum leap in the political sophistication of the buyout world, and may signal a broader remaking of private equity's image in the utility industry. Buyout firms have generally received a chilly reception from utility regulators because they're seen as temporary, profit-driven caretakers not answerable to public shareholders or sensitive to consumers. If the prospective TXU buyers can overcome that perception, they could potentially open the door for more private-equity investors. … A successful deal will also create a chance to profit from a central predicament facing today's utility industry: a public that hungers for more and more electricity to burn, but has limited will to build new plants for providing it. … But it's far from a sure thing. Regulators at all levels of government could trip up the deal. It may also be subject to complaints from consumers who regard reasonably priced electrical service as a basic right."

Deal Is Unique In Corporate-Environmental Cooperation. The New York Times (2/26, Sorkin) reports, "About two weeks ago, Fred Krupp, the president of a nonprofit advocacy group called Environmental Defense, received an unusual phone call. … William K. Reilly, the former administrator for the Environmental Protection Agency under President George H. W. Bush, was on the other end. But before Mr. Reilly would explain the reason for his call, he said he needed an assurance from Mr. Krupp that he would keep the conversation confidential." The Times continues, "After receiving such a pledge, Mr. Reilly dropped a bombshell: the TXU Corporation, the Texas energy giant that had become the whipping boy of the nation's largest environmental groups, was in talks to be sold to a group led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and Texas Pacific Group, two large private equity firms. … Mr. Reilly, who works for Texas Pacific, said he wanted to negotiate a cease-fire. If the investors succeeded in taking over TXU, Mr. Reilly said, they would commit themselves to scale back significantly on TXU's plan to build 11 new coal plants and adhere to a strict set of environmental rules. In return, he wanted the support of Mr. Krupp and his peers, who had spent the past several months waging a bitter and public war against TXU." The Times adds, "Last night, after several weeks of marathon negotiations that brought together both environmentalists and Wall Street bankers, the board of TXU was moving toward a vote to accept the bid from Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific for about $45 billion, which would be the largest buyout in history. … The deal would be noteworthy not just for its size, but for the confluence of business decisions and environmental concerns that drove the ultimate transaction. Because private equity firms are unregulated and historically have valued their privacy, neither Kohlberg Kravis nor Texas Pacific were eager to become an "enemy combatant" of the environmental groups, people involved in the talks said. Reducing the coal plant initiative will also free up billions of dollars in planned spending that the firms will be able to use for other projects or to help finance the transaction."

Kravis An Old Hand At The Takeover Game. The New York Times (2/26, Thomas) reports, "He has been there, done that, and now, close to 20 years after clinching the grandest buyout deal ever, Henry R. Kravis seems to be doing it again." The Times continues, "As always, the raw numbers loom large: $45 billion for the proposed buyout of the TXU Corporation, compared to $39 billion for the Blackstone Group's recent deal with Equity Office Properties and $25 billion for his RJR Nabisco takeover in 1988. … As this era's generation of hedge fund executives and private equity moguls use their billions to buy art, assume leadership roles in New York's cultural institutions and publicly celebrate their successes, they are working from a two-decade-old playbook of one of Wall Street's oldest masters, Mr. Kravis himself." The Times adds, "In contrast to the giddy exuberance of this era's newly minted billionaires, however, Mr. Kravis, who is 63, is making his resurgence not only as a cornerstone of New York's social and financial landscape, but also as a seasoned executive whose survival of a series of tough business setbacks and personal tragedies during the 1990s has given him a more measured perspective. … 'Look, don't congratulate us when we buy a company, congratulate us when we sell it,' Mr. Kravis said in an interview he gave to the Academy of Achievement. 'Because any fool can overpay and buy a company, as long as money will last to buy it.' … It's a telling comment, and according to people who know him it has become a favored maxim for Mr. Kravis, one that he trots out whenever anyone tries to praise him for a large deal. In this heady period, a deal maker's time on the mountaintop can be short indeed."

Tribune Mulls Late Offer From Real Estate Magnate. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A12, Ellison) reports, "Despite considering a late-breaking bid from Chicago real-estate magnate Sam Zell, Tribune Co.'s board is inching closer to a "self-help" restructuring deal it will implement on its own, say people familiar with the situation." The Journal continues, "The board met with its advisers Saturday for an update on the five-month-old auction. Unlike the past couple of board meetings, it issued no statement afterward. Tribune -- which owns the Los Angeles Times, the Chicago Tribune and 23 television stations -- has promised shareholders a resolution of the auction by March 31." The Journal adds, "Mr. Zell's offer to take the company private emerged after the deadline for offers last month. People familiar with the situation noted that his proposal is structured in a way that would take time to implement, a strike against it for executives. … The board's preferred plan continues to be a recapitalization involving a spinoff of Tribune's TV stations and the payment of a big dividend to shareholders. Such a plan could involve buying out part of the 20% stake in Tribune held by the Chandler family, the company's biggest shareholder and the instigator for the sale process last year."

The New York Times (2/26, Seelye, Sorkin) reports, "Mr. Zell, 66, has never owned a major media property, but gained the nickname the 'Grave Dancer' for his ability to spot and exploit undervalued properties in the real estate business. … His proposal would involve buying the entire company with the participation of an employee stock ownership plan, these people said. Although the deal would be highly leveraged, the employee stock plans have many tax advantages, including the ability to write off interest on debt." The Times adds, "Tribune has received two other bids, but considered both inadequate and has been putting together what it called a self-help plan in which it would spin off its two dozen broadcast outlets, keep most if not all of its 11 newspapers, and borrow money to pay shareholders a large dividend. … It has also been considering ways to buy out the Chandler family, the company's biggest shareholder, possibly with the help of the McCormick Tribune Foundation, the second largest."

The Financial Times (2/26, Chaffin, Politi) reports, "Tribune, which owns 23 television stations as well as the Los Angeles Times, Chicago Tribune and other papers, put itself up for sale last year under pressure from one of its largest shareholders. So far, the sale has drawn scant interest, forcing Tribune's board to push back their self-imposed deadline to the end of the first quarter, and highlighting investors' concerns about the future of the newspaper business. … Until Mr Zell, a real estate mogul, stepped in, Tribune had been weighing a combined offer from two billionaires, Eli Broad and Ron Burkle, and one from the Chandler family, which had originally pressed for the company's break-up. Neither, however, represented a premium to Tribune investors. … As a result, Tribune officials were leaning toward a 'self-help plan,' according to people familiar with the matter, in which the company would be split into newspaper and broadcasting divisions and offer investors a dividend. The downside of the plan is that it would add to the company's debt load, and could limit its financial flexibility."

Fate Of XM's DC Headquarters Uncertain In Merger. The Washington Post (2/26, D1, Heath) reports, "XM Satellite Radio chief executive Hugh Panero and his top engineer were exploring an abandoned printing plant in Northeast Washington back in 1999, looking for a home for their growing space-age radio company. … 'This is the greatest place I can imagine,' Panero recalled saying to himself, noting its spacious rooms and 20-foot ceilings. Not even the spent bullets strewn across the roof dissuaded him, he said last week -- though the engineer, a retired Air Force brigadier general, 'thought I was nuts.'" The Post continues, "XM bought the building. The company invested $70 million in high-tech and aerospace hardware. And as it grew into a $4.3 billion enterprise that today employs more than 700 people, it helped turn the area around New York and Florida avenues NE from a strip of boarded-up buildings into a growing commercial center with a Metro stop, office and condo space and the future headquarters of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … But XM itself has been on a wild ride, losing more than $3 billion over the past seven years. Its stock, which had rocketed from $2 to nearly $40 a share , closed at $15.10 Friday, four days after the company announced its plan to merge with its New York-based rival, Sirius Satellite Radio." The Post adds, "The $13 billion deal is far from a lock, because the companies will have to overcome antitrust regulatory hurdles. But inside XM and elsewhere in Washington there was concern that the District might lose a company that had added some cutting-edge glamour to a business community better known for its government contractors. … Sirius chief executive Mel Karmazin, who would run the merged company, said in an interview that XM's headquarters building is a valuable asset and that he might even expand its workforce. But there was an anxious mood last week in the XM hallways -- where dimly lit studios have names like XM Kids and Liquid Metal, and the conference rooms are labeled Sinatra, Springsteen and Hendrix."

Western States To Sign Regional Climate Change Compact. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, 2.04M) reports that as leaders "at the state level decided much more needs to be done to address climate change, five Western states -- California, Arizona, New Mexico, Oregon and Washington -- will announce at the National Governors Association annual winter meeting today a regional strategy to reduce global-warming emissions." The state leaders "will sign a memorandum of understanding that commits them to pursue clean-energy technology and market-based solutions toward greenhouse-gas emissions."

Bonds Attorney Says He Will Not Cooperate With Steroid Probe. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/26, Fainaru-Wada, Williams) reports, "Major League Baseball's top steroids investigator has urged Giants star Barry Bonds and other players tied to the BALCO drug scandal to submit to interviews and turn over their medical records, The Chronicle has learned. … But Bonds' lawyer said Sunday that the Giants star cannot cooperate with baseball's steroids investigation as long as he remains the focus of a possible perjury indictment." The Chronicle continues, "In a Feb. 1 letter, George Mitchell, the former U.S. Senate majority leader who is threatening that Congress may intervene if his investigation of performance-enhancing drug use in baseball is thwarted by lack of cooperation, urged Bonds and the other players to cooperate for the sake of the game. … 'Nothing is more important than the integrity of the game of baseball,' he wrote." The Chronicle adds, "Copies of Mitchell's letter, which was read to The Chronicle by a person with knowledge of the investigation, were sent to Bonds, Detroit Tigers outfielder Gary Sheffield and other players. … Bonds, Sheffield and six other present and former players testified in 2003 before the federal grand jury that investigated the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid ring. The players were implicated in the use of BALCO's banned drugs, according to evidence in possession of federal investigators, but none was accused of a crime. … Mitchell's letters were accompanied by medical waiver forms that, if signed, would allow baseball investigators access to a player's past, current and future medical records." The Chronicle notes, "Contacted for comment, Michael Rains, Bonds' lawyer, said he had told Mitchell that Bonds wanted to help but was unavailable as long as he faces possible indictment. … 'I said, "I'm sorry, but I have to give him that advice," ' Rains said. … For almost two years, federal authorities have been investigating whether Bonds testified falsely when he told the BALCO grand jury that he had never knowingly used banned drugs. As recently as November, then-U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan refused to comment on the status of the probe, Rains said. … If Schools, the new U.S. attorney, seeks an indictment of Bonds, the government's evidence of steroid use in baseball might become public in court proceedings -- and thus available to Mitchell. If the perjury investigation is dropped, Mitchell might get access to the prosecutor's witnesses and documents from the government itself."

Former Fugitive Gets 12-Year Sentence In Drug Conspiracy Case. The Ashtabula (OH) Star-Beacon (2/25) reported "convicted drug dealer fugitive Thomas J. MacWilliams is headed to 12 years and seven months in federal prison after being sentenced Feb. 14…in Clarksburg, W.Va." MacWilliams "fled Ashtabula County in 2005 after being convicted…of drug-related conspiracy charges. … A year-long search ended on May 7, 2006 when MacWilliams was apprehended by Harrison County drug task force officers. TAG and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration officials had received numerous tips on MacWillaims whereabouts, according to TAG task force commander Sgt. Jeff Orr."

LATimes Profiles Cali Cartel "Betrayer." In a lengthy story out of Miami, the Los Angeles Times (2/24) reported the "official end of the notorious Cali cocaine cartel came late last year here with little more commotion than the rap of a judge's gavel. The Colombian drug lords Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, 63, and Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela, 67, entered guilty pleas and were ushered off to federal prison for the next 30 years. … But behind the bloodless fall of the ruthless Orejuela brothers and collapse of their $7-billion-a-year empire lies a little-known story of daring and betrayal. Aiding U.S. drug agents unexpectedly and at great risk was a senior cartel official, the head of security and intelligence for the syndicate. … He used to be Jorge Salcedo."

"Guru Of Ganja" To Get Help Paying Legal Fees. In a widely reported story, the AP (2/26) reports comedian Tommy Chong "will help raise money to defend the self-proclaimed 'Guru of Ganja,' who is charged with growing hundreds of marijuana plants for a dispensary. Chong…will appear at a $125-per-person event for Ed Rosenthal." Rosenthal is "scheduled to appear in federal court March 19." Federal prosecutors "accused Rosenthal of growing marijuana, laundering money and falsifying tax returns from October 2001 through February 2002."

Hells Angels Racketeering Case Heads To Trial In Seattle. The Seattle Times (2/26, Bowermaster) reports, "Jury selection begins today in a massive federal racketeering case being brought against current and former members of the Washington Nomads chapter of the Hells Angels." The Times continues, "Prosecutors allege that the Nomads' president and three others engaged in a long list of crimes, from murder, kidnapping and witness tampering to extortion, robbery and interstate trafficking of stolen Harley Davidson motorcycles, according to a 19-count indictment filed in the case. … The government intends to call 125 to 150 witnesses and take 10 weeks to present its case in U.S. District Court in Seattle, according to a pre-trial brief filed last week." The Times adds, "It is the latest in a string of racketeering cases that the Justice Department has brought against motorcycle gangs around the country in recent years, including a sweeping case filed against 26 members of the Bandidos Motorcycle Club in U.S. District Court in Seattle in June 2005. … George Wegers, the national president of the Bandidos Motorcycle Club, last May pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit racketeering. Wegers received a 20-month prison sentence in October, which included credit for time served." The Times notes, "Last week, two Hells Angels motorcycle-club members were sentenced to 12 to 30 months in Nevada state prison for their roles in a bloody brawl in 2002 with rival biker-gang members at Harrah's Laughlin hotel-casino in southern Nevada that left two Hells Angels and a rival Mongol gang member dead. … The core charge in the upcoming Seattle trial, which is scheduled to begin next Monday, is that the Washington Nomads is a highly organized, criminal enterprise whose members are punishable under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO) Act, which was created to prosecute organized-crime syndicates such as the Mafia."

IMMIGRATION:

Fed Program Helps Illegal Immigrants Wire Money To Mexico. The Los Angeles Times (2/26, A1, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "Even as the federal government is starting to crack down on companies that hire illegal immigrants, it's been helping those same workers send money home, cheap. Dubbed Directo a Mexico, the Federal Reserve-sponsored service allows customers without Social Security numbers to wire money through the Fed system to Mexico's central bank at little cost." In September, the Fed "expanded the remittance program by allowing immigrants, legal or not, to open accounts at participating banks and credit unions in the U.S. or Mexico. About 27,000 transfers are made through the program each month." The program has "attracted the attention of conservative immigration activists and members of Congress, who say financial institutions shouldn't cater to illegal immigrants."

Mexican Wives Seek Return Of Husbands Working In US. The Washington Times (2/26, A1, Dinan, 88K) reports, "The women of Tecalpulco, Mexico, want the U.S. government to enforce its immigration laws because they want to force their husbands to come back home from working illegally in the United States. They have created an English-language Web page where they identify themselves as the 'wetback wives' and broadcast their pleas, both to their men and to the U.S. government. … In poignant public messages to their husbands, the women talk about their children who feel abandoned, and worry that the men have forsaken their families for other women and for the American lifestyle." According to the Times, " It's a stark reminder of an often forgotten voice in the U.S. immigration debate -- the wives, children, parents and villages left behind as millions of workers come to the U.S., many of them illegally. The plea also underscores the dual effects of migration on Mexico: Its economy needs American jobs as an outlet for workers, but determined, able-bodied workers get siphoned out of Mexico."

TAX:

California Dentist Sentenced For Tax Fraud. The AP (2/26) reports, "A Danville (CA) dentist convicted of hiding $300,000 from the IRS in a secret offshore bank account has been sentenced to two years in prison, the Justice Department said." The AP continues, "Roy Albert Lewis was sentenced Friday in U.S. District Court for income tax evasion and conspiracy to defraud the government after being found guilty in August. Judge Susan Illston also ordered Lewis to participate in a mental health treatment program and perform 100 hours of community service." The AP adds, "Lewis' medical practice paid bogus expenses over a 10-year period to Denver-based Tower Executive Resources for items such as franchise, consulting, or management fees to generate huge tax deductions, according to the Justice Department. … Tower then allegedly funneled the money into the secret account, which Lewis controlled, authorities said. … In April 2005, two Tower promoters were convicted of conspiracy and assisting in the preparation of fraudulent tax returns after a trial in Denver. … Lewis' father, Leroy Albert Lewis, 72, an oral surgeon from Danville, is still awaiting trial on fraud and tax-evasion charges, according to prosecutors."

IRS "Telephone Tax" Refunds To Cost $13 Billion. NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 8, 1:50, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Last year, the Federal Government finally stopped collecting this century old telephone tax. Now the IRS is giving some of the money back." NBC (Epperson) adds, "This is an opportunity for millions to get $30 to $60 back with this telephone tax refund. The problem is a lot of folks don't know about it and don't realize how easy it is to get this refund. All you have to do is fill out one line on the tax return to get the standard refund. If you think you're due more than $30 to $60, you'll need bills to substantiate it." Seigenthaler: "This one time refund is expected to cost the government some $13 billion."

Treasury Department Eases Tax Hike On Expatriate Workers. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A2, Wells, Herman, 2.04M) reports a new Treasury Department notice "affecting some Americans working abroad further chips away at a controversial tax increase enacted last May." Accountants say it is "too soon to gauge the precise impact on expatriates and employers, but business leaders say the move could provide significant relief in numerous cases." At issue are "details of the May law, which raised taxes on many Americans working abroad, retroactive to the start of 2006."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Members Still Taking Trips Paid For By Outside Interests. USA Today (2/26, 1A, Schouten, 2.27M) reports, "Lawmakers have continued to take trips paid for by outside groups since the House voted last month to restrict who can pay for such travel" House travel records "show that 19 members since Jan. 5 have accepted airfare, meals and lodging from special interests, including groups that employ lobbyists." Melanie Sloan, executive director "of the liberal-leaning watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington," said "the trips demonstrate that lawmakers 'are trying to see what they are going to get away with.'" Most of the travel "reported by House members would be exempt from the rules because it was paid for by groups that don't hire lobbyists." Five trips were "sponsored by organizations that lobby Congress and would face greater scrutiny by the House ethics committee."

USA Today (2/26, 5A, Schouten, 2.27M) reports that on one weekend in January, "a dozen House members gathered at a luxury Miami hotel to learn more about health care issues." They "assembled at the Mandarin Oriental, which boasts Biscayne Bay views and rooms starting at $469 a night. The trip, sponsored by the non-profit Alliance for Health Reform, is among the travel allowed under ethics rules that go into effect Thursday." Top Democrats "led by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi also agreed to exemptions that allow House members to continue taking trips to destinations such as Miami and San Juan, Puerto Rico."

House To Take Up Contentious Debate Over Union Organizing. The Los Angeles Times (2/26, Matthews, 850K) reports, "It has become the central question in union organizing fights across the country: Will the employer recognize a union after a majority of its workers sign union cards? Or will the employer insist that its workers cast secret ballots in federally supervised elections? These questions — of paper and power — move from the workplace to Congress this week, when the House is scheduled to cast the first vote in what could be a years-long legislative battle between the country's largest labor unions and most powerful business lobbies. The stakes: deciding the manner in which Americans join unions. The proposed Employee Free Choice Act would take from employers the right to decide whether to accept the signing of cards — generally called 'card check' — or demand an election. Instead, a workplace could unionize if labor persuaded a majority of employees to sign cards — without an election of all employees." The Times notes that "unions and their political allies, which for 70 years championed the secret ballot for unionizing workers, are all but abandoning the election process, arguing that aggressive anti-union tactics by businesses make such elections too difficult and costly. And business leaders, generally hostile to any government intervention in their companies, are preparing to spend millions to defend federal supervision of elections in which workers choose whether to unionize. … The House is expected to approve the legislation as soon as Thursday, but Senate prospects are less certain. Even if the bill passes Congress, President Bush has pledged to veto it."

House Committees Seeking Average 10.7% Funding Increase. Roll Call (2/26, Brotherton, McArdle) reports House committees are "proving to be a little more ambitious, at least financially, than their Senate counterparts, according to budget requests submitted to the chambers' respective administrative panels." With most committees "having turned in their requests, House panels are seeking an overall budget boost of 10.7 percent, nearly double the average Senate request of about 5 percent over funding provided during the 109th Congress." The Oversight and Government Reform Committee is "seeking an 11.6 percent increase, to $22.9 million from $20.5 million. Chairman Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) has made it clear in recent weeks he intends to increase the level of oversight done by the committee."

Roll Call (2/26, Davis) reports the House ethics committee "has requested a $6.1 million operating budget for the 110th Congress, nearly a 43 percent increase from the previous Congress. If approved by the House Administration Committee, which has jurisdiction over all House committee budgets, the investigative panel will have doubled its funding since the 108th Congress, when it had a $3 million budget."

Study Finds Congressional Web Sites Lacking. Roll Call (2/26, Brotherton) reports the Senate is "more Web savvy than the House, and Republicans are superior to Democrats when it comes to maintaining their Congressional sites — but, overall, the legislative branch is performing poorly, according to a report scheduled to be released today by the Congressional Management Foundation." The Foundation, "working with experts from Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government, the University of California at Riverside and Ohio State University," studied "615 Congressional Web sites from April to August 2006. Only 85 sites -- 14 percent -- received an 'A' compared with nearly 40 percent that received a 'D' or 'F' ranking." The results "show little improvement from 2003, the last time the foundation handed out similar awards."

Proposal To Define National Standards For NCLB Gains Momentum. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Green, 2.03M) reports that the 2002 No Child Left Behind Act "requires all states to draft standards…and to annually assess how well those standards are being met.

But critics of the law argue that all the tests that have followed have not clarified matters at all. Every state administers a different test tied to different standards, and few of the state standards seem to match national ideas about what kids should know. … With hearings on No Child Left Behind starting in March, two top Senate Democrats have introduced legislation that would require the federal government to define the standards against which all states would be measured. Groups from the conservative Thomas B. Fordham Institute to the National Education Association, a teachers union, support the idea."

NCLB Said To Lack Incentives For Establishing Charter Schools. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/26, A19, 2.04M), Nelson Smith, president of the National Alliance for Public Charter Schools, writes, "The NCLB has laid bare the troubling gaps in student achievement among racial and socioeconomic groups, and it has spurred some improvement, particularly in the early grades. Yet its prescriptions for reform have provoked meager change in schools and systems that produce chronically weak results. … The act's coup de grâce, after years of failure, is to require 'restructuring' a dysfunctional school from scratch, through state takeover, contracting-out, or re-opening as a public charter school. But its impact has been stifled by legislative language allowing 'any other' step as well. Districts and states have opted to switch principals, give pep talks and hire 'turnaround specialists' instead of coming to terms with intractable failure. Indeed, according to a recent analysis by SRI International for the U.S. Department of Education, only one of 12 states with Title I schools identified for restructuring as of 2004 had reopened a school as a public charter; one turned over operations to the state; two states replaced school staff and eight took no action. Ironically, the best illustration of the NCLB's mission may be outside this whole 'turnaround' apparatus, in the open sector of public education called charter schooling, where parents, teachers and entrepreneurs are creating new schools that are publicly accountable but independent of bureaucratic rules."

Analysis Finds Welfare State Expanding. The AP (2/25, Ohlemacher) reports the welfare state "is bigger than ever despite a decade of policies designed to wean poor people from public aid." The number of families "receiving cash benefits from welfare has plummeted since the government imposed time limits on the payments a decade ago. But other programs for the poor, including Medicaid, food stamps and disability benefits, are bursting with new enrollees." The result, "according to an Associated Press analysis: Nearly one in six people rely on some form of public assistance, a larger share than at any time since the government started measuring two decades ago."

Poll Suggests Bush Remains Overwhelmingly Popular Among Republicans. USA Today (2/26, 11A, 2.27M) columnist Richard Benedetto writes, "The Washington punditocracy has proclaimed far and wide that Republicans, disenchanted with the war in Iraq, are abandoning President Bush in droves, leaving him the lamest of lame ducks. However, the latest USA TODAY/Gallup Poll suggests Bush might not be as wounded as he appears — at least not among his party faithful. The Feb. 9-11 poll puts Bush's job approval at 37%, but among people who identify themselves as Republican or leaning Republican, his approval rating is 76%. Thus, despite bad news from Baghdad and carefully crafted hand-wringing by high-profile GOP war critics in Congress such as Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, three of four Republicans in the country are hanging in there with the president."

Army Chaplains In Short Supply. The Washington Times (2/26, Altamirano, 88K) reports, "The Army Chaplain Corps now has about 520 vacancies, its most severe shortage in history. ... Despite the three-year shortage, the Army and the Army Reserve has celebrated two consecutive years of record-breaking chaplain recruitment, closing the gap between authorized and assigned positions, Lt. Col. [Kevin] Beale said. ... He credits the recent recruiting successes to post-September 11 patriotism. To attract chaplains, the Army Reserve is offering $10,000 signing bonuses for first-time officers. The Army National Guard has similar incentives, such as student loan repayment and college scholarships." Army Chaplain Ran Dolinger "said it is more difficult to recruit chaplains into the reserves than into active duty. 'A lot of churches don't want their senior [chief executive officer] to be gone,' he said."

Univision Gets Record FEC Fine Over Children's Programming. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A5, Schatz, 2.04M) reports Federal regulators "appear to be turning more attention to a perennial concern: making sure television is safer for kids. " Last week, Spanish-language broadcaster Univision Communications Inc. "agreed in principle to pay an unusually steep $24 million fine for violating the Children's Television Act, which requires broadcasters to show three hours of educational programming a week, Federal Communications Commission officials said. In exchange, the FCC will approve Univision's sale to a consortium of private-equity groups for $12.3 billion." It is "the largest fine assessed by the FCC against a company."

Smithsonian Boss Under Fire For Extravagant Expenses. The CBS Evening News (2/25, story 3, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "A Smithsonian Institution audit is focusing attention this evening on the expenses of the museum group's top officer, Lawrence Small." CBS (Attkisson) added the Smithsonian Institution is "supported by donors and $700 billion tax dollars a year. Now an independent audit and inspector general's report obtained by CBS News raise questions as to whether" Small "is being allowed extravagances that are inappropriate for a public-supported charity. Questioned expenses and policies include the method by which Small has been paid up to $179,000 a year on top of his salary to live in the house he owns. Small's wife accompanied him on a business trip to China, but auditors said she was not authorized to expense $5,000 for a side trip to Cambodia with Smithsonian donors. And they flagged Small's $14,000 charter flight to Texas, saying a first class commercial ticket would have cost just $2,000. At the time Small reportedly claimed he paid for the charter himself. But the inspector general said that's inaccurate. The trip was paid for with Smithsonian funds. While Small is living in a material world could make some corporate CEO's green with envy, the charity is said to be strapped by a tight budget."

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Changing Assumption On Relationship Of Inflation, Unemployment. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A1, Ip, 2.04M) reports that for "decades, a simple rule has governed how the Federal Reserve views the nation's economy: When unemployment falls too low, inflation goes up, and vice versa." But Fed officials "have rethought that notion. They believe it takes a far bigger change in unemployment to affect inflation today than it did 25 years ago. Now, when inflation fluctuates, they are far more likely to blame temporary factors, such as changes in oil prices or rents, than a change in the jobless rate." One explanation "for why inflation is influenced less by changes in unemployment is that the American public has come to expect inflation to remain stable. When inflation moves up or down, it is less likely to get stuck at the new level because companies and workers don't factor the change into their expectations -- or their behavior. Another explanation is that the Fed is better at adjusting interest rates in anticipation of swings in unemployment before those swings can affect inflation."

Gasoline Prices Up 13 Cents In Two Weeks. The Houston Chronicle/AP (2/26) reports gasoline prices "soared nearly 13 cents a gallon on average nationwide in the past two weeks as the price of crude oil rose." The national average "for self-serve regular was $2.35 per gallon, up 12.8 cents since Feb. 9, industry analyst Trilby Lundberg said Sunday." Oil prices "reached a new high for the year Friday. Light, sweet crude for April delivery added 19 cents to settle on the New York Mercantile Exchange at $61.14, its highest closing price since Dec. 22."

NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 7, ;20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The latest Lundberg Survey finds gas prices have gone up nearly 13 cents a gallon in the past two weeks. And are expected to climb further as a result of disruptions over oil refineries. On average, self-service gasoline now costs 2.35 for regular."

Retired Federal Judge Sporkin Hangs Out Shingle. The Washington Post (2/26, D1, Johnson) reports, "For the first time in a legal career that spans nearly half a century, Stanley Sporkin is striking out on his own." The Post continues, "In the 1960s and '70s, Sporkin was one of the first enforcement watchdogs at the Securities and Exchange Commission. Next he became the top lawyer at the CIA. President Ronald Reagan several years later named him to a high-profile federal judgeship in the District." The Post adds, "Until his retirement in 2000, Sporkin cultivated a reputation for being an outspoken, results-oriented judge. From the bench he famously threw out an early antitrust settlement that the Justice Department struck with Microsoft and rejected on procedural grounds the Senate's bid to impeach U.S. District Judge Alcee L. Hastings (currently a member of the House of Representatives). … Now, at 75, Sporkin is trying something new." The Post notes, "He's hung out his own shingle as a lawyer and consultant, signing on as a part-time ombudsman for troubled petroleum giant BP and filling out his time by working as an arbitrator and mediator at Gavel Consulting Group. He says his favorite part of the job involves advising companies on how to keep in line with securities laws. … Sporkin continues to work out of the I Street NW office of Weil, Gotshal & Manges, the law firm where he was a partner before resigning last year because of client conflicts with his BP assignment."

Governors Seek More Funding For Children's Health Insurance. The Washington Post/AP (2/26, A5, Tanner) reports governors "from both parties appealed yesterday for the Bush administration and Congress to provide more money for a health-care program that insures millions of children." The issue concerns "coverage for 6 million people, overwhelmingly children, as well as the hopes of many governors in tackling the challenge of uninsured working families." The governors "want two things: enough money -- estimated at $745 million -- to keep the program float through October, and changes to President Bush's budget. Analysts say the president's spending plan would shortchange the program even if the number of people served does not grow."

USA Today Says Health Care Reform Gaining Traction. USA Today (2/26, 10A, 2.27M) says in an editorial that since President and Hillary Clinton's healthcare plan failed to pass Congress in the 1990s, "health-care reform has been considered too costly, in dollars and political capital, for most politicians to touch. But the beleaguered system's problems — one in seven people without insurance, rising premiums and lower reimbursements for those who have insurance, endless payment hassles — haven't gone away. Attempts at fixing them have been incremental and timid at best." That "could be about to change. Several groups that usually are at odds on health care now agree on the need for broad reform. These strange bedfellows are still a long way from agreeing on a plan, but the fact that they now see a common need signals a shift in the political dynamic." The "important point is that for the first time since the early 1990s, the stars appear to be aligning for a major effort to reshape health care in America. It's about time."

"Money Primary" Already Winnowing Presidential Field. Two national newspapers run features on the "money primary" in the 2008 presidential race. USA Today (2/26, 5A, Lawrence, 2.27M) says a "daunting mix of celebrity candidates, rich candidates and early nomination contests is prompting long-shot presidential hopefuls to give up months and even years" before the election, and since this time, "measured by polls, name recognition and money, each party has three front-runners," it will be hard for others to emerge. Political scientist Dante Scala said, "It's tough to be fourth or fifth. If Hillary falters, Obama's there. If Obama falters, Edwards is there. That's a lot to overcome." Both USA Today and the Christian Science Monitor (2/26, Feldmann, 59K) note Tom Vilsack's blunt statement that money was the only reason why he quit the race. The Monitor says "the money that donors are willing to shell out to candidates represents an important signal of a candidate's viability. Even if much of the public is not fully engaged in the intense nomination races under way in both parties, wealthy donors are. And they're voting with their checkbooks."

Early GOP Leader, But Not Early Democrat, Tends To Win Nomination. The AP (2/25, Lester) writes that while Sen. Hillary Clinton "is the clear favorite in early polls" for the Democratic nomination, that might not mean much. Republican Rudy Giuliani, "however, is sitting pretty. For at least three decades, Republicans have been far better than Democrats in early polls at getting behind the candidates who end up winning the party's presidential nomination."

Krugman Says "Early Signs Aren't Encouraging" That Campaign Will Be About Substance. In his New York Times (2/26, 1.16M) column, Paul Krugman writes, "Six years ago a man unsuited both by intellect and by temperament for high office somehow ended up running the country. How did that happen? First, he got the Republican nomination by locking up the big money early. Then, he got within chad-and-butterfly range of the White House because the public, enthusiastically encouraged by many in the news media, treated the presidential election like a high school popularity contest. The successful candidate received kid-gloves treatment -- and a free pass on the fuzzy math of his policy proposals -- because he seemed like a fun guy to hang out with, while the unsuccessful candidate was subjected to sniggering mockery over his clothing and his mannerisms. Today, with thousands of Americans and tens of thousands of Iraqis dead thanks to presidential folly, with Al Qaeda resurgent and Afghanistan on the brink, you'd think we would have learned a lesson. But the early signs aren't encouraging. … Enough already. Let's make this election about the issues."

Most Governors Holding Off On Endorsing Presidential Candidates. The New York Times (2/26, Pear, 1.16M) writes Sen. Hillary Clinton "is the front-runner and will probably win the Democratic presidential nomination." Rudy Giuliani "could do well in Mississippi. And the length of the presidential campaign is insane. Those were the views expressed Sunday by some of the foremost experts on American politics: governors gathered here for the winter meeting of the National Governors Association. A few governors have endorsed presidential candidates, but many said they were reserving judgment." Democratic governors "pleaded with their presidential candidates to ignore the fringes of the party and focus instead on the 'middle 20 percent' of the electorate with a pragmatic, problem-solving agenda." Gov. Phil Bredesen said, "Democrats certainly could not win in Tennessee with just a hard-nosed Nancy Pelosi-style Democratic agenda." But Gov. Haley Barbour "toasted the political prowess of Mrs. Clinton," saying, "She will be a formidable opponent if she is the Democratic nominee. And I think she probably will be." Barbour said "on the Republican side, 'we don't have a front-runner.' … As a result, he said, 'an unusually large number of governors are keeping their powder dry.'"

Perry, Rendell Say They Are Not Interested In Vice Presidency. The AP (2/25, Zuckerbrod) reports Govs. Rick Perry and Ed Rendell both said they are not interested in their parties' vice presidential nominations. Texas Republican Perry said, "I got the best job in the world. Ask President Bush," while Pennsylvania Democrat Rendell said, "I like to be my own boss."

Geffen Comments Introduce Bill Clinton's Indiscretions As Campaign Issue. Newsweek (3/5, Thomas, 3.12M) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign "can ill afford another scandal swirling around her husband. … They doubtless anticipate an assault from Clinton's old foes, but they may have been caught unawares by the attack from one of Bill's old friends" – David Geffen. In an interview with New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd, Hollywood mogul…Geffen tore into the Clintons' integrity and Hillary's electability. … The reaction to Geffen's remarks from the Clinton campaign was immediate and outraged." According to Newsweek, "the Clintonites were serving notice -- not for the first time -- that anyone who brings up Bill and Hillary's past marital problems will be branded a character assassin. … Dowd tells NEWSWEEK that Geffen did not seem out to get the Clintons." Dowd "says she was the one who brought up questions about Bill Clinton's past as a campaign issue. Geffen acknowledged that some big donors and celebrity Clinton supporters were fretting, as Dowd put it, 'that Bill will 'pull the focus' and shelve his wife's campaign.'"

Nevada Caucus Shakes Up Democrats' Campaigns. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Lo Scalzo, 2.03M) reports, "The state of Nevada displayed its newfound political muscle last week, with the appearance of eight Democratic presidential hopefuls (Sen. Barack Obama was the sole exception) at a forum in Carson City. With Nevada's caucus scheduled-for now, anyway-just after the Iowa caucus and just ahead of the New Hampshire primary, this quirky state seems poised to be a crucial Democratic battlefield for the '08 elections. …Citing the state's ethnic diversity (nearly a quarter of Nevada's residents are Hispanic), concentration of organized labor (about 14 percent of the workforce), and economic growth (consistently one of the nation's strongest performers), Democratic leaders believe the state offers an alternative to Iowa and New Hampshire's mostly white, rural populations." US News notes that "aside from Nevada's potential political value, it's an unusual locale to say the least, featuring legal gambling and prostitution, a booming big city and desolate hinterlands."

Clyburn Assumes Role As South Carolina Powerbroker. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Brush, 2.03M) reports Rep. Jim Clyburn "is at the center of the Democrats' most pressing concerns on Capitol Hill. As the majority whip, the No. 3 Democratic position in the House of Representatives, he's in charge of keeping the party together on votes and reaching out to the Democrats' famously broad set of interest groups. And for presidential candidates, his endorsement could swing the South Carolina primary. For the next year or two, Jim Clyburn is going to be a very popular-and powerful-man."

Democrats Work To Attract Religious Voters. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports, "One of…Clinton's first campaign hires was a top evangelical staffer on Capitol Hill. U.S. News has learned that an aide in…Obama's office tasked with religious outreach is joining his presidential campaign this week. And former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards is framing poverty relief as a moral issue that's helping to drive his campaign."

Gore Candidacy Rumors Fueled By His Personal Wealth. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Bedard, 2.03M) "Washington Whispers" reports, "If you're wondering why, despite his denials, Al Gore remains the most talked about nonpresidential candidate, it's this: His friends think he's done so well in the private world that he could bankroll the start of his own 2008 bid. 'If Al Gore wants to run, he will come with all the means necessary,' says longtime ally Donna Brazile. 'Al Gore is someone who can pull it off at half time,' she said. But he's got competing interests for his wallet: Friends say he also wants to expand his global climate change campaign."

Clinton's Stance On 2002 Iraq Vote Defended. Newsweek (3/5, Alter, 3.12M) writes, "Hillary Clinton is right to resist efforts to make her cry uncle and apologize for her 2002 vote in favor of the Iraq-war resolution; that would look weak. Her mistake was in not anticipating this problem with the liberal base of her party last summer and cauterizing the wound in advance, before it festered. Instead, she offered lame rationalizations. She should have taken a leaf from John McCain and her husband, each skilled in the subtle politics of contrition. This skill will be essential to the success of the next president."

Democrats Worry Clinton-Obama Fight Will Hurt Party's Chances. Under the headline "Hillary-Obama Feud Imperils Party For '08," the Washington Times (2/26, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Democratic strategists say the bitter fight between Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama could undermine their party's bid to win back the White House if it continues." Democratic media adviser Bud Jackson said, "I think the Democrats in general, particularly party activists and leaders, do not want to see a knife fight between these two which results in blood all over the Democrats. We want a strong nominee coming out of this primary process, not one that is beaten and bloodied." Jackson's view "summed up what many Democrats were thinking last week." Pollster John Zogby said, "The opening kickoff has been made. Clinton's the kicker and Obama's the receiver, who kicked back. What's clear is that it's going to be nasty from here on, which doesn't help the Democrats. At this stage, anything that threatens party unity or alienates Democrats or annoys swing voters can hurt."

Edwards Calls Frontrunners' Spat "A Bunch Of Silliness." The AP (2/25, Zuckerbrod) reports Sen. John Edwards said on CBS' Face The Nation that the spat between Clinton and Obama over comments by Hollywood mogul David Geffer is "a bunch of silliness." Edwards "said the topic was not on the minds of voters during a stop Saturday in New Hampshire. 'I met probably over a thousand New Hampshire primary voters in the course of having a bunch of house parties. And you'd be shocked to hear the only people who asked me about this were reporters.'"

Clinton Leads Obama By 11 Points In California Primary Poll. A Datamar poll of 865 likely California Democratic primary voters conducted February 9-13 (+/- 3.3%), finds Clinton at 34.3%, Obama 23.6%, Edwards 16.2%, Gov. Bill Richardson 7.2%, Rep. Dennis Kucinich 4.2%, Sen. Joseph Biden 3.9%, Sen. Christopher Dodd 0.8%, Mike Gravel 0.3%, and Tom Vilsack 0.2%, with 9.2% undecided.

South Carolina Momentum Said To Be With Clinton, Obama. South Carolina political reporter Lee Bandy writes at The Politico (2/26) that Clinton and Obama "drew huge crowds on recent campaign swings through South Carolina. Together, they made a statement: The Democratic Party is back." A "sizable number of South Carolinians have been showing up at the rallies of Democratic candidates, catching party establishment types off guard. But it is foolhardy for candidates and their followers to suggest victory is in the air." Many in attendance "at the candidate rallies are curiosity seekers," who are "a long ways off from picking a horse to ride." But right now, "the momentum is with Obama and Clinton."

Geffen's "Precision Ruthlessness" Seen As Danger To Process. In a New York Times (2/26, 1.16M) media column headlined "Someone Give Geffen a Day Job," David Carr writes, "There is a danger that if the coming election" becomes Geffen's "full-time hobby, his precision ruthlessness will distort the public process. After all, this is not a movie sale, a busted deal or a Don Henley album; this is about the duly elected leader of the United States. … But if kings are to be made or undone, you can bet that Mr. Geffen is standing at the ready."

Herbert Calls Clintons "Connivers." In his New York Times (2/26, 1.16M) column, Bob Herbert writes, "If Bill and Hillary Clinton were the stars of a reality TV show, it would be a weekly series called 'The Connivers.' The Clintons, the most powerful of power couples, are always scheming at something, and they're good at it. Their latest project is to contrive ways to knock Barack Obama off his white horse and muddy him up a little. A lot, actually. Most of the analyses after last week's dust-up…have focused on whether the Clintons succeeded in tarnishing the junior senator from Illinois. What I found interesting was that no one questioned whether the Clintons would be willing to get down in the muck and start flinging it around. That was a given."

Clinton Woos Black Voters In New York. Newsday (2/26, Epstein) reports, "It wasn't officially a campaign event, and she didn't mention the presidency," but Sen. Hillary Clinton spent Sunday "working to position herself as the candidate for African-Americans." Clinton "presided over an African-American heritage celebration hosted by District Council 37, New York City's largest public employee union." At the event, "Clinton spoke mostly about local issues not likely to earn her attention in early presidential battleground states like Iowa and New Hampshire."

Rice Says Support For Obama Shows US Has Made Strides On Race. The AP (2/25) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "finds Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama appealing and says it won't be much longer before race isn't a barrier to becoming president." On Fox News Sunday, Rice said, "I do think we've come a long way in overcoming stereotypes, role stereotypes about African-Americans. I will say race is still a factor. … But it's less and less of a barrier to believing that that person can be your doctor or your lawyer or a professor in your university or the CEO of a company. And it will not be long, I think, before it's no longer a barrier to being president of the United States."

Rothenberg Says Race Unlikely To Doom Obama's Chances. In his Roll Call (2/26) column, Stuart Rothenberg writes, "Many of us who write about politics -- and as a group we are overwhelmingly white -- have concluded" that Mitt Romney's Mormon religion "is a greater impediment to his presidential hopes" than is Sen. Hillary Clinton's gender or Obama's race. "But some in the black community remain deeply skeptical about Obama's electability. Their view is simple: Whether those being surveyed about their willingness to vote for an African-American are deceiving themselves or intentionally misleading pollsters, a lot of white voters won't vote for a black nominee." Rothenberg says he remains "convinced that Obama's race is not an insurmountable problem for him," because the "question…is whether Obama can carry enough white voters in enough Democratic or politically competitive states to win 270 electoral votes," and in many of those states, prominent blacks have been elected.

Obama Hardens Antiwar Stance In Presidential Bid. The New York Times (2/26, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports Obama "is running for president as one of the few candidates who opposed the Iraq war from the beginning, a simple position unburdened by expressions of regret or decisions over whether to apologize for initially supporting the invasion." But while Obama "is framing his candidacy to appeal to Democrats who have long opposed the war, until recently he was not among his party's most outspoken voices against it. He campaigned strongly against the war in his bid for the Senate in 2004, but when he arrived in Washington he waited 11 months to deliver a major speech on Iraq. And only after Mr. Obama opened a presidential exploratory committee did he introduce legislation to withdraw American combat brigades from Iraq by March 31, 2008." The four Democratic presidential hopefuls who were in the Senate at the time of the 2002 vote all "voted to authorize the invasion." But Obama "was not always so critical" of their votes. In interviews "before the Democratic National Convention in 2004, where his national political ascent began, he said he did not place blame on Democrats who had voted to authorize the war."

Obama Speaks To 3,000 At Rally In Kentucky. The AP (2/25) reports Obama "spoke Sunday night to a crowd of at least 3,000 supporters who waited nearly two hours for him to arrive for his first campaign stop in Kentucky. Obama apologized for the delay, saying snow in Chicago kept him from arriving sooner. … 'There was no way I was not going to make 3,000 people coming out,' he said to audience members who paid $25 a ticket for the event."

Obama Effort To Quit Smoking Cited. In a Los Angeles Times (2/26, 850K) op-ed, Harvard professor of medical history uses Obama's effort to quit smoking to examine the cigarette industry's supposed efforts to help smokers give up the habit, saying that "if Obama quits, no doubt Philip Morris will be the first to congratulate him. After all, won't that prove that anyone can stop anytime he wants to? If only that were true."

Conservative Leaders Look Beyond Three 2008 Frontrunners. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports, "Whether McCain and the other leaders of the GOP presidential pack -- Giuliani and Romney -- can make enough converts among the Republican Party's base of religious conservatives may determine whether any of them can win the presidential nomination. Because of their political records and personal lives, all three have raised abundant doubts within the Christian right. … McCain and Romney-and, to a lesser extent, Giuliani-have launched Christian conservative outreach plans. But some powerful Christian right activists are skeptical. And others are determined to stop the front-runners in their tracks." According to US news, "Some heavyweights within the Council for National Policy and other conservative coalitions are weighing an effort to galvanize behind a socially conservative second-tier candidate, such as" former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee or Sen. Sam Brownback.

New Book Explores Bush-Cheney Campaign's Evangelical Outreach Effort. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, 2.03M) reports that in his new book "The Jesus Machine: How James Dobson, Focus on the Family, and Evangelical America Are Winning the Culture War," U.S. News Senior Editor Dan Gilgoff "details how George W. Bush's evangelical outreach machine, and John Kerry's failure to connect with evangelicals and other religious voters, may have determined the outcome."

Vilsack Exit Raises Iowa Pressure On Edwards. The Des Moines Register (2/26, Beaumont, 160K) writes that "if any candidate inherits something from Tom Vilsack's departure from the Democratic presidential campaign, it's John Edwards. What he gets: Pressure." Vilsack's decision to exit the race "shifts much of the burden of expectations in the caucuses to Edwards, the front-runner in early Iowa polls." While Edwards' "popularity among Iowa party activists has endured since his strong second-place finish in the 2004 caucuses" and his run for vice president, he is "not entirely the same Edwards that Iowans remember from his 2004 campaign. He has moved noticeably to the left since then" on issues like Iraq and health care. Edwards "rejected the idea that Vilsack's withdrawal puts particular pressure on him to win in Iowa." He said, "It raises expectations for everyone. … Other candidates might have used it as an excuse for not doing well. That excuse is now gone."

Gore Documentary Wins Academy Award. The AP (2/26, Gentile) reports, "'An Inconvenient Truth,' the documentary that turned former vice president Al Gore's power-point presentation on global warming into an engaging and entertaining film, won the Oscar Sunday night. The best-documentary win was a triumph for Gore."

Gore Seen As Potential Alternative Candidate For Democrats. In the New Yorker (3/5), David Remnick says, "Despite the burden of injury and injustice," Gore, "more than any other major Democratic Party figure, including the many candidates assembled for next year's Presidential nomination, has demonstrated in opposition precisely the quality of judgment that Bush has lacked in office." In the "view of former aides still close to him, Gore can't lose by staying on the electoral sidelines. While Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama start competing -- warily at first, and then, inevitably, taking direct aim at one another's weaknesses -- Gore can stand unbruised, nursing the lingering glamour of his popular margin in 2000."

Warner To Endorse McCain For President, Despite Iraq Differences. Roll Call (2/26, Whittington) reports Sen. John McCain, who has been among the staunchest supporters of President Bush's effort to increase troop levels in Iraq, is set to receive the endorsement of one of the most prominent critics of the 'surge' plan." Sen. John Warner "will announce his support of McCain's 2008 presidential bid today, lending the name of one of the chamber's most respected old bulls to the Republican frontrunner's developing Capitol Hill support." Warner "cited his long personal history with McCain -- as well as the importance of national security issues in the 2008 campaign -- as the chief factors that led to his endorsement." Warner said, "To me, voters are going to seek out that candidate, be it Republican or Democrat, that's got the proven credentials on issues that concern security abroad and here at home."

Romney Health Care Plan Said To Be In Trouble In Massachusetts. In a Wall Street Journal (2/26, A19, 2.04M) op-ed, Sally Pipes, president and CEO of the Pacific Research Institute says that when "then-Gov. Mitt

Romney, a Republican, introduced a universal health-insurance plan in the Bay State early last year, it was widely acclaimed. But less than a year after passage, RomneyCare is in the intensive care unit, soon to be wheeled into hospice." Reality "fully hit in late January of this year, when private insurers submitted bids to the bureaucracy that would administer the new program. The average premium for the unsubsidized plans was not $200 per month -- as Mr. Romney promised from the stump -- but rather $380. That's more than 15% of the target audiences' income -- and for a plan with a $2,000 deductible and a total cost sharing of $5,000. People were stunned, outraged. Naturally, 'greedy' private insurers were blamed. Politicians called for price controls." Pipes adds, "There's a slim chance that the new Democratic governor Deval Patrick and the Democratic legislature will implement this plan and enforce the mandate. But if they do, an individual with a $30,000 income would be on the hook for 32% of his or her income before being fully covered by insurance. Yet there is an equally small chance that the politicians will deregulate the state's insurance market."

Paul Campaigns In New Hampshire. The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/26, Kepple) reports Rep. Ron Paul "brought his anti-war and limited government message to a gathering of largely like-minded activists" in Concord, New Hampshire, Sunday, "and condemned the Republican establishment for forsaking principles it claims to uphold. Paul, who ran as the Libertarian Party's presidential candidate in 1988, is now exploring a run for the Republican Party's presidential nomination. Should he decide to enter the race, he would prove a long shot at best, and run at a considerable disadvantage in terms of fundraising."

Hagel "Flirting With Running For President." USA Today (2/26, 8A, Kiely, 2.27M) reports Sen. Chuck Hagel "seems to be paying no great political price for his apostasy" in his home state of Nebraska. While there "have been some angry letters to the editor of the Omaha World-Herald, no Republican has emerged to challenge Hagel next year, when he will be up for election to a third term." Hagel "has not only emerged as a leading critic of the administration's foreign policy, he's also flirting with running for president next year -- possibly on a hybrid ticket that would include a Democrat."

New Blog Tracks Candidates' Web Presence. Newsweek (3/5, Briscoe, 3.12M) reports Sen. Barack Obama "can take comfort in at least one tally: MySpace, apparently, is Obama country. About 48,000 members of the wildly popular social-networking site have added Obama to their online profiles as a 'friend,' while only 25,000 have 'friended' Clinton. It may seem a trivial statistic. But to the political junkies who run techPresident.com, a new 'group blog' that obsessively follows how the presidential campaign is playing on the Internet, no Web trend is too small to track. Micah Sifry, the site's cofounder and editor, says he's trying to make sense of 'how candidates are using the Web and how the Web is using them.' … TechPresident's stable of bloggers includes Zephyr Teachout, the Internet director of Dean's 2004 campaign, and Mike Turk, the e-campaign director for Bush-Cheney 2004."

Candidates Urged To Articulate Concrete Policies. U.S. News and World Report (3/5, Barone, 2.03M) writes, "so far, candidates have told us very little about where they think the world is headed and what we should do about it. And they've shown us little to indicate that they've thought seriously about governance and long-term problems like Social Security and Medicare. Let's hope they do better as they make their way through Iowa's 99 counties and New Hampshire's 234 cities and towns."

Cole's Strategy For 2008 To Balance Local Issues, National Picture. Roll Call (2/26, Duran, Drucker) reports National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Cole (Okla.) "believes a strategy combining the 'all races are local' mantra of his predecessor with the nationalized campaign Democrats employed is the way to undo the drubbing the GOP took at the polls this past year." Cole said that for this cycle, "the NRCC will spread the wealth among consultants and pollsters, giving political professionals inside and outside the Beltway a crack at consulting contracts." Cole "did not disavow the localized approach to House races preferred by former NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), but said his 2008 plan will include key elements of a nationalized campaign." Cole said, "The 'you have a national campaign or a local campaign' is a false dichotomy. There's no question that good campaigns address both things. I tell our members: 'Know your locality, but also you are going to have to address the big national issues.'"

Perdue Sets Date For GA10 Special Election. Roll Call (2/26, Whittington) reports Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) "has asked that June 19 be the date for a special election to fill the 10th district seat of Rep. Charlie Norwood (R), who died Feb. 13." State Sens. Ralph Hudgens (R) and Jim Whitehead (R) "have emerged as the early frontrunners in the race for the Augusta-based seat, which leans heavily toward Republicans." Both men "will have to relinquish their state legislative seats once they qualify to run in the special election under Georgia law."

steps to challenge Rep. Wayne Gilchrest in the 2008 Republican primary, though he said Friday that he has not completely decided whether to make the race." Harris said he "has thought about challenging the Congressman for several months and was leaning against it until two weeks ago, when Gilchrest joined 16 other House Republicans in voting for a resolution that criticized President Bush's proposal to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq." Harris said, "That has changed the calculus a little bit." Roll Call adds Gilchrest "easily turned back conservative challengers in 2002 and 2004, but Harris, the sole physician in the state Senate, could be more formidable because he is no stranger to tough races."

Farrakhan Delivers "Final" Major Speech. The CBS Evening News (2/25, story 5, :20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Ailing Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan today gave a speech that was billed as his final major speech. He called for unity between Christians and Muslims in Detroit where the nation of Islam was founded back in 1930. The 73-year-old Farrakhan has had prostate cancer and recently had abdominal surgery."

The AP (2/25, Karoub) reports Farrakhan "was greeted by cheers, tears and chants from tens of thousands as he returned to the public eye just long enough to say he would be leaving it soon." Farrakhan, who "ceded leadership duties last year because of illness, spoke for nearly two hours Sunday."

NYTimes Calls On States To Require HPV Vaccine. The New York Times (2/26, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "Debate over a new vaccine to prevent cervical cancer and genital warts has reached a high pitch. State legislatures are debating whether to mandate the vaccine or insist that its use be kept voluntary. The manufacturer stopped a vigorous lobbying campaign lest it provoke more opposition than support. And some health professionals who had been championing the vaccine flinched at making it mandatory, at least for now. Even so, state legislatures should require that all young girls be given this vaccine, which protects against a virus that causes some 10,000 new cases of cervical cancer in the United States each year — and 3,700 cancer deaths."

Bush To Warn Musharraf To Crackdown On Terror Groups. On its front page, the New York Times (2/26, A1, Sanger, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports President Bush "has decided to send an unusually tough message" to Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, "warning him that the newly Democratic Congress could cut aid to his country unless his forces become far more aggressive in hunting down operatives with Al Qaeda, senior administration officials say." The decision came "after the White House concluded that General Musharraf is failing to live up to commitments." On senior administration official said Musharraf has "made a number of assurances over the past few months, but the bottom line is that what they are doing now is not working. The message we're sending to him now is that the only thing that matters is results." For now, officials say, the White House "has ruled out unilateral strikes against the training camps that American spy satellites are monitoring in North Waziristan," fearing "that such strikes would result in what one administration official referred to as a 'shock to the stability' of General Musharraf's government."

The AP (2/25, Hunt) reports the move comes "amid growing concern in Congress and the Administration that terrorist forces are regrouping in the border area and preparing for a spring offensive in Afghanistan." In an interview Sunday with ABC's "This Week," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "I don't doubt that al-Qaeda has tried to regenerate some of its leadership. … But we have to be vigilant, and that's why we are working with the Pakistanis, we are working with the Afghans." Asked about Musharraf's efforts, Rice said, "I'm certainly aware that there are political issues in Pakistan. To not say that would be not to face reality."

Rice Condemns Iran's Vow To Continue Nuclear Program. NBC Nightly News (2/25, story 5, 0:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "To Iran now where it's ever defiant leader is going forward with his nuclear enrichment program. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad compared the program to a train without a reverse gear or brakes. In response, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice recommitted her offer to personally meet with Iranian officials, but only if they stop nuclear enrichment and reprocessing. This week the United Nations Security Council will meet to consider new sanctions against Iran."

The Washington Post/AP (2/26, A11, Karimi) reports Ahmadinejad announcement prompted Secretary Rice to respond that Iran needs "a stop button." In an appearance on "Fox News Sunday," the Secretary said, "They don't need a reverse gear. They need a stop button" so "we can sit down and talk about whatever is on Iran's mind." Rice said it "should be a clear signal" that "I've said that I am prepared to meet my counterpart or an Iranian representative at any time if Iran will suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities." USA Today (2/26, 8A, 2.27M) and the Los Angeles Times/AP also note briefly the Secretary's comments on talks with Iran.

In a separate interview with ABC's "This Week," AFP (2/26, Milliken) reports Rice said sanctions imposed on Tehran were beginning to fuel dissatisfaction among Iranians with Ahmadinejad. "If you just read the press you see the criticism of President Ahmadinejad by people inside Iran, knowledgeable and authoritative people in Iran, that (his) policies are isolating Iran," she told ABC. Meanwhile, the New Yorker (3/5, Hirsh) says "US covert actions against Iran had increased under a major recent shift in US Middle East strategy, with the unintended result of exacerbating regional Sunni-Shiite sectarian tensions and bolstering Sunni radicals hostile to the United States." Reporter Seymour Hersh wrote in the magazine that the strategy, guided by Vice President Dick Cheney and reliant on Saudi Arabia's national security advisor Prince Bandar bin Sultan, "had complicated the war in Iraq, where the rise to power of Shiites over the previously dominant Sunnis has empowered Iran."

The Financial Times (2/26, Dombey) says the "extent to which Iran has mastered such technology remains one of the most important questions in the controversy over the nuclear program, together with other factors such as Tehran's true intentions and the difficulty of forging a common front on the issue among big powers."

As US Pressure On Tehran Mounts, Religious Divide In Gulf Widens. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A1, Higgins, 2.04M) reports in a front page article that "at a time of rising tension between Washington and Tehran," America's "geopolitical standoff with Iran is paralleled by much older animosities between the Muslim world's two great traditions, Sunni and Shiite." In a "dangerous dynamic, legitimate concerns about Tehran's intentions are being overlain with phobias and political calculation as Arab governments, rabble-rousing politicians and clerics fan sectarian fears." Some experts on the region warn that America's "standoff with Iran is exacerbating Sunni-Shiite rivalry and pushing the US into some unruly company. Indeed, America now unintentionally finds itself on the same page as Sunni firebrands who loathe America but sometimes hate Shiites even more."

Iran Launches First Rocket Into Space. The New York Times (2/26, A12, Fathi, 1.16M) reports Iran announced Sunday that it had launched "a research rocket that attained a suborbital altitude, a test that appeared to move it closer toward its aim of putting its own satellites into space." A test rocket "capable of reaching greater altitudes would have had significant meaning not only for Iran's effort to put satellites into orbit, but also for developing a transcontinental ballistic missile, making it a topic of keen interest to other countries."

Harman Claims Bush Needs Congressional Approval For Strike Against Iran. Rep. Jane Harman, on CNN's Late Edition (2/25, Blitzer), said, "I think if we are ever to initiate military action in Iran, Congress needs to approve it. I support legislation that would make that crystal clear. … And I think we have a real shot here of changing the policy in Iran in a way that would be very constructive and much more effective than this notion of initiating military action where we don't have a day after scenario that makes any sense whatsoever."

Rep. Duncan Hunter, also on CNN's Late Edition (2/25, Blitzer), said that "with respect to Iran, our number one role here, our number one goal is, we must stand firm. We must protect Israel. And right now, this is a military challenge that we have. One, to protect against the developing missile capability of Iran. Number two, to watch very closely this emergence of an incipient nuclear capability. And this could well…at some point, require American military forces in Iran. We should never take that card off the table."

Cheney Arrives In Oman For Talks. The AP (2/25, Krane) reports Vice President Cheney arrived in Oman Sunday for talks the nation's foreign minister on "regional security issues, including the US standoff with Iran," an Omani government official said. The AP notes that Oman allows the US to use its air bases "for refueling, logistics and storage of pre-positioned military supplies," however "little has been revealed publicly about US military ties with the reclusive country." While Oman's cooperation with the US military "appears to have dwindled over the past few years," renewed US access to its bases would give "a huge boost to any American action on Iran."

Hezbollah Strengthening Positions Along Peacekeeping Zone. The Christian Science Monitor (2/26, Blanford, 59K) reports Hezbollah militants have relocated along the northern border of the zone UN peacekeeping forces and Lebanese troops have been policing since last summer "to build a new line of defense." Hezbollah's "strengthening presence…coincides with a series of land purchases here by a Shiite businessman with ties to the militant group and, critics say, with funds from Tehran." While analysts say the military buildup "does not necessarily signal any intention by the Iranian-supported militants to launch a fresh round of fighting," they say it is "a troubling sign that Hezbollah is rearming just out of sight of the United Nations."

Israeli Troops Launch Operation In West Bank City. The New York Times (2/26, A6, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports the Israeli Army put the West Bank city of Nablus "under curfew on Sunday in one of the biggest military operations there in two years." Israeli forces "discovered an explosives laboratory in Nablus, the second one found in two days," containing "a hand-held Lau guided missile and launcher that apparently had belonged to the Israeli Army." However, it was not immediately clear whether the missile had been stolen or purchased.

USA Today (2/26, 8A, 2.27M) reports an Israeli military official said the operation "was crucial to stop militant attacks against Israel."

850K) reports on Israeli settlers evacuated from the Gaza Strip in 2005 who today are "straining to meet daily expenses." Many of the evacuees "are older than 50 and unskilled for available jobs." The evacuees' predicament is seen as "a measure of the decline in political power of Israel's settler movement" and as "an indication of the difficulties Israel may encounter in any evacuation of the much larger number of settlements in the West Bank, considered an inevitable part of any final peace accord with the Palestinians."

Israeli Supreme Court To Rule On Status Of Border Crossing. The Christian Science Monitor (2/26, Mitnick, 59K) reports the Karni crossing at the Israel-Gaza border has become "the focus of a dispute in Israel's Supreme Court between human rights groups and the government" over Israel's "invisible hand" in Gaza by regulating commercial goods coming or leaving the territory. The dispute "underscores the tradeoff between Israeli security needs and the Palestinian need for the passage of people and commercial goods."

Rice, Lavrov Seek To Down Play Tensions. The AP (2/25, Butler) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "Sunday tried to play down concerns about a Cold War revival set off by Russian President Vladimir Putin's claim that Washington is fostering a global arms race." But they "could not put aside disagreements about a proposed US missile defense system in Europe." Lavrov wrote in Sunday's Washington Post that Putin's recent remarks "have been widely misinterpreted," while Rice "also denied the rhetoric could push the countries back to Cold War-era relations." In an interview with "Fox News Sunday," Rice said it is "a ludicrous claim" by Russia to "suggest that somehow 10 interceptors deployed in Poland are going to threaten the thousands of warheads in the Russian deterrent."

Missile Shield Gaining Support Among European Nations. The Christian Science Monitor (2/25, White, 59K) reports the US missile-defense program is "gaining acceptance among governments" in Europe "despite Russia's mounting opposition." For example, the Czech Republic, Poland, and Britain "have all expressed serious interest in hosting parts of the shield," while "other countries traditionally cool to the idea have been notably quiet." The trigger, the Monitor says, is "concern about a nuclear Iran."

Prodi Set To Resume Control Of Italian Government. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A6, Kahn, 2.04M) reports, "After resigning as Italy's prime minister last week, Romano Prodi is preparing to resurrect his government with his old cabinet intact and push ahead with his political program." But in recent days, Prodi "has lured a few new allies to his side in order to bolster his narrow majority in Parliament." However, he still must address Parliament this week before facing confidence votes in the upper and lower houses. AFP (2/26) also reports the developments.

UN Court To Issue Ruling In Bosnian Genocide Case. The Washington Times/AP (2/26, Max) reports the U.N.'s International Court of Justice is expected to rule today in what is seen as "one of the most momentous cases in its 60 years" -- Bosnia's "demand to make Serbia accountable for the slaughter, terrorizing, rape and displacement of Bosnian Muslims in the early 1990s." If it rules for Bosnia, the Court "could open the way for compensation amounting to billions of dollars from Serbia."

NYTimes Urges US, Europe To Back Kosovo Plan. The New York Times (2/26, 1.16M) editorializes, "Earlier this month, a United Nations envoy, Martti Ahtisaari, presented a sensible plan for the future of Kosovo. ... Mr. Ahtisaari's proposal would effectively grant Kosovo independence, but with strict limits, extensive international supervision, and protection for the ethnic Serbs and other minorities who live there. ... The United States and Europe should press the Security Council to quickly endorse the Ahtisaari plan."

Treasury Delegation In Macau To Discuss North Korean Funds. The AP (2/25, Lee) reports a US Treasury Department delegation was in Macau Monday "briefing local officials about the investigation of North Korean bank accounts in the Chinese territory," an American official said. On Monday, Dale Kreisher, spokesman at the US Consulate General in Hong Kong, told the AP that the US Treasury delegation was in Macau briefing local officials about North Korean funds frozen by Banco Delta Asia. "Discussions (with North Korea) along with the US investigation have brought Treasury to the point where they think they can begin taking steps to resolve the BDA matter," said Kreisher, but declined to say if Washington was ready to lift the sanctions on the bank.

Zoellick Says Nuclear Deal Moves Korean Peninsula Towards Reconciliation. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/26, A18, 2.04M) Robert Zoellick, former U.S. trade representative and deputy secretary of state, writes, "North Korea needs to fulfill its September 2005 commitment to abandon all nuclear weapons and programs. North Korea's steps are likely to be halting as it weighs the risks of opening with those of isolation. Yet even if Pyongyang chooses belligerence, U.S. cooperation with the other four parties will position it better to quarantine the dangers. The five can best deter North Korea. They will be best able to prevent the selling of nuclear materials. President Bush does not view this move as another accord limited to nonproliferation objectives. It opens the way for peace and reconciliation on the peninsula and a means to shape the future security arrangements in East Asia."

Thai Government Fails To Stem Muslim Insurgency. The New York Times (2/26, Mydans, 1.16M) reports, "Some are already calling it war, a brutal Muslim separatist insurgency in southern Thailand that has taken as many as 2,000 lives in three years with almost daily bombings, drive-by shootings, arson and beheadings. It is a conflict the government admits it is losing. A harsh crackdown and martial law in recent years seem only to have fueled the insurgency by generating fear and anger and undermining moderate Muslim voices. A new policy of conciliation in the past four months has been met by increased violence, including a barrage of 28 coordinated bombings in the south that killed or wounded about 60 people on Feb. 18."

UN Security Council Mulls Sending Force To Chad. USA Today/AP (2/26) reports, "Tribal leaders are desperate for the deployment of a U.N. peacekeeping force along Chad's border with Sudan to protect refugees and stop increasing spillover from the violence in Darfur. The U.N. Security Council is considering a mission, with up to 10,000 troops, largely because Sudan's government has resisted efforts to send U.N. peacekeepers to Darfur itself. But Chad's president is worried about inflaming tensions with Sudan, while U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon has warned the Security Council that peacekeepers would face 'serious risks' of rebel attacks."

ICC Prepares Darfur-Related Indictments. The New York Times (2/26, Simons, 1.16M) reports that on the International Criminal Court's "plans to file its first criminal charges linked to the conflict between the Sudanese government and the rebel fighters. The prosecution will disclose the names of several senior figures it believes to be among those most responsible for Darfur's devastating bloodshed and human disaster. Other names are expected to follow. … Thomas Lubanga, a Congolese citizen and once a powerful militia leader, has been charged with conscripting and abusing children, some as young as 10, during the fighting in the country's Ituri region. He is the only suspect in the court's custody, and his trial, expected later this year, will be the first since the tribunal opened for business in 2002."

Economic Boom Said To Have Exacerbated Sudanese Refugees' Misery. The Washington Post (2/26, A10, McCrummen, 690K) reports, "These days, Khartoum has palm trees wrapped in lights, new Toyota dealerships and an outdoor cafe where patrons can sip lattes under a delicately refreshing mist spray. This week marks the opening of Khartoum's first five-star hotel, Al Salam Rotana -- a swank, $300-a-night palace of marble and haute cuisine for the jet set. At the city's edges, however, is the detritus of power struggles dating back decades -- a dozen or so squalid, off-the-map camps, most without running water or electricity, and filled with more than 2 million people. Most of the residents are non-Arab Africans who fled the conflict in the south. More recently, people have come here to escape the conflict in Darfur, now in its fourth year. For people in the camps, the economic boom has had the perverse effect of further undermining their already precarious existence. With land at a premium, the local government of Khartoum state periodically sends police and bulldozers into the camps to plow under swaths of mud houses, pushing people even farther out into the desert, and then sells the cleared land to developers."

Senegal President Leading In Bid For Second Term. The AP (2/25, Callimachi) reports, "The president of one of Africa's most stable democracies sought another five-year term Sunday, jostling with 14 contenders in a race that may hinge on the votes of young people hungry for jobs. Early results reported by state-run Senegalese Press Agency indicated President Abdoulaye Wade was in the lead but did not say by how much. It was not known how many votes had been counted, but they included polling stations in key cities including the capital Dakar and Thies, the agency said. The first official results are not expected until later Monday."

Election Upsets Relatively Stable Senegal. The New York Times (2/26, Polgreen, 1.16M) reports, "In the more than four decades since it won its independence from France, Senegal has never had a coup and suffers from almost none of the ethnic strife that has dragged many West African countries into civil war. It is one of Africa's oldest and most open democracies, with genteel politics that have been the envy of many of its neighbors. But this election has been different. The campaign was marred by accusations that the government was trying to stifle opposition. One opposition rally was barred from taking place, though others were allowed."

Kenyan Education Program Draws Mixed Reactions. On its front page, the Los Angeles Times (2/26, Sanders, 850K) reports on a "growing public education crisis" in Kenya "spurred by a national decision in 2003 to make primary education free to all." Since the school fees were eliminated, "more than 1 million additional youngsters have entered public schools" and the move "has won international praise for President Mwai Kibaki." So far, however, officials "have failed to back their ambitious policy with adequate resources. Enrollment is up 24% since the fees were dropped, but the number of school facilities has barely expanded and the number of teachers has fallen 6%, according to the Education Ministry."

Bush's Fast-Track Trade Authority Expires June 30. Roll Call (2/26, Ackley) reports, "President Bush's fast-track trade negotiating authority expires June 30, but a new business coalition pushing for its renewal has crafted a long-term plan, indicating that pro-trade lobbyists expect a much longer slog than they would like to admit. The Trade for America Coalition, according to sources familiar with the effort, has planned for a new set of co-chairmen to take over six months into the campaign, which would take it beyond the deadline for fast-track renewal. A lobbyist whose clients are involved in the coalition said that even though Members and Bush administration officials continue to negotiate to renew it before the authority lapses, this likely will be no quick lobbying battle. … Opponents of trade promotion authority — emboldened by the Democratic-controlled Congress — have geared up their own effort, working closely with the office of Rep. Mike Michaud (D-Maine). Michaud's staff is meeting regularly with representatives from the AFL-CIO and other labor unions, Sierra Club, Friends of the Earth, Public Citizen and the U.S. Business and Industry Council."

CAFTA Considered A Success On Its First Anniversary. The Wall Street Journal (2/26, A18, 2.04M) Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes, "As the Central American Free Trade Agreement marks its one-year anniversary Friday, it's a good time to remind Capitol Hill protectionists how wrong they were when they tried to kill the deal in 2005. Every country that entered into Cafta is enjoying new benefits, including the U.S. The U.S. and El Salvador were the first two countries to begin trading under Cafta last March. In the months that followed, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Honduras made it official. The Dominican Republic and Costa Rica have yet to join. Both have signed onto the negotiated agreement, but without implementing legislation before Feb. 29, 2008, they could end up shut out of the free-trade area. Costa Rica hasn't even ratified the deal yet. The early results from Cafta's first year are promising. Central Americans are importing more than ever from the U.S. and the region is also attracting new capital. Both developments are helping participants grow more competitive and improving the quality of life for consumers."

US Urged To Develop Economic Relations With China. Lawrence H. Summers, a contributing editor to Opinion, writes in a Los Angeles Times (2/26, 850K) op-ed that economic advancements happening in China reflect events in the Japanese economy in the late 1980s and early 1990s. Although there are "obvious differences," Summers says the similarities "are striking enough to invite an effort to draw some lessons from the Japanese experience." Given China's "scale, rapid growth and the greater level of imbalances in today's global economy," he says Chinese economic policy and its international economic relations "are even more important. By learning from a rather unfortunate history, policymakers on both sides of the Pacific can avoid repeating its mistakes."

Columnist Says Allies, Not Enemies, Hate US Most. Los Angeles Times (2/26, 850K) columnist Niall Ferguson explores why Americans are so hated. The "best explanation," he says, "is the simplest. Being hated is what happens to dominant empires." Therefore, Ferguson says one might assume those who hate us the most are "people in countries that the United States has recently attacked or threatened to attack." However, a recent Gallup Center for Muslim Studies' poll suggests that it's "not the United States' enemies that hate it most," bur rather "people in countries that are supposed to be friendly, if not allies." There is, he says, "after all, a reason why they say it's lonely at the top."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Support For Hunger Strike Growing (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

A former Florida professor has not eaten for more than a month to protest prosecutors' efforts to make him cooperate with their investigation into whether a network of Herndon-based Muslim charities financed terrorist organizations.

Sami al-Arian, 49, who has twice refused to testify before a federal grand jury in Alexandria, has lost more than 30 pounds and collapsed in jail from the effects of his water-only diet. His hunger strike has drawn the support of Muslim organizations, which held a news conference last week at Justice Department headquarters in Washington and called for a worldwide fast in support of al-Arian.

Tracy Billingsley, a spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons, said prison officials will force-feed al-Arian through a tube if he appears close to death. "We would not let an inmate die," she said.

A federal jury in Tampa deadlocked in 2005 on nine charges that al-Arian aided terrorists and acquitted him of eight other counts. He then pleaded guilty to one count of supporting a Palestinian terrorist organization. Sentenced to 57 months, including time already served, he was expected to be released from prison and deported this year.

But prosecutors want al-Arian to testify in their probe into whether the network of Muslim charities, businesses and think tanks was financing terrorist organizations, according to court documents. He has twice refused and been held in contempt by a federal judge. As much as 18 months could be added to his prison term unless he agrees to testify.

On Jan. 21, al-Arian stopped eating, supporters said. He has had only water since then, and several days not that. Federal marshals recently moved him from Northern Neck Regional Jail in Warsaw, Va., to a federal medical prison in Butner, N.C., federal officials and supporters said.

Al-Arian is trying to rally public support so prosecutors will stop trying to make him testify, said Agha Saeed, chairman of the American Muslim Taskforce for Civil Rights and Elections, a coalition of Muslim groups. The former University of South Florida professor has accused prosecutors of violating his plea agreement with the Justice Department, which he contends does not require his cooperation.

"Why do they continue to humiliate and punish this man?" asked Nihad Awad, national executive director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations. "They exhausted all their resources and found out there is no case against him. Enough is enough."

The U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria, which is leading the Herndon probe, would not comment.

David N. Kelley, a former U.S. attorney who prosecuted terrorism cases in New York, said it is a common tactic for prosecutors to seek additional testimony from someone already convicted. "In many instances, you are remiss if you don't pursue that," he said.

Kelley, who would not comment on the specifics of al-Arian's case, said people are routinely held in contempt if they refuse to testify. "The law is quite clear," he said. "The grand jury is entitled to every man's evidence, regardless of his status."

A judge has rejected al-Arian's argument that he does not have to cooperate with Alexandria prosecutors under his plea agreement. "The Court has never heard of the Government agreeing that someone would forever be protected from grand jury subpoena," U.S. District Judge James S. Moody Jr. wrote in November from Tampa.

On Wednesday, al-Arian's attorneys filed a notice indicating that they will appeal the contempt findings to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit in Richmond, said Ashraf Nubani, one of the attorneys.

Prosecutors want al-Arian to reveal what they believe are his ties to the International Institute of Islamic Thought, a Herndon group that is one of the key organizations being investigated. The probe burst into public view in March 2002, when federal agents raided homes and businesses in Herndon and elsewhere in Northern Virginia.

The searches led to the convictions of two people, including prominent Muslim activist Abdurahman Alamoudi, who admitted that he plotted with Libya to assassinate Saudi Arabia's ruler. But no charges have been filed against the principals of the cluster of companies and charities at the center of the investigation, and the charities strongly deny terrorist ties.

Al-Arian contends that he has no information that could help the investigation and that any ties between him and the Institute of Islamic Thought are more than a decade old, according to court documents.

Intelligence Report Reassesses Threat Of Al Qaeda (WT)

By Sean Rayment, London Sunday Telegraph

The Washington Times, February 26, 2007

LONDON -- Al Qaeda has established a foothold in most countries across North Africa and the Middle East and poses a far graver threat to Britain than previously thought, according to a report being circulated among British security departments.

Titled "Extremist Threat Assessment," the document, which was drawn up this month, also predicts that Afghanistan will supersede Iraq as the main location for terrorists planning violent acts against the West.

The secret intelligence document says that the number of locally based Islamist terrorists involved in plotting suicide attacks against "soft" targets in Britain could number more than 2,000.

The document, which has been circulated to the MI5 counterintelligence service, Scotland Yard, the interior ministry, Cabinet officials and the Ministry of Defense, says al Qaeda has grown into a worldwide organization with a foothold in virtually every Muslim country in North Africa, the Middle East and central Asia.

It says the terrorist group's influence extends from North Africa, including Egypt, through to Lebanon, Turkey and Jordan, and into Somalia and Sudan. Al Qaeda is "resilient and effective" in Iraq, its "operating environment and financial position" in Pakistan has improved and a new group had emerged in Yemen.

"With violence in Afghanistan intensifying, and therefore receiving greater media attention, the country may well become more attractive as a venue for foreigners wishing to fulfill their jihad ambitions," the document says.

Using the term "UK" or "United Kingdom" to refer to Britain, the document states: "The scale of al Qaeda's ambitions toward attacking the UK and the number of UK extremists prepared to participate in attacks are even greater than we had previously judged."

It warns that terrorist "attack planning" against Britain will increase this year, and adds: "We still believe that [al Qaeda] will continue to seek opportunities for mass casualty attacks against soft targets and key infrastructure. These attacks are likely to involve the use of suicide operatives."

Eliza Manningham-Buller, the director general of MI5, warned recently that more than 1,600 "identified individuals" were actively engaged in plotting terrorist attacks in Britain. There were 200 known networks involved in at least 30 terrorist plots. It is thought the number of British citizens involved in plots could be well in excess of 2,000.

MI5 thinks that soft targets, such as the transportation system and economic targets such as the city of London and Canary Wharf, are most at risk.

A senior political source said the picture painted by the document was "particularly bleak and unlikely to improve for several years."

"The Security Services have constantly warned that the task of countering Islamist terrorism is a daunting one. There will be more attacks in Britain," he said.

Two years ago, Western intelligence said that al Qaeda was virtually a spent force, disrupted by counterterrorist operations around the world.

In July 2005, the Pentagon obtained a letter written by Ayman al-Zawahri, al Qaeda's deputy leader, saying the organization had lost many of its leaders and that it had virtually resigned itself to defeat in Afghanistan. Al Qaeda's lines of communication, funding and structure had been severely damaged.

Jonathan Eyal, the director of international security at the Royal United Services Institute, attributed the al Qaeda revival to the West's inability to kill or capture Osama bin Laden, and said the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq made matters worse.

"This document clearly demonstrates a marked shift from the mood of Western governments only a year or two ago," he said. "It is a clear admission that the organization is re-emerging and the reasons are that none of al Qaeda's top leaders have been killed or captured."

The Italian Job (WSJ)

The capture of an alleged Islamist terrorist recruiter in Milan four years ago in an operation carried out by U.S. and Italian intelligence could have been a model for transatlantic cooperation in counterterrorism. Instead, it is becoming Exhibit A in how European politicians are working against the U.S., undermining the fight against Islamic terrorism and endangering the NATO alliance.

An Italian court 10 days ago indicted 25 CIA agents and a U.S. Air Force lieutenant-colonel on charges that they kidnapped Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr and illegally took him back to his native Egypt, where he was imprisoned and, he claims, tortured. Five Italians were also charged -- including the top two officials at the military intelligence agency at the time.

Nasr, a radical imam also known as Abu Omar, is a terrorist suspect who had been under Italian police surveillance since 9/11. In the covert operation that took place in February 2003, Italians and Americans worked together to apprehend Nasr, before whisking him back to Egypt against his will and without the permission of an Italian court. The Milan prosecutor, Armando

Spataro, contends that Nasr was "kidnapped." Such "extraordinary rendition," he tells us by phone, is illegal under Italian law, and he's ensuring that the "rules are really followed . . . without any political considerations."

As in many such operations, the particulars are in dispute. But no one, including the Italian prosecutors, doubts that Nasr posed a security risk. In 2005, a Milan court, at Mr. Spataro's behest, issued an arrest warrant for Nasr, charging him with building a terrorist network in Europe that actively recruited terrorists, including for Iraq. Eight of his accomplices have been sentenced to up to 10 years in prison on similar charges, and Italian authorities believe more are at large.

Why Nasr was captured rather than arrested in 2003 isn't clear. According to a July 2005 story in the New York Times, which cited unnamed current and former American officials, the CIA was concerned that Nasr was plotting to attack the U.S. Embassy in Rome. For whatever reason, the U.S. wanted him off the streets while the Italians weren't ready to arrest him. The CIA won't comment. The government of Silvio Berlusconi -- who was Prime Minister at the time -- denied any foreknowledge of the rendition.

No one seriously claims, however, that the CIA agents were in Italy without the explicit knowledge and participation of Italy's security services. This is the crucial point -- and explains why the indictments are a hostile act against the U.S. By long-established international legal practice, the official agents of one country operating in another with that state's permission are immune from prosecution. The status of forces agreement that governs U.S. troops stationed in Italy enshrines this principle at least for official conduct.

If the CIA agents did anything wrong, that's up to American authorities to decide. Mr. Spataro, an independent prosecutor, can indict as many Italians as he wants. His pursuit of U.S. government personnel, however, makes him a rogue. Aggravating the harm, Mr. Spataro cited the 25 agents by name, possibly putting their lives in danger. The trial in June, presumably in absentia, would likely do further damage by exposing intelligence-gathering techniques. Call it a tutorial for al Qaeda on how to avoid detection.

The appropriate response by Prime Minister Romano Prodi would have been a swift announcement that he would reject any extradition request from the court. Instead, Mr. Prodi merely hinted that he might do so before his government collapsed on Wednesday night. If he wins the confidence vote he's likely to face this week to resume power, he'll get a second chance to finally fulfill his obligation to his U.S. treaty allies and reject extradition.

European politicians are more at fault here than any prosecutor. Since the 9/11 attacks in the U.S., many European leaders have been playing a double game, working with the U.S. to root out terrorist plots on the sly -- and saving countless lives -- while publicly condemning "American methods" in rhetoric that has fed rising anti-Americanism. It doesn't help that many Europeans embrace the preposterous legal notion of "universal jurisdiction," the idea that an ambitious prosecutor can indict and try anyone for an alleged crime committed anywhere in the world.

This is the climate in which, for example, a German court this month issued arrest warrants for 13 CIA agents allegedly involved in transferring a German-Lebanese terrorist suspect, Khaled al-Masri, to Afghanistan for questioning. It made no difference that Mr. al-Masri had been arrested in Macedonia. Also in Germany, prosecutors are considering whether to bring war-crimes charges against former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, former CIA Director George Tenet and other senior civilian and military officials. Mr. Rumsfeld, Colin Powell and Dick Cheney were targeted by Belgian courts until the law there was changed. And so on.

European officials need to understand the risks they're running if they keep this up. Italy and the U.S. are NATO partners, but such an alliance is meaningless if "allies" make a habit of prosecuting each other for cooperating against a common threat. Italy's political grandstanding is endangering NATO, as well as the lives of millions on both sides of the Atlantic.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Terror: Is Tehran Targeting New York? (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136041

Increasing tensions between Washington and Tehran have revived New York Police Department concerns that Iranian agents may already have targeted the city for terror attacks. Such attacks could be aimed at bridges and tunnels, Jewish organizations and Wall Street, NYPD briefers told security execs last fall, according to a person with access to the briefing materials who asked for anonymity because of the sensitive subject matter.

NYPD officials have worried about possible Iranian-sponsored attacks since a series of incidents involving officials of the Iranian Mission to the United Nations. In November 2003, Ahmad Safari and Alireaza Safi, described as Iranian Mission "security" personnel, were detained by transit cops when they were seen videotaping subway tracks from Queens to Manhattan at 1:10 in the morning. The men later left New York. "We're concerned that Iranian agents were engaged in reconnaissance that might be used in an attack against New York City at some future date," Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly told NEWSWEEK. A spokesman for the Iranian Mission in New York said he was aware of the allegations but had no immediate comment.

With Full-body X-ray, A Closer Look At Air Travelers (CSM)

By Faye Bowers

The Christian Science Monitor, February 26, 2007

Most passengers asked to submit to a full-body X-ray at Security Checkpoint B didn't bat an eyelash. Nine in 10 gamely stepped up to a scanner about the size of a vending machine, placed their feet on the red footprints painted on the carpet, and raised their arms – all in the name of airport security.

The aim of the new technology unveiled Friday at Phoenix Sky Harbor International Airport: to allow officials to detect weapons – such as plastic explosives strapped to the body – that metal detectors and other security measures might miss.

A potential sticking point is that this machine, known as a backscatter, can see through clothes. Its deployment at the Phoenix airport is a test to see how well it works – and to assess how air travelers respond to its use. If passengers at Terminal 4 who were asked to undergo body scans are an indication, security trumps privacy.

"Sure, I'd be happy to do it," said Ella Adams from Atlanta, who had stopped in Phoenix on Friday to catch a connecting flight to San Diego. "Privacy to me isn't nearly as important as our security, especially if they assure me the X-rays aren't harmful."

In all, the Phoenix airport has seven security checkpoints, and the body- scanning machine has been installed for this pilot program at just one. About 8,000 travelers a day move through this checkpoint, says Paul Armes, security director at Sky Harbor for the federal Transportation Security Administration (TSA).

The backscatter will not be used for everyone who passes this way, at least not at first. A traveler would have to have set off alarms on the routine metal detector, or be randomly selected for further screening. Even then, travelers have two options: the new X-ray machine, or a pat-down, which has caused passenger complaints about invasiveness.

What the backscatter 'sees'

Privacy advocates remain wary of backscatter technology. Barry Steinhardt, director of the technology and liberty program for the American Civil Liberties Union, likens it to a "virtual strip search." He hasn't seen a demonstration of the latest version of the technology, but he saw an earlier one at a Los Angeles city jail.

"The one I saw was very graphic, almost like a nude picture," he says. The technology has not been installed at airports until now because of questions about privacy and how well it can detect possible weapons, adds Mr. Steinhardt. "Utility is ... important here. People are being asked to trade their privacy for security. But first show us there is some security [benefit]."

Backscatter technology has been around for years, says Joe Reiss, vice president of marketing for American Science and Engineering Inc. (AS&E), which makes the backscatter being tested in Phoenix. The technology has been used, for example, to check large cargo containers and passenger vehicles.

"About 15 years ago, this technology was incorporated in personal [body] scanning systems," Mr. Reiss adds. For airport use, AS&E has adjusted the technology so that what's depicted is only an outline of a passenger – with private parts blurred – and any objects on him or her, such as "a handgun, or a blade of a ceramic knife that wouldn't be discovered by a metal detector."

"This technology gives us an additional layer of capabilities to detect objects," says Michael Golden, a technology expert for Southwest Airlines, who is on loan to the TSA. "This actually will show us where prohibited items are on the body," he says, though he declines to name all objects this machine can detect. "We think it is a good balance between security and privacy."

Other officials say the backscatter will be able to detect several items that other security technology – including metal detectors – cannot. Those items include plastic or ceramic knives, plastic explosives, and some liquid explosives. They say it can at best prevent a bomb plot like the one uncovered in London last summer, in which alleged terrorists planned to attack using liquid explosives.

What the screened passenger does

Here's how the screening is working so far. A traveler, after agreeing to the X-ray, is walked through the process by a TSA employee. He or she stands on the red-painted footprints facing the scanner, with arms raised as if a police officer had yelled, "Hands up." Then the traveler turns around for a back pose.

Another TSA employee in a tiny, walled room about 50 feet away assesses the image. A man views images of male passengers, and a woman views images of women. The images are not stored, government officials say, and they aren't transmitted anywhere else. The process should take about 30 seconds.

Kenneth Johnson, a Vietnam veteran with artificial shoulder joints and an artificial knee, was among the first to be pulled out of line Friday for closer screening. He chose the backscatter X-ray over the pat-down, saying he didn't mind it a bit.

As the TSA decides whether to buy the $100,000 machine, its pilot project is expected to last up to 90 days. It may be expanded later this year, using another manufacturer, at Los Angeles International Airport and John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York.

"We want to look at the operational capabilities of this machine and have a dialogue with the public about their perceptions of its use," says Ellen Howe, assistant administrator for the Department of Homeland Security.

Adding To Security But Multiplying The Fears (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

Foreigners arriving at the American border must present both index fingers for fingerprinting, but that will soon change. The Department of Homeland Security now wants 10 fingers.

The two-print system was largely a biometric backup, an added level of security to supplement and verify a passport or a visa. The 10-print system adds a powerful investigative tool.

“When we have a fingerprint of a terrorist who has left behind a bomb or an I.E.D. in Iraq or has left his fingerprint in a safe house somewhere, we don’t always have the two index fingers,” Paul Rosenzweig, a Department of Homeland Security official, said at a briefing in December. “It could be the pinkie or the thumb. And thus by moving to a 10-print system, we will enhance our ability to use biometrics to enable us to identify threats before they occur in the United States.”

Call it biometric mission creep.

People concerned about privacy and civil liberties say they fear the creation of gigantic biometric databases ripe for data-mining abuse. They note that Mr. Rosenzweig was a supporter of the Total Information Awareness program at the Defense Department, which had planned, as the Pentagon put it, to create “ultralarge all-source information repositories.” The program was shut down in 2003 because it scared people.

The administration’s last-ditch defense of that effort was telling, too. It changed the name to the Terrorism Information Awareness program.

There is a pattern here, said Marc Rotenberg, the executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center. “These techniques that are sold to us as necessary to identify terrorists inevitably become systems of mass surveillance directed at the American people,” Mr. Rotenberg said.

In an interview, Robert A. Mocny, the acting director of U.S.-Visit, the unit in the Department of Homeland Security that is in charge of the fingerprint program, said all the right things. “We cannot,” Mr. Mocny said, “have a reaction to 9/11 such that we’re sacrificing privacy and civil liberties on the altar of security.”

But the privacy folks have a point. Once information is captured, it must be tempting to use it. With little discussion, for instance, driver’s license photographs have been dumped into enormous digital databases, ripe for searches with facial recognition technology. Police departments have started to use the databases to find people and identify suspects. That may be a fine idea, but it is one that has been pursued without real debate or disclosure.

Mr. Mocny made a persuasive case that the move to 10 prints enhanced the legitimate goals of identification and investigation.

"We've identified 1,800 people who've tried to lie their way into the United States, and their fingerprints tripped them up," he said.

The 10-print program will, he said, make identifications even more reliable. "We're now at 80 million-plus individuals in the system," he said. "With that many fingerprints, they start to look alike." More fingers, he said, means more differentiation.

On the investigative side, more fingerprints give the authorities more opportunities to check them against a watch list of 2.5 million prints that includes, he said, "known and suspected terrorists," sexual predators and people wanted on criminal and immigration charges.

But there are real questions about the reliability of the technologies employed. Though fingerprint evidence is widely assumed to be close to infallible, recall the $2 million the federal government paid in November in the settlement of a lawsuit filed by Brandon Mayfield.

Mr. Mayfield, a lawyer in Oregon, was arrested in 2004 after the F.B.I. definitively and mistakenly concluded that his fingerprints matched one taken from a plastic bag containing detonator caps found at the scene of the bombings in Madrid that year.

"Fingerprints work fine when you have a bank robbery in Chicago," said Michael Cherry, vice chairman of the digital technology committee of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers. But matching a partial fingerprint of poor quality and uncertain vintage collected in Afghanistan or Iraq to a database of global scope is a different matter.

The 10-print strategy, Mr. Cherry said, is a "technical nightmare that will produce many Brandon Mayfields."

At an American Bar Association conference in November, Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, said the 10-print program "creates a powerful deterrent for anybody who has ever spent time sitting in a training camp and training or building a bomb in a safe house or carrying out a terrorist mission on a battlefield."

Those terrorists, presumably, will be deterred by not wanting to test the nation's border security. Or the deterrent may be a different one: encouraging a generation of young jihadists to wear gloves.

"Unless you believe there's a constitutional right or a civil liberties right to have phony documents or to pretend to be someone you're not, I don't really see the cost in civil liberties," Mr. Chertoff told the assembled lawyers.

"By the way," he added, "we'll be collecting all of your glasses after dinner."

A Symbolic Setback To Linking Pay With Performance (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

MaxHR is out.

Human Capital Operational Plan is in.

The name change at the Homeland Security Department reflects a new set of priorities aimed at improving how thousands of Border Patrol, customs and immigration officers are hired and how career leaders are chosen and trained.

But the name change -- from trendy branding to prosaic government jargon -- also can be taken as a symbol of how one of the Bush administration's signature efforts to shake up the federal workforce lost momentum because of overly ambitious goals, adverse court rulings and budget cuts.

The shift to the new plan means that a key goal of the Bush White House -- to use about 110,000 Homeland Security employees as a model for a rigorous pay system with raises linked to job performance ratings -- will not be completed before the presidential election in 2008, leaving it to a new White House team to forge on or abandon that effort.

Marta Brito PÃ©rez, who became the department's chief human capital officer five months ago, called the decision to adopt a new workforce management plan "the right thing to do."

"It should be reassuring to the employees, employee representatives, the Hill and the public," she added.

Instead of pushing forward on a department-wide performance-based pay system, Homeland Security will set up a pilot project in 2008 focused on the department's employees who work in intelligence. The pilot will be coordinated with a pay initiative being developed by the director of national intelligence for the government's primary intelligence agencies.

Because intelligence analysts are in high demand across government, the pilot project should help the department stay competitive in hiring and pay while also providing a test of Homeland Security's new performance management system. That system calls for developing job goals for employees, tracking their accomplishments and using job ratings to steer larger pay raises to the best workers.

"There was a conscious decision that this organization needs to have a good performance management program in place before pay can be linked to it," Perez said. "We have to get this right."

If the pilot goes well, the department in 2009 could move to the next step: shifting employees off the 15-grade General Schedule, a decades-old pay system that the Bush administration faults as giving too many automatic pay raises to federal workers, and into "pay bands" where salaries are more closely tied to occupation and geographic location.

But changing pay rules at Homeland Security may prove difficult. Federal unions have won court rulings that block the department's efforts to limit their bargaining rights, and the department will probably have to negotiate with unions over the design and implementation of a new pay system.

The unions and some employees are skeptical about revamping pay practices, in part because they believe giving managers greater discretion over raises will let them play favorites or use pay decisions to single out employees for punitive actions.

Under the new plan, known as HCOP, the department will focus on hiring and retaining a talented and diverse workforce, creating a "culture of performance," creating high-quality training programs and improving leadership development programs.

PÃ©rez said the department is not jettisoning MaxHR, which kicked off in February 2004. "We are moving beyond Max in areas that are keys to our success," she said.

Still, she acknowledged in an interview, "every time someone mentions Max, their eyes roll," apparently because it has become tainted by union lawsuits or because it is no longer seen as living up to its catchy name.

"We're not going to be using the term MaxHR anymore," PÃ©rez said. "Folks around here don't seem to like it. It is not reflective of the things we are doing."

WAR NEWS:

Rice Decries Democrats' War Tactics (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, February 26, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday denounced the Iraq war resolutions being planned by congressional Democrats as "the worst of micromanagement" that would intrude on the president's power as commander in chief to manage the war.

But Senate Democrats may not be able to force the issue. Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan said his party does "not yet" have 60 votes needed to defeat an expected Republican filibuster of a vote reversing the 2002 Iraq war resolution. "We hope to pick up some Republicans. We don't know if we will," he said.

Miss Rice strongly criticized the Democrats' plans, some of which would also restrict what actions U.S. troops may take or put impossible conditions on their funding.

"I think policies that diminish the flexibility of the commanders, the commander in chief, but especially the commanders in the field, that disrupt the normal process of allowing the executive branch to determine things like training times and so forth, this would be a problem," she said on ABC's "This Week."

She said that while "it's very important for to have the oversight role when it comes to the execution of policy in the field, there has to be a clear relationship between the commander in chief and the commanders in the field."

"If you ever disrupt that chain, then you're going to have the worst of micromanagement of military affairs, and it's always served us badly in the past," Miss Rice said.

Mr. Levin said Democrats still plan to bring forward a resolution that reverses the congressional authorization for President Bush to invade Iraq. Democrats have said they would approve a new resolution limiting the scope of Mr. Bush's ability to wage war in Iraq, with an aim to bring home most U.S. forces from the country by March 2008.

"Hopefully, we're going to come with a resolution which is going to modify, in effect, the previous resolution that was very broad," Mr. Levin, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "We don't believe it is going to be possible to remove all of the troops."

The draft version, supported by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, would restrict U.S. troops to fighting al Qaeda terrorists, training the Iraqi security forces and maintaining Iraq's borders. The approach backed by many House Democrats, led by Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, would only fund U.S. forces in Iraq under onerous conditions that Mr. Murtha has said the Pentagon could not meet.

ABC's "This Week" host George Stephanopoulos asked Miss Rice whether she would recommend that Mr. Bush veto any bills to require forces to leave Iraq. She said that decision was up to the president.

When Miss Rice was asked on "Fox News Sunday" by host Chris Wallace whether Mr. Bush would "feel bound" by legislation calling for the end of the U.S. combat role, the secretary of state responded: "The president is going to, as commander in chief, need to do what the country needs done."

Mr. Levin declined to say how many American troops should remain if the Democrats' plan to withdraw forces from Iraq passes. However, he was more direct when asked what would happen if Mr. Bush simply ignores any new congressional resolution.

"Well, then we have a constitutional battle on our hands because this is a binding resolution," he said. "It would be very difficult, I think, for him to sustain that position given the fact that he has relied so heavily on our resolution authorizing him to go to war in the first place."

Several Republicans, including some who have turned against the war, have challenged Democrats to vote on a bill that would cut off funding for the war.

"The truth of the matter is there's really only, you know, one way to end the war, if that's what our Democratic friends want to do. That is to cut off the funding for the war," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, during a meeting with reporters on Friday.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who now supports a timetable for a withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq, echoed Mr. McConnell's statement during an appearance yesterday on CBS' "Face the Nation."

"They should cut the funding or let the president do what he needs to do, because to micromanage a war is the worst thing," said Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican. "It's the ingredient for a loss."

Rice Says Congress Shouldn't Micromanage War (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spoke out Sunday against efforts in Congress to limit the role of U.S. forces in Iraq, saying President Bush would not allow himself to be constrained by such a "micromanagement of military affairs."

Asked whether Bush would abide by a binding resolution, now being drafted by Democratic leaders, that would include the start of troop withdrawal from Iraq, Rice told "Fox News Sunday" such a measure would hinder his efforts to support the "flexibility of our commanders to do what they think they need to do on the ground."

"I can't imagine a circumstance in which it's a good thing that their flexibility is constrained by people sitting here in Washington, sitting in the Congress, trying to micromanage this war," Rice said. "I just don't think it's a good thing."

She said Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new U.S. commander in Iraq, backs the president's plan to send in 21,500 more troops, primarily to deal with sectarian violence in Baghdad.

The legislation being drafted by Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and other Democrats would limit the mission by modifying the 2002 resolution authorizing the use of U.S. military force in Iraq.

It would restrict the role of U.S. forces to pursuing Al Qaeda operatives and supporting and training Iraqi army soldiers. It could also set a March 2008 goal for withdrawing troops not involved in those activities.

It is unclear how much bipartisan support Levin and others have managed to gather in the Senate since failing in this month's effort to pass a symbolic resolution opposing the troop buildup. A similar measure passed the House.

Rice, who also appeared on ABC's "This Week," said the restrictions were impractical given the nature of war and counterterrorism in Iraq.

"How do you possibly distinguish what is going on in Baghdad, for instance, from the fight with Al Qaeda?" she said. "Some of these car bombs may indeed be the work of an organization like Al Qaeda or Al Qaedaaffiliated allies."

Levin, on NBC's "Meet the Press," argued that Congress had "the responsibility — not just the power, the responsibility — to speak out and to change the course when you have a failing course, which is what we're on."

"This is not a surge so much as it is a plunge into Baghdad and into the middle of a civil war," Levin said.

Asked if he was "tying the hands of the commander in chief," he answered in part: "Of course we're trying to tie the hands of the president and his policy. We're trying to change the policy. And if someone wants to call that 'tying the hands' instead of 'changing the policy' — yeah, the president needs a check and a balance."

If Congress passes this binding resolution and Bush ignores it, Levin said, "we have a constitutional battle on our hands."

Deauthorizing Iraq (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

Democratic senators face trouble this week trying to cleanse themselves of the stain of voting for President Bush's Iraq war resolution. Republican senators who have turned against the U.S. military intervention in Iraq are not interested in bailing out Democrats by approving their proposal to repeal the authorization overwhelmingly passed by Congress in 2002.

As Congress returns this week from the year's first recess, an amendment to repeal authorization is supposed to be attached to the bill containing homeland security recommendations by the Sept. 11 commission. But Sen. Norm Coleman, who has become prominent among Republican critics of Bush's war policy, told me from his home state of Minnesota that he would oppose deauthorization and predicted that no more than two Republican senators would vote for it.

One of those two Republican senators would have to be Nebraska's Chuck Hagel, who has fearlessly critiqued Bush's war policy. But Hagel told me that he is not inclined to support a repeal. If Hagel is lost, Democrats might fall short of the 50 votes necessary for final passage, much less the 60 necessary to close off debate. George W. Bush may be an unpopular president fighting an unpopular war, but Democrats are finding it hard to make war policy from Capitol Hill.

Democrats do not cloak the political nature of their efforts. Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden, participating in a Nevada forum for Democratic presidential candidates last week, exultantly announced to applause his intent to "revoke the president's authority that he was given . . . to go to war." The mantra is not limited to the presidential hopefuls from the Senate. On the campaign trail in New Hampshire, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico also called for de-authorization.

The de-authorization effort follows a series of frustrations for Democrats. Biden, having regained the Foreign Relations chairmanship after the 2006 elections, pushed a harshly worded, though nonbinding, antiwar resolution that went nowhere. A milder bipartisan measure fell short of the votes needed for cloture. Democratic backing for a plan to place conditions on the funding for Bush's surge of troops dropped off when its sponsor, Rep. John Murtha, bragged that troops in the field "won't have the equipment" under his plan.

As Congress began its break, Biden and Carl Levin, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, looked to events 37 years ago. A 1964 resolution (passed with only two dissenting votes in the Senate) gave President Lyndon B. Johnson his requested free hand in Vietnam because of a trumped-up attack on a U.S. naval vessel in the Gulf of Tonkin. It was repealed in 1970 as an amendment to a noncontroversial bill.

But as is true with most Iraq-Vietnam analogies, de-authorization of the Tonkin Gulf resolution bears little resemblance to what is being contemplated today. President Richard M. Nixon began pulling combat troops out of Vietnam soon after he took office in 1969, and he offered no objection to repeal of the LBJ resolution. It passed the Senate 81 to 10, with unanimous support from Republicans.

In contrast, the proposed 2007 de-authorization looks like a Democratic effort to escape the wrath of the antiwar party faithful. Of the 29 Democrats who voted for the 2002 war resolution over four years ago, 21 are still in the Senate, seven are up for reelection next year and three -- Biden, Christopher Dodd and Hillary Clinton -- are running for president.

After checking with antiwar Republicans on recess last week, I found that several who had favored a nonbinding resolution rejecting Bush's policy are loath to give Democrats a get-out-of-jail-free card on Iraq. An exception was Sen. Gordon Smith of Oregon, who indicated he might favor de-authorization but would never vote to cut off funds. However, Coleman told me: "I don't see us going back and rewriting history." Similarly, Hagel said: "We are not going back and rewind every decision we made."

Hagel's position is critical. Before the recess, Biden and Levin sought support from the conservative who had been one of only two Republicans to back their tough nonbinding resolution. Hagel has long been appalled by Bush's war policy, but he is rightly suspicious of Democratic ploys that would have no impact on dire conditions in Iraq.

Specter Explores Congress' Role On War Policies (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

Even as Senate Democrats ready a bill to rewrite President Bush's authorization for the Iraq War, Senate Judiciary ranking member Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) is raising constitutional questions about just what Congress can do to restrict the commander in chief's ability to wage war.

"I'm worried that the Congress is going to go off half-cocked," said Specter, according to a transcript of a Feb. 22 interview with the Philadelphia Inquirer. "I don't want to see something come to the Senate and have a historic debate ... and be called upon to vote on something which I haven't fully explored, and the Senate doesn't understand."

In a Feb. 20 letter to Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), Specter called for more hearings on Congress' options regarding Iraq and specifically questioned the Democrats' nascent plan to rewrite the 2002 Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Iraq.

"I question whether, absent the use of the appropriations power, the only choice for the Congress is a total repeal of the authorization to use military force in Iraq," Specter wrote. "If Congress acts to repeal the authorization to use force in Iraq, the question may arise whether the President may veto that action requiring a two-thirds override."

Indeed, Bush is unlikely to sign such a repeal or any modification to the 2002 Iraq War authorization, and Senate Republicans are expected to vigorously object to — and possibly filibuster — any new authorization measure.

But Specter indicated in his letter that if a new war authorization measure were to become law, it would be binding on the president even though Bush and other presidents have treated war authorizations as mere expressions of support that do not have the force of law.

Specter pointed out that the current war authorization governing the Iraq conflict "placed restrictions on the President's use of force in Iraq, requiring him to certify that diplomatic means are insufficient and that the use of force will not impede the war on terrorism," among other things.

Of course, Congress twice repealed the use of force authorization for the Vietnam War, but then-President Lyndon Johnson essentially told Members that he never needed their permission in the first place, noted Louis Fisher, a Constitutional scholar at the Law Library of Congress.

Specter also outlined a number of ways in which Congress previously has restricted or cut off funds for war efforts, most notably during then-President Richard Nixon's administration in the early 1970s.

However, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has repeatedly said that Democrats will not move to cut off funding for troops currently in Iraq and he has reacted coolly to proposals to restrict funds for Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to the region.

DOJ_NMG_0136048

In the Philadelphia Inquirer interview, Specter said Rep. John Murtha's (D-Pa.) proposal to use the appropriations power to put strict limits on troop movements in an attempt to force a draw-down of troops in Iraq might go too far.

He said the key question Senators must answer will be "where Congressional power ends under the precedents that I cited in the letter and where micromanagement begins."

In the letter, which Leahy's office said he had not yet seen, Specter outlined several other ways that Congress could effect a change in the president's Iraq policy, while Democrats also said the authorization for the war is just one weapon in their arsenal.

"We're examining all our options to force President Bush to make the necessary changes in Iraq," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

Though Specter declined to specify what he would be willing to vote for, he noted in his letter that Congress in the past has dictated military personnel choices to the president as well as troop levels under its constitutional authority to "raise and regulate armies and navies."

Following the Civil War, for example, Congress barred then-President Andrew Johnson from firing Gen. Ulysses S. Grant without prior approval from the Senate, the letter stated. Under then-President Theodore Roosevelt, Congress required that the crews on naval vessels should be made up of at least 8 percent Marines.

"This represents a specific action by the Congress to control a quite specific aspect of warfare," Specter noted of the naval vessel provision.

Fisher, however, said Congress has even more options — from targeting the president's domestic priorities to removing him from office.

"One big recourse, when you're dealing with the president, is that you can always [use Congressional powers] to hurt him elsewhere," said Fisher, who testified at a Jan. 30 Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on the subject of Congress' war powers. "The big one at the very end, of course, is impeachment."

The Choice On Iraq (WSJ)

By Joseph Lieberman

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

Two months into the 110th Congress, Washington has never been more bitterly divided over our mission in Iraq. The Senate and House of Representatives are bracing for parliamentary trench warfare -- trapped in an escalating dynamic of division and confrontation that will neither resolve the tough challenges we face in Iraq nor strengthen our nation against its terrorist enemies around the world.

What is remarkable about this state of affairs in Washington is just how removed it is from what is actually happening in Iraq. There, the battle of Baghdad is now under way. A new commander, Gen. David Petraeus, has taken command, having been confirmed by the Senate, 81-0, just a few weeks ago. And a new strategy is being put into action, with thousands of additional American soldiers streaming into the Iraqi capital.

Congress thus faces a choice in the weeks and months ahead. Will we allow our actions to be driven by the changing conditions on the ground in Iraq -- or by the unchanging political and ideological positions long ago staked out in Washington? What ultimately matters more to us: the real fight over there, or the political fight over here?

If we stopped the legislative maneuvering and looked to Baghdad, we would see what the new security strategy actually entails and how dramatically it differs from previous efforts. For the first time in the Iraqi capital, the focus of the U.S. military is not just training indigenous forces or chasing down insurgents, but ensuring basic security -- meaning an end, at last, to the large-scale sectarian slaughter and ethnic cleansing that has paralyzed Iraq for the past year.

Tamping down this violence is more than a moral imperative. Al Qaeda's stated strategy in Iraq has been to provoke a Sunni-Shiite civil war, precisely because they recognize that it is their best chance to radicalize the country's politics, derail any hope of democracy in the Middle East, and drive the U.S. to despair and retreat. It also takes advantage of what has been the single greatest American weakness in Iraq: the absence of sufficient troops to protect ordinary Iraqis from violence and terrorism.

The new strategy at last begins to tackle these problems. Where previously there weren't enough soldiers to hold key neighborhoods after they had been cleared of extremists and militias, now more U.S. and Iraqi forces are either in place or on the way. Where previously American forces were based on the outskirts of Baghdad, unable to help secure the city, now they are living and working side-by-side with their Iraqi counterparts on small bases being set up throughout the capital.

At least four of these new joint bases have already been established in the Sunni neighborhoods in west Baghdad -- the same neighborhoods where, just a few weeks ago, jihadists and death squads held sway. In the Shiite neighborhoods of east Baghdad, American troops are also moving in -- and Moqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi army are moving out.

We of course will not know whether this new strategy in Iraq will succeed for some time. Even under the most optimistic of scenarios, there will be more attacks and casualties in the months ahead, especially as our fanatical enemies react and attempt to thwart any perception of progress.

But the fact is that we are in a different place in Iraq today from even just a month ago -- with a new strategy, a new commander, and more troops on the ground. We are now in a stronger position to ensure basic security -- and with that, we are in a stronger position to marginalize the extremists and strengthen the moderates; a stronger position to foster the economic activity that will drain the insurgency and militias of public support; and a stronger position to press the Iraqi government to make the tough decisions that everyone acknowledges are necessary for progress.

Unfortunately, for many congressional opponents of the war, none of this seems to matter. As the battle of Baghdad just gets underway, they have already made up their minds about America's cause in Iraq, declaring their intention to put an end to the mission before we have had the time to see whether our new plan will work.

There is of course a direct and straightforward way that Congress could end the war, consistent with its authority under the Constitution: by cutting off funds. Yet this option is not being proposed. Critics of the war instead are planning to constrain and squeeze the current strategy and troops by a thousand cuts and conditions.

Among the specific ideas under consideration are to tangle up the deployment of requested reinforcements by imposing certain "readiness" standards, and to redraft the congressional authorization for the war, apparently in such a way that Congress will assume the role of commander in chief and dictate when, where and against whom U.S. troops can fight.

I understand the frustration, anger and exhaustion so many Americans feel about Iraq, the desire to throw up our hands and simply say, "Enough." And I am painfully aware of the enormous toll of this war in human life, and of the infuriating mistakes that have been made in the war's conduct.

But we must not make another terrible mistake now. Many of the worst errors in Iraq arose precisely because the Bush administration best-cased what would happen after Saddam was overthrown. Now many opponents of the war are making the very same best-case mistake -- assuming we can pull back in the midst of a critical battle with impunity, even arguing that our retreat will reduce the terrorism and sectarian violence in Iraq.

In fact, halting the current security operation at midpoint, as virtually all of the congressional proposals seek to do, would have devastating consequences. It would put thousands of American troops already deployed in the heart of Baghdad in even greater danger -- forced to choose between trying to hold their position without the required reinforcements or, more likely, abandoning them outright. A precipitous pullout would leave a gaping security vacuum in its wake, which terrorists, insurgents, militias and Iran would rush to fill -- probably resulting in a spiral of ethnic cleansing and slaughter on a scale as yet unseen in Iraq.

I appeal to my colleagues in Congress to step back and think carefully about what to do next. Instead of undermining Gen. Petraeus before he has been in Iraq for even a month, let us give him and his troops the time and support they need to succeed.

Gen. Petraeus says he will be able to see whether progress is occurring by the end of the summer, so let us declare a truce in the Washington political war over Iraq until then. Let us come together around a constructive legislative agenda for our security: authorizing an increase in the size of the Army and Marines, funding the equipment and protection our troops need, monitoring progress on the ground in Iraq with oversight hearings, investigating contract procedures, and guaranteeing Iraq war veterans the first-class treatment and care they deserve when they come home.

We are at a critical moment in Iraq -- at the beginning of a key battle, in the midst of a war that is irretrievably bound up in an even bigger, global struggle against the totalitarian ideology of radical Islamism. However tired, however frustrated, however angry we may feel, we must remember that our forces in Iraq carry America's cause -- the cause of freedom -- which we abandon at our peril.

The Politics Of The Brit Drawdown (NSWK)

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

In public, British and American officials say the U.K.'s withdrawal of troops from southern Iraq is a sign of success. But that wasn't the private reaction when the Brits first explained their plans last year. Several officials on both sides of the Atlantic (who all declined to be named when discussing the internal debate on security issues) say there was real consternation among Bush's aides about the prospect of a British withdrawal at a time when the president was planning to make the case for a surge of troops. Two senior officials in Washington said the concern was about how the British drawdown would look in PR and political terms inside the Beltway.

The two sides have been running on different tracks for several months. As the Brits outlined their plans for withdrawal, in November and December of last year, the details of Bush's surge were far from settled. At the same time, the Baker-Hamilton group was releasing an alternative strategy for Iraq. British officials were far more supportive of the study group's proposals than their counterparts inside the White House were. But the Brits also admitted that their challenges in southern Iraq are much simpler than the sectarian war facing American troops in and around Baghdad. After several rounds of talks, the Americans were eventually satisfied that Britain's phased withdrawal would truly be "conditions-based"; that the reduction in force was geared to the security situation on the ground and not a politically inspired cut-and-run.

In fact, the British officials concede that Prime Minister Tony Blair has a strong political interest in starting the endgame for his engagement in Iraq before he hands over power to his political ally Gordon Brown. Democrats in Washington, meanwhile, treated the news as a flak jacket against GOP accusations that they support a policy of retreat. "No matter how the White House tries to spin it, the British government has decided to split with President Bush," said Sen. Ted Kennedy.

On the ground in Iraq, rival Shiite parties are already jockeying for power. "The withdrawal of the British forces is a political decision to save Blair more than it is a decision to help the people of Iraq," says Ali Yassin of the Fadhila Party in Basra. "We are afraid of the vacuum that will come after the withdrawal of the British forces."

Britain, which had more than 40,000 troops in the region at the time of the 2003 invasion, now has 7,100 troops in Iraq. Blair said the number could "possibly" drop to below 5,000 by the end of the year. One Downing Street source told NEWSWEEK that it's "potentially the case" that all British troops could be out of Iraq by the end of 2008. That would happen only if conditions allowed, but he said, "We believe things are heading in that direction." In that case, the Brits are on the same timeline as most of the Democratic candidates who want to succeed President Bush in 2009.

Samuelson: A $2 Trillion Footnote? (NSWK)

By Robert J. Samuelson

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

Anyone who practices deadline journalism is bound to find much to regret—things you wish you'd said (or hadn't said) and words, arguments and attitudes that, with hindsight, seem poorly chosen. Which brings me to my September 2002 column, "A War We Can Afford." As the situation in Iraq has deteriorated, some readers have suggested that I revisit that column and confess to error. Let me now take up their invitation, because today's ferocious war debate raises many of the same issues.

Yes, that column made big mistakes. The war has cost far more than I (or almost anyone) anticipated. Still, I defend the column's central thesis, which remains relevant today: budget costs should not shape our Iraq policy. Frankly, I don't know what we should do now. But in considering the various proposals—Bush's "surge," fewer troops or redeployment of those already there—the costs should be a footnote. We ought to focus mostly on what's best for America's security, the situation in Iraq and our global influence.

To be sure, the war's costs have been huge. Since September 2001, Congress has provided $503 billion for Iraq, Afghanistan and related activities, says the Congressional Budget Office. The administration's request for fiscal 2007 (ending in September) and fiscal 2008 would bring the total to $746 billion. Iraq represents about 70 percent of that. By contrast, my original column put the cost of an Iraq war at up to $80 billion. That was based on the cost then of the war in Afghanistan ($10 billion), the cost of the first gulf war ($61 billion) and the expectation that another invasion would involve fewer troops (it did). It also assumed that U.S. troops wouldn't stay indefinitely.

As to the future, CBO has done two "illustrative scenarios"—one involving a troop reduction to 30,000 by 2010, the other a reduction to 75,000 by 2013. In both instances, troop levels would remain until 2017. By CBO's estimates, the two scenarios would involve extra spending from 2009 to 2017 of $269 billion and $696 billion, respectively.

Finally, the war has created costs that, though they don't show up in accounts labeled "Iraq," are properly attributed to Iraq. Trucks, helicopters and tanks are wearing out at faster rates; they'll have to be replaced or refurbished. Recruiting costs have risen. Veterans' disability benefits and health costs are increasing. Already, 1.4 million U.S. troops have served in the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, says Linda Bilmes, a budget expert at Harvard. Since the first gulf war, almost 40 percent of veterans have received disability benefits, she says. The rate for today's wars could be higher. She estimates the present value of future disability and health benefits at between $300 billion and $600 billion.

The war has clearly worsened the long-term budget outlook. How then can I treat that so lightly? What's missing is context. Dominated by Social Security and health care, the federal budget now totals nearly $3 trillion annually. No one knows what the wars' ultimate costs might be. But suppose that they reach $2 trillion by 2017 (the figure is cumulative, not in any one year). That's a big number, perhaps too big. It's also a wild guess. Still, CBO estimates all federal spending over the same period (2002-2017) will total $48 trillion; war spending would be about 4 percent. In the same period, the income of the U.S. economy (gross domestic product) would total an estimated $248 trillion; war spending would be less than 1 percent of that. The point, as I said in 2002, is that we're so wealthy we "can wage war almost with pocket change."

With hindsight, it now seems almost incontestable that the Iraq war should never have been fought. It has eroded our global power, weakened our military and resulted in thousands of American and Iraqi deaths. What I most regret about my earlier column is that it seemed to bless a war, when I was mainly trying to focus attention on questions more important than money. Given the headline (I wrote it) and the fact that those questions came at the end of the column ("Is this war justifiable? Should the United States go it alone? What would happen if we don't fight? What will happen if we do?"), the reaction was understandable. In truth, I was uncertain about the war then, just as I'm unsure of what to do now.

But I am certain—now as then—that budget consequences should occupy a minor spot in our war debates. It's not that the costs are unimportant; it's simply that they're overshadowed by other considerations that are so much more important. We should argue about what's best for our national security. We can pay for whatever's necessary. If we decide to do less because that's the most sensible policy, we shouldn't delude ourselves that any "savings" will rescue us from our long-term budget predicament, which involves the huge costs of federal retirement programs. Just because the war is unpopular doesn't mean it's the source of all our problems.

Zakaria: Iraq Needs An 'Economic Surge' (NSWK)

By Fareed Zakaria

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

We are now fighting a war intelligently in Iraq. The only problem is, it's the last war, not the present one. The United States has gambled all its efforts on a troop surge that tackles the conflict that defined Iraq from 2003 to 2005—the insurgency—rather than the civil war now raging across the country. Worse, in trying to solve yesterday's problem we are exacerbating today's. In Baghdad, Shiite militias have melted away. Almost all U.S. military operations are now directed against Sunni insurgents. If those are successful, the picture could look less violent in six months, but it will be a dangerous stasis. A senior U.S. military officer, who is not allowed to speak on the record on these matters, said to me, "If we continue down the path we're on, the Sunnis in Iraq will throw their lot behind Al Qaeda, and the Sunni majority in the Arab world will believe that we helped in the killing and cleansing of their brethren in Iraq. That's not a good outcome for the security of the American people."

We don't intend to side with anyone. We're trying to be evenhanded and build a single, democratic nation. But this attempt at neutrality is collapsing in Iraq's bloody sectarian reality. Last week's uproar over allegations that Shiite policemen in Baghdad had raped a 20-year-old Sunni woman vividly illustrates how trust between the two communities has been shattered. Shiite Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki first ordered an investigation, then 12 hours later declared the woman a liar, freed and rewarded the alleged rapists and later fired a Sunni official who had called for an unbiased investigation. Meanwhile we're stuck in the middle, promising to uncover the truth while both sides are convinced that we've betrayed them. This is the definition of a no-win strategy.

The United States needs to find fresh approaches that won't feed the sectarian dynamic and will address the needs of ordinary Iraqis, not the political elites who are jockeying for power. Most important, we need to find a strategy whose costs are sustainable. Militarily this means drawing down our forces to around 60,000 troops and concentrating on Al Qaeda in Anbar province. The surge we should be pushing instead is a political one, and even more critically, an economic one.

An economic surge is long overdue. One of the less-remarked-upon blunders of the Coalition Provisional Authority was that—consumed by free-market ideology—it shut down all of Iraq's state-owned enterprises. This crippled the bulk of Iraq's non-oil economy, threw hundreds of thousands of workers into the streets and further alienated the Sunnis, who were the managerial class of the country. The economic effects of this decision have been seismic. For example, Iraq's agricultural productivity has plummeted because fertilizer plants were summarily closed. Unemployment in non-Kurdish Iraq remains close to 50 percent, which helps explain why so many young men are joining gangs, militias and insurgent groups. For the moment at least, democracy in Iraq has sharpened the country's divisions. Capitalism and commerce can make them less relevant. That is the lesson of many conflict-ridden countries from Northern Ireland to Mozambique to Vietnam.

Paul Brinkley, a talented deputy under secretary of Defense, is trying to get the bulk of these state-owned factories up and running. He's already restarted a bus factory in Iskandariyah, south of Baghdad, and the experience has been telling. Hundreds of workers still in the area showed up for work and the machines are now humming busily. There have been no attacks on the factory. "The insurgents attack people working for the police, Army or the Americans. They do not want to alienate locals trying to make ends meet," said one official working on the project.

Of the original 193 state enterprises, 143 could be restarted soon, says Brinkley. Management and workers are desperate to get jobs. The problem is money. Brinkley points out that his next target, a ceramics factory in Ramadi, is only waiting for two generators before it can reopen. They cost $1 million each. But funds for this purpose are hard to find. Washington has pledged more than $18 billion to fund "reconstruction" in Iraq but will not appropriate a cent to start up state-owned Iraqi companies. The Iraqi government has billions in oil revenue of its own but is so dysfunctional that it cannot move a new project through the system. So the factory is idle. A major global consulting firm has reviewed Iraq's state-owned enterprises and estimated that it would cost $100 million to restart all of them and employ more than 150,000 Iraqis—$100 million. That's as much money as the American military will spend in Iraq in the next 12 hours.

Reddit Maintaining Perspective (USNEWS)

By Fouad Ajami

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

'It's too soon to tell," The late Chinese leader Zhou Enlai is reported to have answered when asked for an evaluation of the significance of the French Revolution of 1789. This was nearly two centuries after the great upheaval of France. Revolutions are full of cunning, and the Iranian Revolution, now almost three decades old, has been no exception-cunning and ferocity side by side, the talk of a revolutionary millennium often concealing the skills of a leadership steeped in the ways of the bazaar. Shrewd players, these clerical leaders have found the cracks in the order of states around them. Brutal men, they rule a society of great historical sophistication. Given room to maneuver by a substantial windfall of oil income, they have made their nation a player of consequence in its neighborhood. Sly and opportunistic, Iran's rulers have been able to pick and choose at a time, and in a place, of great volatility.

American power swept away two regimes that the Iranians dreaded-the Taliban in Afghanistan and Saddam Hussein in Iraq. True, America was now a land power on Iran's flanks; the Iranians ducked at first, then gathered themselves as the American burden grew. Mixing bravado and bluff, and granting proxies in Palestine and Lebanon, the leaders of the Iranian theocracy appear to have succeeded in spreading the image of a mighty power able to have its way in the world. For some, that great arc stretching from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean is now a battleground between Pax Americana and the Persians. This belief is in part due to the abdication of the Arab states, their virtual absence from the contest of nations. There is bigotry in Arab lands, an animus on the part of the Sunni majority toward the political emancipation of the Arab Shiites. Arab diplomats and leaders shy away from Iraq-the pitiless jihadists are the only Arabs who come to Iraq-but the Iranians are present in force as pilgrims and traders and troublemakers and intelligence operatives.

"A cemetery of dreams." Iran is a radical player in the world of states, to be sure, but we should not overstate its power. We should not fall for the Persian bluff. It is important that we do all we can to thwart Iran's nuclear ambitions and to checkmate it in arenas that count, but we should always remember that this is a society swimming against the tide of history and confronting the limits of its capabilities. There is an Iranian role in Iraq, but it should not be exaggerated. It is not true that the Iraqi political class marches to the Iranian drummer. It is well known that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki spent his years of exile in Syria and kept his distance from the Iranians. "Iraq is a cemetery of dreams," a thoughtful Iraqi observed to me of his country. "Iranian dreams, no less than American dreams perhaps." Iraqis are a tough breed, and the notion that they are eager to take their country into a Persian dominion is unconvincing. The Iranians dwell virtually alone in the House of Islam, separated by language and culture, marked by their Shiism.

Then there are the troubles that count-the disabilities at home. Iran's deranged president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, came into power promising to put Iran's oil wealth "on the dinner table." But the Iranian economy is on the ropes. Hyperinflation, the drying up of international credit lines, and the astounding growth in energy consumption in Iran are bringing the country to the edge of crisis. The price of bread and meat and basic commodities has risen by as much as 25 percent. To tranquilize the realm, gasoline is subsidized well below its cost, and domestic consumption now accounts for a stunning 40 percent of Iran's oil production. Dire predictions now hold that the country will be unable to export much oil a decade from now.

The true believers will proclaim that revolutionary purity trumps all, but worldly needs and affairs ultimately prevail. A society that spends $20 billion a year to subsidize the price of energy, electricity, and gasoline will in the end have to contend with the wrath and disappointment of its people. There is swagger in Iran, and there is menace, for its rulers are without scruples. Terrorism, for them, is always an option. But theirs is a vulnerable and brittle society. There is no need to "engage" them and bail them out as they stumble. The regime should be harassed, contained, and held to account. We may not have to wait two centuries to pronounce on the fate of this revolution. The swagger abroad and the rot at home: It is a trajectory we are all too familiar with by now.

Just The Facts, Ma'am (USNEWS)

By Brian Duffy

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

The dark art of intelligence, never far from the surface in our post-9/11 world, is once again front and center, only not exactly in the way President Bush might have wished. After several weeks of on-again, off-again promises of a top-secret briefing on the alleged role of Iranian agents in the nightmarish violence of Iraq, U.S. military officials finally decided to deliver the goods in a secret briefing to reporters in Baghdad-and promptly stubbed their toe. The charge of Iranian meddling in Iraq is a grave one and needs to be dealt with seriously. But given the Bush administration's dismal record in the intelligence arena, the Baghdad briefing was handled in the worst way possible. No cameras or tape recorders were allowed. The identity of the intelligence analyst who led the briefing was not disclosed. And despite weeks of careful vetting by intelligence and military officials back in Washington, the briefing ran disastrously off message. This is all the more sad for the fact that there was, at the heart of the briefing, what appeared to be some very credible evidence to support the allegations against Iran.

One of the few salutary things about military conflict is that in bringing soldiers face to face with the enemy, it affords the opportunity of collecting courtroom-quality evidence that is the intelligence equivalent of the Holy Grail. That seems to have been the case here. The reporters in Baghdad were shown physical evidence-materiel, serial numbers, and the like-indicating that Iranian agents were shipping a highly lethal new roadside bomb into Iraq. More damningly, intelligence officials concluded that the agents were members of an elite cadre called the Quds force, a unit of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guards Force, which reports directly to Iranian leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. That's about as good as intelligence work gets. But then the briefer blew his case sky-high with this statement: "So the activities that the ... Quds force are conducting in Iraq, we assess, are coming from the highest levels of the Iranian government."

Iraq syndrome. It took the Pentagon's highest-ranking soldier, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to flatly refute the unsupported "highest levels" statement. Then President Bush finally got around to doing the same thing. "We don't know ... whether the head leaders of Iran ordered" it, he conceded.

For all the predictable-and, evidently, unfounded-criticism about the Bush administration's trying to make a case for attacking Iran, much as it made its flawed case for attacking Iraq, there is more at stake here than politics as usual, and perhaps President Bush's forthright rejection of the "highest leaders" charge was a tentative first step toward acknowledging it. Yes, the alleged parallels between Iraq and Vietnam have been badly overdrawn. But there is one fitting comparison whose implications the Bush administration-and perhaps succeeding administrations-will have to learn to live with. The lies and self-delusional scenarios our military and political leaders indulged themselves in during the Vietnam War created a long hangover effect called the Vietnam syndrome. As a result of the many misapprehensions and misstatements made before the invasion of Iraq and in its mismanaged aftermath, we are now beset by something that can only be called the Iraq syndrome. Its symptoms may be seen not just in the cynicism of so many Americans, as reflected in the opinion polls, but also in the reflexive rejection of American pronouncements by friends and allies even, as was the case with the unfortunate Baghdad briefing, when they are tenanted upon hard, credible evidence.

In the global war on terrorism, no tool will be more critical to American success than good intelligence. This administration, however, has done much to render that tool almost unfit for use. The tawdry disclosures from the perjury trial of Vice President Cheney's former aide, Lewis "Scooter" Libby, and the scathing Pentagon report against former Rumsfeld aide Douglas Feith show an administration dangerously cavalier about the credibility of its most critical intelligence and seemingly unconcerned about employing it in an overtly political context..

Vice President Cheney may feel as if the prewar intelligence failures on Iraq have been dealt with by simply hanging the issue around the neck of George "Slam Dunk" Tenet, the former director of central intelligence. And President Bush may sleep easier at night, having finally acceded to the demands that he create a new Director of National Intelligence office to fix the problems exposed by both Iraq and the 9/11 attacks. The jury on the latter is still out, but the implications of the Iraq syndrome are so pernicious that, for a long time to come, much greater care will have to be taken in the collection, analysis, and portrayal of American intelligence information. Credibility takes a long time to build, but it can be lost in just an instant.

How U.S. Is Failing Its War Veterans (NSWK)

By Dan Ephron And Sarah Childress

Newsweek, February 25, 2007

After returning from Iraq in late 2005, Jonathan Schulze spent every day struggling not to fall apart. When a Department of Veterans Affairs clinic turned him away last month, he lost the battle. The 25-year-old Marine from Stewart, Minn., had told his parents that 16 men in his unit had died in two days of battle in Ramadi. At home, he was drinking hard to stave off the nightmares. Though he managed to get a job as a roofer, he was suffering flashbacks and panic attacks so intense that he couldn't concentrate on his work. Sometimes, he heard in his mind the haunting chants of the muezzin—the Muslim call to prayer that he'd heard many times in Iraq. Again and again, he'd relive the moments he was in a Humvee, manning the machine gun, but helpless to save his fellow Marines. "He'd be seeing them in his own mind, standing in front of him," says his stepmother, Marianne.

Schulze, who earned two Purple Hearts for wounds sustained in Iraq, was initially reluctant to turn to the VA. Raised among fighters—Schulze's father served in Vietnam and over the years his older brother and six stepbrothers all enlisted in the military—Jonathan might have felt asking for help didn't befit a Marine.

But when the panic attacks got to be too much, he started showing up at the VA emergency room, where doctors recommended he try group therapy. He resisted; he didn't think hearing other veterans' depressing problems would help solve his own. Then, early last month, after more than a year of anxiety, he finally decided to admit himself to an inpatient program. Schulze packed a bag on Jan. 11 and drove with his family to the VA center in St. Cloud, about 70 miles away. The Schulzes were ushered into the mental-health-care unit and an intake worker sat down at a computer across from them. "She started typing," Marianne says. "She asked, 'Do you feel suicidal?' and Jonathan said, 'Yes, I feel suicidal'." The woman kept typing, seemingly unconcerned. Marianne was livid. "He's an Iraqi veteran!" she snapped. "Listen to him!" The woman made a phone call, then told him no one was available that day to screen him for hospitalization. Jonathan could come back tomorrow or call the counselor for a screening on the phone.

When he did call the following day, the response from the clinic was even more disheartening: the center was full. Schulze would be No. 26 on the waiting list. He was encouraged to call back periodically over the next two weeks in case there was a cancellation. Marianne was listening in on the conversation from the dining room. She watched Jonathan, slumped on the couch, as he talked to the doctor. "I heard him say the same thing: I'm suicidal, I feel lost, I feel hopelessness," she says. Four days later Schulze got drunk, wrapped an electrical cord around a basement beam in his home and hanged himself. A friend he telephoned while tying the noose called the police, but by the time officers broke down the door, Schulze was dead.

How well do we care for our wounded and impaired when they come home? For a country amid what President Bush calls a "long war," the question has profound moral implications. We send young Americans to the world's most unruly places to execute our national policies. About 50,000 service members so far have been banged up or burned, suffered disease, lost limbs or sacrificed something less tangible inside them. Schulze is an extreme example but not an isolated one, and such stories are raising concerns that the country is failing to meet its most basic obligations to those who fight our wars.

The question of after-action care also has strategic consequences. Iraq marks the first drawn-out campaign we've fought with an all-volunteer military. In practice, that means far fewer Americans are taking part in this war (12 percent of the total population participated in World War II, 2 percent in Vietnam and less than half of 1 percent in Iraq and Afghanistan). Already, the war has made it harder for the military to recruit new soldiers and more expensive to retain the ones it has. If we fall down in the attention we provide them, who's to say volunteers will continue coming forward?

The issue of veterans' care jumped into the headlines last week when The Washington Post published a series about Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C. The stories revealed decay and mismanagement at the hospital, and provoked shock and concern among politicians in both parties. "The doctors were fantastic," a Walter Reed patient, 21-year-old Marissa Strock, tells NEWSWEEK. "But some of the nurses and other staffers here have been a nightmare." Strock suffered multiple injuries, including broken bones, a lacerated liver and severely bruised lungs, when her Humvee rolled over an improvised explosive device on Nov. 24, 2005. She later had both her legs amputated. "I think a big part of [Walter Reed's problems] is they just don't have enough people to adequately handle all the wounded troops coming in here every day," she says. (Walter Reed did not respond to requests for comment about Strock's case.) The Pentagon responded swiftly to the Post series. It vowed to investigate what went wrong and immediately sent a repair crew to repaint and fix the damage to the aging buildings.

The revelations were especially shocking because Walter Reed is one of the country's most prestigious military hospitals, often visited by prominent politicians, including the president. But it is just one part of a vast network of hospitals and clinics that serve wounded soldiers and veterans throughout the country. A NEWSWEEK investigation focused not on one facility but on the services of the Department of Veterans Affairs, a 235,000-person bureaucracy that provides medical care to a much larger number of servicemen and women from the time they're released from the military, and doles out their disability payments. Our reporting paints a grim portrait of an overloaded bureaucracy cluttered with red tape; veterans having to wait weeks or months for mental-health care and other appointments; families sliding into debt as VA case managers study disability claims over many months, and the seriously wounded requiring help from outside experts just to understand the VA's arcane system of rights and benefits. "In no way do I diminish the fact that there are veterans out there who are coming in who require treatment and maybe are not getting the treatment they need," White House Deputy Press Secretary Tony Fratto tells NEWSWEEK. "It's real and it exists."

The system's shortcomings are certainly not deliberate; no organization is perfect. Some of the VA's hospitals have been cited as among the best in the country, and even in extreme cases, the picture is seldom black-and-white. Before he killed himself, Schulze was seen by the VA 46 times, VA Secretary James Nicholson told Congress this month. (He did not elaborate on what care Schulze received.)

Yet, as the number of veterans continues to grow, critics worry the VA is in a state of denial. In a broad sense, the situation at the VA seems to mirror the overall lack of planning for the war. "We know the VA doesn't have the capacity to process a large number of disability claims at the same time," says Linda Bilmes, a Harvard public-finance professor and former Clinton administration Commerce Department official. Last month Bilmes released a 34-page study on the long-term cost of caring for veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan. She projects that at least 700,000 veterans from the global war on terror (GWOT) will flood the system in the coming years.

As it is, for some veterans the wait can be agonizing. Patrick Feges was on hold for 17 months until his first disability check from the VA came through. An Eagle Scout from Sugar Land, Texas, Feges enlisted in 2003 and found himself in Ramadi a year later. In October 2004, a mortar exploded on his base about 50 yards from him, spraying him with shrapnel, slicing his intestines and severing a major artery. Feges lost consciousness and was flown to Walter Reed, where he underwent surgery. Long scars trail down his legs and midsection. At the hospital a fellow Texan came to visit: President Bush stood by his bed and chatted with him.

Feges is a polite 22-year-old with a military manner. He addresses strangers by last name and an honorific, even when prodded to drop the formality. "I was brought up right, sir," he explains. But his voice rises slightly when he describes his ordeal with the VA. A case officer in Houston processed Feges's request for disability in September 2005, then lost his application. Feges was summoned to repeated medical evaluations at the Houston center, but a year later he was still waiting for a check. By then, Feges had been accepted to culinary school in Austin and did not want to put off his studies. His mother, an elementary-school teacher, took a second job at a local McDonald's to help support him.

For discharged service members, the VA serves two functions: it provides medical care for service-related conditions at its clinics and hospitals across the country, and it reviews claims for disability benefits—chiefly, the monthly payments wounded veterans get for the rest of their lives. The review process can be complicated. It requires veterans to prove, through documents and sometimes through the testimony of fellow soldiers, that their afflictions are a result of their time in the military. Feges listed on his application all the ways he'd been affected by the wounds: he'd lost mobility in his ankles and knees, he suffered regular stomach cramps from the intestinal wound, he lost sensation in his hands and legs, he had trouble standing for long periods. NEWSWEEK presented the VA with the names and details of the veterans whose stories are told here, but a spokesman for the agency declined to comment on individual cases, citing doctor-patient confidentiality. Speaking generally, Dr. Michael Kussman, the VA's acting under secretary for health, tells NEWSWEEK that the department is trying to reach veterans earlier, as they approach their date of discharge, and that he does not believe Iraq and Afghanistan are straining resources severely. "The impact on the VA so far has been relatively small," Kussman says. "It has not kicked the system over in our budget and in our ability to absorb it."

Still, a jump in disability claims in recent years has created a bottleneck. Daniel Cooper, the VA's under secretary for benefits, confirmed his department was coping with a backlog of 400,000 applications and appeals; 75 percent of them were still within a "reasonable" reviewing time frame, he says. Yet, most of those claims were filed by veterans of previous wars (a veteran can file or appeal a claim even decades after discharge). As more servicemen and women return from Iraq, the backlog is likely to increase. Cooper says the average waiting time for a benefits claim is about six months. NEWSWEEK turned up a number of veterans who'd waited longer. Keri Christensen, a National Guard veteran and a mother of two, says the VA in Chicago took 10 months to process her application. Rory Dunn, who nearly died in an IED attack outside Fallujah, says his application was delayed because, among other things, the VA mixed up his file with that of a Korean War veteran.

Feges's claim was finally approved last month: after NEWSWEEK and the advocacy group Veterans for America began looking into his case, he got a call from a VA official in Waco, Texas, with the news that his money would come through. Last week he received back pay to the date of his application.

The compensation is not huge. A veteran with a disability rating of 100 percent gets about $2,400 a month—more if he or she has children. A 50 percent rating brings in around $700 a month. But for many returning servicemen burdened with wounds, it is, initially at least, their sole income. "When I started school, that's when it became really hard not to have that money," says Feges.

One reason to worry about a crush of new vets at the VA has to do with the proportion of wounded to dead Americans in Iraq. Though we tend to mark the grim timeline of the war by counting fatalities, what really distinguishes this conflict is how many soldiers don't die, but suffer appalling injuries. In Vietnam and Korea, about three Americans were wounded for every one who died. The ratio in WWII was nearly 2-1. In Iraq, 16 soldiers are wounded or get sick for every one who dies. The yawning ratio marks progress: better body armor and helmets are shielding more soldiers from fatal wounds. And advanced emergency care is keeping more of the wounded alive. The VA's Kussman says that soldiers who survive the first few minutes after an explosion have a 98 percent chance of surviving altogether. But that means an increased burden on the VA's health-care system.

Two such survivors are Albert and Connie Ross. Albert lost a leg when a rocket-propelled grenade landed close to him in August 2004 while he was on patrol in Baghdad. Connie lived through a 2004 suicide bombing in Mosul but suffered multiple fractures and burns. When the two met in a hallway at Brooke Army Medical Center in San Antonio, Texas, Connie thought she noticed a certain swagger in Albert's walk. "He had this weird dip in his walk, so I asked him, 'Why are you pimp-walking in a hospital?' And he said: 'I'm not pimp-walking, I'm an amputee.' I was so embarrassed." The two married earlier this year and are expecting a child.

Though he's been in the VA system for more than two years now, Albert still doesn't have a primary-care doctor. Without one, getting appointments with specialists can be difficult. "You're supposed to be assigned one right away," says Albert, who now lives in San Antonio. "I'm not frustrated so much as worried—worried if and when something does go wrong, something will happen with one of my legs ... They [primary-care doctors] are the ones who have to fill out a work-order form; it's impossible to do anything without them."

One thing Albert desperately wants to do: get a new prosthetic. He's one of the early African-American amputees of the war. But the fake limb he's been given matches the skin tone of a Caucasian. It so embarrasses Albert that he always wears a sock over it—even if he's in sandals. "He's very self-conscious about it," says Connie. "It really bothers him."

Albert's situation is probably atypical. The VA says a huge majority of veterans get primary-care doctors within 30 days. But people inside the system do concede there's a shortage of mental-health workers at many of the VA's hospitals and clinics across the country. And Schulze is not the only veteran to commit suicide after being turned away. In a similar case in 2004, the VA twice neglected to treat Iraq veteran Jeffrey Lucey for posttraumatic stress disorder (the second time because he was told alcoholics must dry out before being accepted to an inpatient program). By the time a VA counselor tracked down a bed in a New York facility with a built-in detox program, Lucey had already hanged himself. "The system doesn't treat mental health with the same urgency it treats general health care," says a senior VA manager who did not want to be named talking about shortcomings in the agency.

Even when veterans get to the right doctors, understanding how to leverage what they need from the system can be mind-bending. Tonia Sargent, whose husband, Kenneth, nearly died in a sniper attack in Najaf in 2004, says no one ever sat her down and explained the benefits and how to access them. Her husband's brain injury made him often incapable of understanding his own care. Key decisions fell to her alone. It's a "don't ask, don't tell system," she says.

Kenneth is a Marine master sergeant who'd been in the Corps for nearly 18 years. He was on his second tour in Iraq when a sniper bullet ricocheted off the metal hatch on his vehicle and hit him directly below the right eye, grazing the front of his brain and exiting near his left ear. Among other things, he was diagnosed with traumatic brain injury, which has become the signature wound of the Iraq war. Tonia had to fight the Marine Corps to keep him from being discharged, figuring he'd get better medical care if he remained in active service. But some of his treatment has been outsourced to the VA.

One of the tricks she learned early on was to demand photocopies of her husband's records—every exam, every X-ray, every diagnosis—and personally carry the file from appointment to appointment. "I don't know if there is a more formal protocol for transferring documents, but I know that what I brought ... was definitely put to use." When Sargent was transferred to the VA's lauded Polytrauma Center in Palo Alto, Calif., doctors there encouraged her to go home to Camp Pendleton near San Diego and treat his stay at the hospital as if it was a deployment. "After two weeks, they asked me how long I was planning to stay with my husband," she says. "They said it was his rehab, not mine. But I needed to learn how to care for him, and he suffered from extreme anxiety without me." She pushed back, staying in Palo Alto until he completed his care.

How can the system improve? Bilmes, who authored the Harvard study, proposes at least one drastic change—automatically accepting all disability claims and auditing them after payments have begun. (The VA says that would be an irresponsible use of taxpayer money.) Other critics have focused on raising the VA's budget, which has been proposed at $87 billion for 2008. More money could go toward hiring more claims officers and more doctors, easing the burden now and preparing the VA for the end of the Iraq war, when soldiers return home en masse.

But veterans' support groups and even some former and current VA insiders believe there's a reluctance in the Bush administration to deal openly with the long-term costs of the war. (All told, Bilmes projects it could cost as much as $600 billion to care for GWOT veterans over the course of their lifetimes.) That reluctance, they say, trickles down to the VA, where top managers are politically appointed. Secretary Jim Nicholson, a decorated Vietnam War veteran who was chosen by Bush in 2005, tends to be the focus of this criticism.

The senior VA manager who did not want to be named criticizing superiors told NEWSWEEK: "He's a political appointee and he needs to respond to the White House's direction." Steve Robinson of Veterans for America levels the accusation more directly. "Why doesn't the VA have a projection of casualties for the wars? Because it would be a political bombshell for Nicholson to estimate so many casualties." The VA denies political considerations are involved in its budgeting or planning. Nicholson declined to be interviewed but Matt Burns, a spokesman for the VA, called Robinson's comments "nonsensical and inflammatory," adding: "The VA, in its budgeting process, carefully prepares for future costs so that we can continue to deliver the quality health care and myriad benefits veterans have earned."

Fratto, the White House deputy press secretary, says money is not the problem. He points out the VA has had a hard time filling positions in some remote parts of the country. "You need to find people who are trained in PTSD and other disorders that are affecting veterans and find those who are willing to go to places where they are needed."

As is often the case in America when government institutions falter, however, community groups are already stepping into the void. Veterans of Foreign Wars has advocates helping vets negotiate the VA bureaucracy, much the way health facilitators in the private sector help consumers get the most from their health insurance. Robinson, of Veterans for America, has pulled together teams of volunteers—physicians, psychologists, lawyers—who give vets free services when the local VA branch falls down. At his office recently, he was coordinating a traumatic-brain-injury screening with a private doctor for a veteran who'd been denied access to VA care. The fact that Americans are coming forward doesn't absolve the VA of its obligation to provide first-rate care for veterans. Most of the wounded's problems just can't be solved by private citizens and groups, no matter how well meaning. But it does serve to remind us that we should take better care of veterans wounded in the line of duty as they make their way home, and try to remake their lives.

Untreated Wounds (NSWK)

By Babak Dehghanpisheh

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

Private Atiya was driving a heavy truck on the outskirts of Baghdad when he saw the flash. Then, a deafening boom and darkness. When Atiya came to, he was lying on the side of the road and the truck, still carrying 11 of his colleagues from the Iraqi National Guard, was rolling on without a driver. He looked down. "I saw my leg was gone," he says, squeezing his eyes shut at the memory. "It was the worst pain." One of his arms was broken, the other severely burned.

Atiya (who asked that only his first name be used for safety reasons) is one of thousands of members of the Iraqi security forces who have been wounded on the job. That attack, near the town of Abu Ghraib last Wednesday, was the third time Atiya, 32, has been hit by an IED since he joined the Guard last year. He was quickly taken to the American-run Combat Support Hospital, known as the Cash, in the Green Zone, often the first stop for critically wounded soldiers. "These guys are in harm's way more than any other slice of the Iraqi population," says an American doctor at the Cash who asked not to be quoted by name.

During a speech last year, the then secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld noted that Iraqi security forces take casualties at "roughly twice the rate of all Coalition forces." That's approximately 40,000 wounded and more than 6,000 dead, grim numbers by any measure. (Both the Iraqi Ministry of Defense and the U.S. military refuse to divulge data on Iraqi wounded for "security reasons.") "I've lost many friends," says Atiya, a soft-spoken man with a thick black mustache and receding hairline. At the Cash, Iraqi and American soldiers receive the same state-of-the-art care until they're stabilized. But for the Iraqis, it's downhill from there. "The problem is what happens afterward," says the U.S. doctor. "The safety net is very low."

Most of the Iraqi soldiers are first transferred to a hospital in central Baghdad that, by local standards, has decent equipment and well-trained doctors. Some Sunni troops are terrified of being absorbed into the public-healthcare system, which is run by officials with ties to the Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. All the Baghdad hospitals that receive Iraqi wounded have heavy security to guard against insurgents.

Under Saddam Hussein, an extensive infrastructure was put in place to deal with the casualties of the dictator's wars. Military hospitals were set up for long-term care and an Association of Veterans' Affairs helped the disabled and paid out pensions. Now one of the largest former military hospitals is used by squatters and the veterans' office doesn't deal with soldiers who signed up after 2003. A spokesman for the Ministry of Defense says that wounded soldiers are looked after well and continue to receive their salaries even if they can't return to the job. But anecdotal evidence suggests otherwise. Shakir Mohammed, a fair-haired 27-year-old soldier from Baghdad, received severe burns on the right side of his body from an IED attack in 2004. After treatment at the Cash, he says the Iraqi Army forgot about him. "When we left the hospital, no one asked about us anymore," he says. "All aid stopped at that time."

Mohammed still has nasty purplish scars on the right side of his body and says he's often in pain. He's also back on the job: with unemployment as high as 50 percent, the roughly $550 he receives each month is tough to beat. "There are no other jobs," says Mohammed. Swathed in bandages, Private Atiya looks down at his missing left leg and says he hopes the Guard can find him a posting in Najaf, his hometown. "I have no regrets," he says. "I want to serve."

Militant Iraqi Shiite Cleric Denounces Security Push (NYT)

By Damien Cave And Wisam A. Habeeb

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 25 — Iraq's most powerful Shiite militant cleric publicly repudiated the new Baghdad security plan for the first time on Sunday, according to a statement distributed by his aides that said the push to quell violence was doomed to fail as long as it was directed by the American military.

The cleric, Moktada al-Sadr, controls the Mahdi Army, the largest Shiite militia in Iraq, and without his support for the stepped-up security effort, the prospects for continued sectarian violence and a direct conflict with American troops could increase.

His precise whereabouts have remained unknown since Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki announced the start of the plan two weeks ago. Until now Mr. Sadr seemed to cooperate, allowing his most unruly commanders to be arrested and ordering his organization to focus on political rather than military resistance.

It was unclear why he would turn against the joint American-Iraqi plan, but many of his followers have been losing patience with the failure of the security push to eliminate violence against Shiites. On Sunday, that violence included a suicide bombing by a woman that killed 40 people at an elite Baghdad university attended mainly by Shiite students.

"There is no good that comes from a security plan controlled by our enemies, the occupiers," the statement said. "If you stay away from them, God will protect you from horror and harm. Make sure your plans are purely Iraqi and not sectarian."

The statement attributed to Mr. Sadr was read to a crowd of several hundred supporters in Baghdad's largest Shiite neighborhood by a top aide to his organization. The statement, which did not call on supporters to resist the plan but reiterated his longstanding demands for an immediate American withdrawal, is likely to put more pressure on Prime Minister Maliki, who recently called the security plan a "dazzling success."

In fact, since the plan started, violence in the capital has seemed to abate only marginally, with some days of relative calm and others pocked with violence that begins at dawn and continues until dark.

The Americans have repeatedly asked for patience and have emphasized that the plan's results will only become evident after several months.

On Sunday, Lt. Col. Scott R. Bleichwehl, an American military spokesman, said the denunciation by Mr. Sadr — who controls 30 seats in Parliament that the prime minister relies on for power — would not deter the security push. He said Iraqis supported the effort.

"The coalition is committed to working together with our Iraqi partners to reduce the violence and help protect the population," he said. "All of our operations are being done with the full cooperation with the Baghdad operational command and the duly elected Iraqi government."

The bombing on Sunday at Mustansiriya University's college of economy and administration wounded at least 55 people, most of them students, many of them women. Most suicide attacks in Iraq have been conducted by men, but since the first woman exploded herself at an army recruiting station near the Syrian border in September 2005, a handful of other women have carried out attacks.

The suicide bomber at Mustansiriya arrived at the busiest time of day, at about 12:40 p.m., minutes before the start of afternoon exams. Officials said she approached the campus through a middle pathway, between separate canopied entrances for men and women. When guards saw her trying to enter, they questioned her, and she moved quickly toward the building, the officials said.

The blast shattered glass all the way through the surrounding academic buildings, from front to back. An hour and a half later, the walkway where the explosion occurred was covered with blood, body parts, skirts, veils, blood-stained textbooks and steel ball bearings.

Inside the main room of the security building closest to the blast, where women are checked before being allowed in, a pool of water red with blood rippled at the doorway.

After the attack, about 10 American Humvees, along with Iraqi Army vehicles, were deployed at the site. Iraqi police officers patrolled the scene after hearing reports that a second suicide bomber might be on the way.

In a campus courtyard about 25 yards from where the explosion hit, students and neighbors dug small holes around a flower bed so they could bury some of what was left at the scene.

Hussain Ali al-Mousawi, a middle-aged blacksmith who said he lived across the street from the university, collected body parts on a notebook, placing severed fingers, pieces of skull and flesh on pages covered with student notes.

He said he had been carrying bodies, and the sleeves of his striped cotton shirt were soaked bright red.

He walked over to the holes and placed clothing, flesh and debris into the ground. Stunned Iraqi policemen stared. All around him, students crouched or sat on the ground crying.

At one point, a group of young men pulled away a wailing first-year accounting student who could not bear to leave. His arms resting on the shoulders of two friends, he shouted through tears; "I don't want to go home, I don't want to go home. I want to die here! I want to die here where my friends have died! How can I come back tomorrow without them?"

Mr. Mousawi continued his work. He showed a reporter the remains he sought to bury. "I don't know what they've done to deserve this," he said. "What have they done wrong?"

Many of the surviving students expressed defiance. Falah Hasan, 35, a third-year management student standing nearby blamed Syria, Saudi Arabia and other countries for sowing destruction in his country. He said that Iraqis would not give up.

"We are burying here the minds of our society," he said, pointing to the ad hoc graves being filled by Mr. Mousawi, the blacksmith. "We are planting them anew. How many of our great minds have they killed? They are targeting the students who are carrying pencils — our dirty neighbors."

"We shall reconstruct the great Iraqi mind from the beginning. This land will produce more minds than ever."

The attack Sunday was the second recent assault at a branch of the university. Two car bombs and a suicide bomber killed at least 70 people at a nearby campus on Jan. 16.

Other colleges throughout Iraq have been made targets in the past year, reflecting what is widely viewed as an attempt by Sunni extremist groups like Al Qaeda to drive out Iraq's middle class, the secular and the educated.

Also on Sunday, a car bomb struck near the Iranian Embassy in central Baghdad, killing one person and wounding four. Several mortars landed in Abu Dshir in southern Baghdad, and another car bomb in central Baghdad wounded four.

Bomber Targets Baghdad College; At Least 39 Students, 9 Guards Die (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136061

BAGHDAD, Feb. 25 -- A suicide bomber detonated a belt of explosives Sunday afternoon at a university in Baghdad, killing dozens of students, in the second large-scale attack on a college campus in the capital this year.

At least 39 students and nine guards were killed in the blast at the college of administration and economics of Mustansiriya University in northwestern Baghdad, according to Fadil al-Amiri, the school's administrative dean.

Last month, at least 70 people were killed in a bombing at the university's main campus.

"The students were coming very happy, very enthusiastic, anxious to take their exam," the dean said in a telephone interview. "It is catastrophic. They're like ripe flowers, just starting their lives."

The attack was one of the deadliest in the capital since stepped-up security measures in the capital officially took effect on Feb. 14. U.S. and Iraqi officials have taken measures to limit vehicle access to markets, government buildings and other sites frequently targeted by insurgents using car bombs. But the officials have expressed concern about the difficulty of intercepting suicide bombers with explosives strapped to their bodies.

Universities in Baghdad have remained open despite a string of threats, attacks and kidnappings targeting students and professors. Amiri said he spent the afternoon visiting injured students at hospitals.

"I knew these people," he said. "They considered me their guide. They are preventing people from coming to study in order to disable the education system."

Hours after the bombing, a statement attributed to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr criticized the security plan. The statement, issued in the holy city of Najaf, said that "bombs continue to explode" under a plan "controlled by the occupiers," a reference to the United States.

The statement expressed support for Iraq's security forces and called for reconciliation between Sunnis and Shiites. Sadr, the leader of the Mahdi Army, a powerful Shiite militia, is widely seen as a wild card in the success of the security plan.

"You are capable of protecting Iraq and its people with your faith, your sacrifice, your patience, your unity and your love, and not by the occupier and his tanks and planes," the statement said. "The security plan will not be good if it is controlled and ruled by our enemies, the occupiers."

Also Sunday, a spokesman for Iraq's Oil Ministry said a draft of the country's much-anticipated oil law still faces a potentially lengthy legislative review process. Kurdish officials announced Saturday that they had endorsed the draft bill, which still must be considered by a committee headed by the prime minister's office, said Assem Jihad, the Oil Ministry spokesman.

Fouad Hussein, a spokesman for the Kurdish regional government, said Sunday that Kurdish officials -- key participants in negotiations on the law -- conveyed their endorsement of the draft in a letter sent to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. He said Kurdish officials asked that national oil policy rely on two separate bills: one that focuses on the industry and another that sets rules for distributing oil revenue.

"The two laws must go together to the parliament," he said.

Maliki had promised that the law would be passed by the end of 2006.

U.S. officials, who have pressured Iraqi officials to enact the law, expressed support for the agreement. "Any movement toward agreement is welcome," said John C. Roberts, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad. "Given the complexities of the full range of oil and gas issues, as well as the financial ramifications and the technical issues that need to be addressed as Iraq modernizes its energy sector, good progress has been made already."

Also Sunday, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani was flown to the Jordanian capital to undergo medical treatment, according to a statement issued by his office. His aides said he had traveled to Amman for a round of checkups after becoming sick "due to the exhausting continuous work during the past few days."

Special correspondents Naseer Mehdawi, Naseer Nouri and Yasmin Mousa contributed to this report.

Suicide Blast Kills Dozens At University In Baghdad (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

A suicide bomber pushed past guards at a crowded college campus Sunday and set off a thunderous blast that killed at least 40 Iraqis, most of them female students waiting in line to enter classrooms for midterm exams.

DOJ_NMG_0136062

The attack was the second in recent weeks to target the mainly Shiite Muslim Mustansiriya University.

Even as rescue workers mopped up blood from the college grounds, the Iraqi government insisted that the U.S.-Iraqi security plan launched nearly two weeks ago was succeeding.

But radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, whose followers virtually control the campus, denounced the plan as a failure and said Iraqi government troops and police should take charge of security and that "invaders," a reference to U.S. troops, should leave.

Sadr's comments suggested that he is fed up with the plan, which aims to put thousands more U.S. and Iraqi troops on Baghdad's streets. The anti-American firebrand had agreed to cooperate with Prime Minister Nouri Maliki by drawing down his militia forces, and the result may have been evident in the decreased number of Sunni victims of Shiite death squads found along Baghdad's streets in recent weeks.

No group immediately claimed responsibility for the attack, but it was similar to others on mainly Shiite targets, such as crowded markets, which have appeared designed by Sunni insurgents to inflict maximum suffering.

Mustansiriya University's main campus and its satellite colleges are sandwiched between Shiite-dominated Sadr City and a mainly Sunni area. Students say Sadr's Al Mahdi militia virtually controls the university, enforcing conservative dress codes for women and canceling classes to honor Shiite martyrs.

The militia's presence has made Mustansiriya a sectarian battleground. On Jan. 16, at least 70 students were killed when two car bombs exploded almost simultaneously on the university's main campus, about a mile and a half from the College of Business Administration and Economics, where Sunday's attack took place.

The bomber, identified as a woman, struck at an especially busy time Sunday at the college gate. Two lines, one for female students and one for male students, had formed as students waited to be checked by guards, who patted them down, looked inside their bags and confiscated cellphones and other items that could hide explosives.

As they were being allowed in for 1 p.m. midterms, other students who had sat for morning exams were filtering out or milling in the campus courtyard comparing notes.

One person resisted being searched. The guards became agitated.

Luay Sadek, a business management student who is a Shiite, heard yelling near the gate and moved closer to see what was happening. As he did, the bomb detonated, sending shrapnel and flames across the campus. Sadek saw a wall of fire and the bodies of guards and classmates flying into the air. "Those are the same people I talk to every day," said Sadek, who woke up in Imam Ali Hospital after having lost consciousness.

The words of the wounded underscored the despair and bewilderment of both Sunni and Shiite students as their attempts to do something as routine as take midterms were upended by sectarian and ideological extremism.

"The last thing I expected was that students would be attacked, especially because we are in the middle of a residential area," said Saad Abdalla, a Sunni economics student, who suffered burns and shrapnel wounds to his head. "We felt safe, especially after the application of the new security plan."

Evidence of the blast's ferocity could even be found in tree branches, where a woman's scarf fluttered in the afternoon breeze. Some victims' body parts landed in nearby shops. Sobbing survivors clung to one another and used their clothing to mop up blood in the courtyard, which was littered with shredded notebooks and shoes. At least 55 people were wounded.

"What was really painful to me is seeing the female students' bodies torn apart and thrown here and there," said Ismaeel Ubaidi, who owns a small market about 300 feet from the campus gate. Ubaidi said students had been clustered in small groups when the "indescribable detonation" shattered the calm.

Most of the victims were young women because the female students' line was far longer than the men's, said student Muaataz Jawad, explaining that it had taken longer to check the women because of their purses.

"There were bodies scattered in pools of blood near the gate," said Jawad, a Shiite accounting major who just 10 minutes before the blast had been joking with guards at the gate. After the bombing, Jawad rushed to check on them, but they had died, their bodies so mutilated he could barely recognize them.

"I saw female students weeping and wailing for the friends they lost and male students who cried harder. This is the first time I see men cry like this," he said. "I prayed to God that either he lift this ordeal or take my soul. It was really painful seeing all this chaos."

Iraqi police confirmed witness accounts that the bomber was a woman.

Despite two consecutive days of bloodshed — a bomb in a village west of Baghdad on Saturday killed at least 37 Iraqis — the Iraqi government insisted that the security plan was working, albeit gradually.

"We have got a reduction in violence. And we have got a huge, considerable reduction in the execution-style killings," Iraq's national security advisor, Mowaffak Rubaie, said on CNN. Rubaie was referring to the daily count of bullet-riddled corpses picked up in and around Baghdad, most of them victims of Shiite death squads.

Since the security plan officially began Feb. 13 with the introduction of new checkpoints and thousands more Iraqi and U.S. troops, the number of sectarian executions has averaged less than 20 a day, according to an analysis of morgue and police statistics compiled by The Times. In the weeks before the plan took effect, the average was often more than 30. Police in Baghdad said they found 15 bodies Sunday.

In the northern city of Mosul, however, police said 24 bodies had been found Sunday, a sign of the difficulties security forces are likely to face elsewhere as they concentrate on pacifying Baghdad. Two more bodies, both beheaded, were found in the northern city of Kirkuk.

Rubaie, repeating what U.S. and Iraqi officials have said since the plan was launched, said, "We should look into this plan in terms of months.

"Probably we will see a tangible success or measurable success by Easter time."

But Sadr, in a statement read by an associate, rejected any idea of the plan succeeding and said foreign forces had turned Iraq into "a core for terror."

Sadr's whereabouts remain a mystery. U.S. officials say he fled to Iran before the security plan was launched, but Sadr's associates say he is in Iraq. The cleric has not appeared in public in weeks.

The university bombing came amid a string of smaller attacks across Iraq. Mortar fire and car bombings killed at least three civilians in Baghdad, and a roadside bomb in Kirkuk killed one person.

Also Sunday, the Iraqi government announced that President Jalal Talabani had been flown to Jordan after falling ill with "malaise" as a result of overwork. A brief statement from Talabani's office said that doctors had recommended additional tests but that there was no cause for concern.

U.S. officials said the military had killed two suspected terrorists and captured a senior Al Qaeda leader on Sunday during a raid in Mosul. Five other suspected insurgents were also detained in the raid, the military said in a statement.

Fifteen other suspected insurgents were killed during a recent three-day operation in Salman Pak, a volatile area southeast of Baghdad.

Suicide Bomber Strikes Baghdad College; Cleric Condemns U.S-Iraqi Security Sweep (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 26, 2007

BAGHDAD (AP) — A suicide bomber triggered a ball bearing-packed charge Sunday, killing at least 41 people at a mostly Shiite college whose main gate was left littered with blood-soaked student notebooks and papers amid the bodies.

Witnesses said a woman carried out the attack at the business school annex to Mustansiriyah University, but Interior Ministry officials said it was investigating the reports. The school's main campus was hit by a string of bombings last month that killed 70 people.

VIDEO: String of attacks rock Baghdad

The attack came as a powerful Shiite militia leader bitterly complained that "car bombs continue to explode" despite an ongoing security crackdown in Baghdad and suggested he was rethinking his cooperation.

DOJ_NMG_0136064

The statement issued in the name of the radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr put increased strains on the U.S.-Iraqi security sweeps — aimed at restoring order in the capital. The cleric said any crackdown that includes American soldiers was doomed to failure.

Al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia pulled its fighters off the streets under intense government pressure to let the 12-day-old security plan proceed. But a relentless wave of Sunni attacks — six alone in the Baghdad area Sunday — has apparently tested al-Sadr's patience as well as many ordinary Shiites.

A return to the streets by the Mahdi Army forces could effectively block the security effort and raise the chances of Baghdad falling into sectarian street battles — the apparent aim of Sunni extremists seeking any way to destroy the U.S.-backed government.

"Here we are, watching car bombs continue to explode to harvest thousands of innocent lives from our beloved people in the middle of a security plan controlled by an occupier," said a statement read by an al-Sadr aide in Baghdad.

Al-Sadr — who has not appeared in public in more than a month — is no friend of Washington and his forces fought fierce battles with U.S. troops in 2004. But he has largely cooperated in the Iraqi political process to avoid strains with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the Shiite leadership.

The statement, however, was highly critical of the U.S. role in the security plan and urged leaders to "make your own Iraqi (security) plans." He said "no security plan will work" with direct U.S. involvement.

The statement — read to hundreds of cheering supporters — was the first public word from the al-Sadr since U.S. assertions earlier this month that he fled to neighboring Iran to avoid arrest. Al-Sadr's aides and other loyalists insist he never left Iraq.

The political situation in Iraq was further thrown into question after President Jalal Talabani, a 73-year-old Kurd, was taken to Jordan for medical tests after feeling ill, his office said. It added there was "no cause for worry," but gave no other details.

Shiite anger at the United States is running high since American soldiers on Friday detained the son of the most powerful Shiite political leader for nearly 12 hours after he crossed from Iran. U.S. officials claim Shiite groups, including the Mahdi Army, receive weapons and aid from Iran. Iran denies the charges.

"To my Shiite and Sunni brothers, I say, 'Let us scorn sectarianism and hoist the banner of unity,'" said the statement from al-Sadr, whose militia is blamed for frequent execution-style slayings of Sunni rivals.

Since the security crackdown began, the number of bodies thought to be victims of Shiite death squads has gone down dramatically in Baghdad, but there has been no respite from violence blamed on Sunni insurgents.

Besides the college blast, at least 18 people were killed — mostly in Shiite districts — in bombings and rocket attacks in the Baghdad area.

Security guards at the Mustansiriyah University annex scuffled with the bomber before the blast, witnesses said. Most of the victims were students, including at least 46 injured, said police

If the bomber is found to be woman it would unusual — but not unprecedented — in Iraq's chaos. The main campus at Mustansiriyah, about 1½ miles away, was the target of twin car bombs and a suicide blast last month that killed 70 people.

The students at the business college were returning to midterm exams after the Iraqi weekend.

A 22-year-old student, Muhanad Nasir, said he saw a commotion at the gate. "Then there was an explosion. I did not feel anything for 15 minutes and when I returned to consciousness, I found myself in the hospital," said Nasir, wounded in the head and chest.

The blast flung blood-soaked notebooks and backpacks among the lifeless bodies and wounded. Cement walls were pockmarked by the hail of ball bearings. Parents rushed to the site and some collapsed in tears after learning their children were killed or injured. Students used rags and towels to try to mop up the blood.

The school is located in a mostly Shiite district of northeast Baghdad, but does not limit enrollment to that group.

In the northern city of Mosul, U.S. troops killed two gunmen in a raid and captured a suspected local leader of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq, the military said. Additional details were no immediately available.

Iraq's Interior Ministry, meanwhile, raised the toll from a suicide truck bombing in the violence-wracked Anbar province on Saturday to 52 dead and 74 injured.

The attack on worshippers leaving a mosque in Habbaniyah, about 50 miles west of Baghdad, was believed linked to escalating internal Sunni battles between insurgents and those who oppose them.

"This cowardly act of violence underscores that the terrorists are the enemies of all Iraqis, regardless of sect," the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, said in a statement. "They want Iraq to fail. Now is the time for the Iraqis to come together against these terrorists."

Al-Sadr Calls Crackdown A Failure After College Bombing (AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, February 26, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A suicide attacker struck outside a college campus, killing at least 41 persons and prompting the leader of Iraq's biggest Shi'ite militia to complain that a U.S.-led security crackdown has failed to protect Iraqis.

Many Shi'ites think bombings have continued because the Shi'ite-led government bowed to American pressure and persuaded the radical cleric Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr to take his Mahdi's Army fighters off the streets.

Sheik al-Sadr's statement, read to his followers in Sadr City, is likely to add pressure on U.S. and Iraqi forces to show results in the nearly two-week-old crackdown.

"I'm certain, just like all oppressed Iraqis are certain, that no security plan will work, and no good will come of any occupier," Sheik al-Sadr said in the statement.

"Here we are, watching booby-trapped cars exploding to harvest thousands of innocent lives from our beloved people in the middle of a security plan that is controlled by an occupier who does as he pleases."

U.S. and Iraqi leaders have urged the public to be patient, warning that it will take months before the security operation shows results. President Bush has ordered 21,500 more U.S. troops to Baghdad and surrounding areas, although the last units are not due until May.

Sheik al-Sadr urged Iraq's mostly Shi'ite security forces to "make your own Iraqi plans independent of the Americans."

Most of the victims of yesterday's bombing were students at the college, a business-studies annex of Mustansiriyah University that was hit by a series of deadly explosions last month. At least 46 persons were injured in yesterday's blast.

The attacker detonated a bomb-rigged suicide belt near the main entrance to the college, where students were resuming midterm exams after the two-day weekend in Iraq. Police said that guards confronted the bomber as he tried to enter the college grounds.

A 22-year-old student, Muhanad Nasir, said he saw a commotion at the gate. "Then there was an explosion. I did not feel anything for 15 minutes and when I returned to consciousness, I found myself in the hospital," said Mr. Nasir, who was wounded in his head and chest.

The blast left cement walls pockmarked by shrapnel and twisted parts of the metal gate and turnstile. Parents rushed to the site and some collapsed in tears after learning their children were killed or injured. Students used rags and towels to try to mop up the blood.

The school is in a mostly Shi'ite district of northeast Baghdad, but it does not limit its enrollment to that group. The main campus of Mustansiriyah University, about 1? miles away, was the target of twin car bombs and a suicide blast last month that killed 70 persons.

Earlier, two Katyusha rockets hit a Shi'ite enclave in southern Baghdad, killing at least 10, and a bomb near the fortified Green Zone claimed two lives, police said.

The Green Zone houses the U.S. and British embassies and key Iraqi government offices. The blast was about 100 yards from the Iranian Embassy, but authorities did not think it was targeting the compound.

A separate car bombing in a Shi'ite district in central Baghdad killed at least one person and injured four, police said.

In the northern city of Mosul, U.S. troops killed two gunmen in a raid and captured a suspected local leader of the insurgent group al Qaeda in Iraq, the military said. Additional details were not immediately available.

Iraq's Interior Ministry, meanwhile, raised the toll from a suicide truck bombing in the violence-wracked Anbar province on Saturday to 52 dead and 74 injured.

The attack on worshippers leaving a mosque in Habbaniyah, about 50 miles west of Baghdad, was thought to be linked to escalating internal Sunni battles between insurgents and those who oppose them.

U.S. military envoys and pro-government leaders have worked hard to sway clan chiefs and other influential Anbar figures to turn against the militants, who include foreigners fighting under the banner of al Qaeda in Iraq. The extremists have fought back with targeted killings and bombings against fellow Sunnis.

Al-Sadr Won't Back Security Operation, Statement Says (USAT)

USA Today, February 26, 2007

BAGHDAD — According to a statement attributed to Muqtada al-Sadr, the radical Iraqi Shiite cleric has withdrawn support for a security crackdown in Baghdad.

The statement came Sunday, hours after a suicide bomber wearing a vest packed with explosives killed 41 at a college.

The security operation will not work because U.S. forces are involved, according to the statement, which was read by Shiite cleric Abdulzahra al-Suweidi.

"There is no benefit in this security plan because it is controlled by the occupiers," al-Suweidi read in front of throngs of chanting supporters in al-Sadr's stronghold of Sadr City. The United States "is watching car bombs explode, taking the souls of thousands of innocent Iraqi people."

Al-Sadr has not been seen in public for more than a month. The cleric led his Mahdi Army militia in two uprisings against U.S. forces in 2004. His militia has avoided confrontation with U.S. forces this time. There was no indication in the statement that this position would change.

Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki expressed optimism Saturday about the U.S.-backed offensive, which is an attempt to stave off a full-out civil war in Iraq.

At least 41 people were killed when a suicide bomber triggered a ball-bearing-packed charge at the Baghdad Economy and Administration College. At least 46 were wounded. Most of the victims were students.

A string of car bombings and rockets also hit Baghdad on Sunday as U.S. and Iraqi security forces stepped up efforts to stamp out Sunni-Shiite sectarian bloodshed.

In other news:

•Iraqi national security adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie told CNN that Iranians had stopped training and providing weapons to Iraqi Shiite militants to give the security plan a chance to work.

"They have changed their position and stopped a lot of their tactics and interference in Iraq's internal affairs," al-Rubaie said Sunday. It was unclear whether he was referring to Iran's government or other Iranians.

•Iraqi President Jalal Talabani arrived in Jordan late Sunday for a medical checkup after he became ill and was rushed unconscious to a hospital, Iraqi Ambassador Saad al-Hayyani said.

Talabani's son Qubad said his father suffered from exhaustion.

"He did not have a heart attack" or a stroke, he told CNN. Qubad Talabani said his father "made his own way off the plane" when he landed in Jordan.

•Thousands of Shiites protested Saturday in Baghdad after U.S. soldiers on Friday detained Amar al-Hakim, the son of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, a Shiite political leader. The son was taken into custody after he crossed from Iran.

•A suicide truck bombing in Anbar province killed 52 and injured 74 Saturday. The attack targeted worshipers leaving a Sunni mosque in Habaniyah, about 50 miles west of Baghdad.

"Now is the time for the Iraqis to come together against these terrorists," the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, said in a statement.

A doctor said Talabani was being treated at the heart center at King Hussein Medical City in Amman because the facility has modern equipment, not necessarily because the president suffers from a heart ailment.

The president's son said he was "up and about" and able to communicate.

Under Iraq's constitution, the president serves as the country's titular head of state. The prime minister runs the government.

Iraqi PM Blames Al-Qaeda For Sunni Mosque Attack (AFP)

AFP, February 26, 2007

Iraq's Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki on Sunday blamed Al-Qaeda for a deadly bomb attack on a Sunni mosque, saying the blast proved that "terrorists" will attack anyone, regardless of their sect.

A suicide tanker bomb exploded outside a mosque in the western town of Habbaniyah on Saturday as worshippers were leaving, killing at least 40 people and wounding more than 60, a local medical official said.

"Al-Qaeda committed a new terrible massacre resulting in the deaths of dozens of civilians as they finished prayers at a mosque in Habbaniyah," Maliki said in a statement released by his office.

"They don't value holy prayer nor worshippers nor even a mosque," he added.

Habbaniyah is a small town in the so-called "Sunni triangle", lying 80 kilometres (50 miles) due west of Baghdad, where tribal chiefs have vowed to fight Al-Qaeda, a Sunni-led militant group.

Suicide bomb attacks on civilian targets have become a hallmark of Sunni extremist assaults on Iraq's Shiite majority, and it is relatively unusual for such a strike to target Sunni worshippers.

Maliki was at pains to stress that the attack should not be seen as sectarian in nature.

"(Al-Qaeda) is targetting all Iraqis without exception," he said. "They are using a cover of sectarianism to assassinate the people... and to increase sectarian strife in society."

"We strongly condemn this terrible crime which shows how low (Al-Qaeda) can sink," he said, urging people of Anbar province to back "the national effort by our security forces who are chasing the terrorists criminals."

New Iraqi Troops Fly Into Baghdad (AP)

By Kim Gamel,

AP, February 26, 2007

About 130 fresh Iraqi troops from the country's Kurdish north flew into Baghdad on Sunday to join the fight for the nation's capital — with the promise of a $200 bonus, nearly a month's pay.

The mostly Kurdish soldiers — the first to arrive from the northern city of Irbil — were greeted by Iraqi commanders as they filed off the gray C-130 troop transport. They wore camouflage, with machine guns or rocket-propelled grenade launchers slung over their shoulders. Many carried belongings in plastic bags.

DOJ_NMG_0136069

The troops represented a fraction of the expected influx of some 8,000 Iraqi reinforcements from the north, the Shiite south and the insurgent stronghold of Anbar province west of Baghdad.

The drafting of troops from the north — most former Kurdish guerrillas who fought for decades against Saddam Hussein's regime — to participate in the security crackdown in the capital has raised concerns as many speak no Arabic and are unfamiliar with the territory and urban warfare.

Many Kurds also refused to leave their autonomous region to fight in far-off Baghdad.

But Lt. Gen. Ali Ghadan, Iraq's ground forces commander, said the Kurds and other troops coming from outside Baghdad had a powerful incentive. Each would receive a $200 bonus in addition to their regular salaries and would only be deployed for three months, then allowed to go home.

The minimum salary for Iraqi soldiers is nearly $300 per month, although some get food allowances, according to the Defense Ministry.

Ghadan said the troops would get another bonus of the same amount if they signed on for another tour after their first deployment.

The bonuses underscore the eagerness of the Iraqi government to show it can rally sufficient forces to allow it to take the lead in the security sweep aimed at clearing the capital of Sunni insurgents and local Shiite militias who have killed thousands in rising violence between the two Islamic sects.

The inability of the Shiite-led government to deliver the promised number of Iraqi forces has been partly blamed for the failure of two previous security operations in Baghdad. President Bush has promised to send 21,500 more American troops to Iraq for the current effort.

Gen. Babaker Shawkat Zebari, the army chief of staff, stressed unity in the armed forces, addressing concerns the Kurdish troops might resent being called to Baghdad because they feel more loyalty to their homeland.

"Baghdad is a beautiful city that desperately needs your help," Zebari, himself a Kurd, said in Arabic after welcoming the troops in Kurdish. "If the terrorists are defeated here, all of Iraq will get back on its feet."

A brigade from Sulaimaniyah, also in the Kurdish north, has reached Baghdad, but it is only 1,000-men strong, not the expected 3,000.

Capt. Amir Wali, a 29-year-old former Kurdish guerrilla who has been integrated into the army, agreed. "I was glad to come here," he told reporters after the ceremony. "We came to defend Baghdad against terrorists."

The Iraqi troops were the first to be brought to the capital in an aircraft piloted by Iraqis, the military said, touting it as a sign the Iraqis are making strides toward taking over their own security.

"Instead of depending on the friendly forces to move such units, now the transportation is done by Iraqi planes. This is a historic event," Ghadan said.

Afghanistan: Taliban Preps For Bloody Assault (NSWK)

By Sami Yousafzai And Ron Moreau

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

There's no mistaking the thrill in Ghul Agha Akhund's voice. The Taliban field commander, speaking by mobile phone from his redoubt in Afghanistan's Helmand province, says the militants' covert network of couriers has brought him a vital message. It's a dark photocopy of a handwritten note, just seven lines to congratulate the group's fighting forces on "getting even with the infidel invaders" last year and to urge them to launch "a more intensive jihad" this year. But Ghul Agha views the scrap of paper as an almost sacred artifact: it bears the signature of the Taliban's Supreme Leader, Mullah Mohammed Omar. "This message from our leader is like tonic medicine," the chieftain says. "It makes us stronger."

In fact, he's doubly excited. This is the second communication he's gotten from Mullah Omar this year—after not one word since the U.S.-led 2001 invasion. (Although not all the information in this report can be independently verified, it came from sources who have proved reliable in the past, and the details are consistent with the established facts.) This January, Ghul Agha received an audiocassette of Mullah Omar praising the virtue of self-sacrifice. "Carry out your Islamic responsibilities as I carry out mine," the officer quotes the tape as saying. "Don't look for promotions or benefits. Just serve the jihad." The message electrified Ghul Agha. "For the last few years, we heard only rumors about Mullah Omar," he says. "Now we hear from him directly!" The commander and his men are energetically preparing to launch an offensive as soon as the snow melts; he hopes this year they will cut off the provincial capital.

Mullah Omar has emerged from the shadows, his field officers say, and with his inspiration they're planning a military push against U.S.-led forces like never before. NEWSWEEK has viewed a new recruiting video in which the Taliban's most notoriously cruel commander, the one-legged Mullah Dadullah Akhund, addresses an audience of some 400 men who are described as trained suicide bombers, ready to die on his order. "Our suicide bombers are countless," he says in a videotaped response to questions from NEWSWEEK. "Hundreds have already registered their names, and hundreds more are on the waiting list." Those claims, while impossible to verify, can't be discounted, either. In an interview that aired on Al-Jazeera last week, Dadullah claimed to have more than 6,000 armed guerrillas in underground hideouts and other staging areas, awaiting the moment to strike. "The attack is imminent," he told the Arabic TV channel.

Western forces are certainly bracing for one. Thousands of reinforcements have deployed to Afghanistan, bringing the Coalition's total armed strength to nearly 50,000, including 15,500 Americans in NATO's ranks and 11,000 others under direct U.S. command. NATO's chief spokes-man in Kabul, Col. Tom Collins, says his force intends to head off the militants' assault with pre-emptive attacks against Taliban strongholds and sanctuaries in Helmand and Uruzgan provinces. The Coalition, with its enormous superiority in firepower, sees no way the Taliban can capture and hold any significant target. "They may hold a small place for days," Collins allows, "but they'll get run out at a high cost." An estimated 3,000 Taliban fighters died in last year's engagements alone. But replacing those losses has been easy—thanks largely to the 47-year-old Mullah Omar.

To Westerners his appeal all but defies explanation. He was always an unprepossessing figure, even during the late 1990s, when he and his followers ruled most of Afghanistan. He seldom gave speeches on the radio, let alone in public, and he traveled out of his home province, Kandahar, to visit Kabul only once. Those who have met him describe him as a seemingly humble—though intelligent—village preacher, shy, inarticulate and utterly lacking in charisma. His manner is awkward, even childlike at times. In the 1980s he enlisted in the fight against the Soviet occupation, which cost him his right eye in a 1989 rocket attack and kept him from completing his religious education. As a result he has always called himself a talib, a "seeker of knowledge"—and his followers became known as the Taliban.

The group's recruiters owe much of their continued success to his saintly reputation. To his followers, Omar stands in bold contrast to the corrupt thugs who have returned to control many parts of Afghanistan and to the foreign-influenced Kabul government. In 1994 Mullah Omar rose to prominence by organizing the Taliban as a vigilante force to fight warlords who had been kidnapping, raping and strong-arming the civilians of Kandahar ever since the Soviets left. While local leaders are nowhere near as rapacious as they once were, villagers complain of some of the same sleazy behavior—crime, corruption, immorality. Omar, by contrast, "looks at things in black and white. There is no middle ground for him," says Rahimullah Yusufzai, a Peshawar-based journalist and expert on the Taliban. "No one has ever found fault with his Islamic character," says Nek Mohammed, one of Omar's former aides.

The Supreme Leader probably never knew what his guest Osama bin Laden was planning in 2001. All the same, Omar rejected America's demand after September 11 that he hand over the Qaeda leader—even though that refusal led directly to the U.S. invasion. "That principled decision enhanced his position among his followers," says Yusufzai. "But to others it shows he's simply stupid and too rigid."

After the Taliban's fall, Omar effectively vanished. His whereabouts were a mystery to everyone including his three wives and nine children, who heard nothing from him even indirectly for a solid year, according to Zabibullah, a senior Taliban official. (Last year one of the wives finally rejoined Omar at his present hideout, Zabibullah says.) Still, Omar did not quit the jihad. As his men regrouped, he gradually emerged from hiding and in 2004 began traveling from camp to camp in remote Taliban-held areas, riding on the back of a motorbike to rally his old troops and recruit new ones. One of the reasons he was able to avoid capture was that few people aside from his close followers know his face. He has always refused to let anyone take his picture, citing Islamic strictures against creating idols. Photos identified as Mullah Omar have circulated in recent years, but the clearest shots proved to be hoaxes or cases of mistaken identity.

Only a few trusted assistants know where the fugitive leader is now. U.S. officials refuse to discuss what they know of his whereabouts and actions, beyond admitting that he's still in charge. "The hard-core Taliban leadership is Mullah Omar and his 27 to 30 subcommanders," says Collins. Afghan President Hamid Karzai has repeatedly charged that Omar is holed up in the Pakistan city of Quetta, protected by Pakistan's military spy agency, Inter-Services Intelligence. That claim was backed up (probably under duress) by Mohammad Hanafi, a reputed Taliban spokesman, after his capture by Afghan forces last month.

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf denies the allegation, calling Karzai "ignorant" of what's happening inside Afghanistan. Taliban commanders and political operatives, who admit to frequently visiting Pakistan themselves, agree with Musharraf. "Baseless lies," Dadullah told NEWSWEEK. "He is not there [in Pakistan] in any city." Dadullah and others say they believe he's safely ensconced deep in the remote and rugged mountains of Uruzgan province, where he once lived.

Wherever he's hidden, Omar is closer than ever to many of his followers—not only to long-neglected fighters like Ghul Agha, but even to members of the Taliban's ruling council, the Shura. In the past, according to Mullah Rahman, the group's deputy commander in Zabul province, it could take six weeks for senior Taliban officials to send a message to the leader and get a reply. Now, thanks to the Taliban's military gains and growing network of messengers and mobile phones, the Shura can send Omar a question and get his answer within 24 hours. The leader communicates only via two top aides: former Defense minister Mullah Obaidullah and Mullah Barader, an old friend and one of the first mullahs to join the fledgling Taliban in 1994. Even those two do not see him face to face, instead passing messages by word of mouth, audiotape or handwritten notes. They relay Omar's directives and pep talks to the appropriate Shura members, who in turn disseminate them through the chain of command.

The Supreme Leader tends to focus on moral questions, leaving most military and financial matters to his deputies. His recent communiqués assert that Afghans have a duty under Islam to fight the foreign "invaders" and their "puppets" in Kabul because they will not leave Afghanistan "peacefully." At the same time, he urges his fighters to spare the lives of Afghans who have no part in the conflict. Last year's epidemic of suicide bombings killed more than two dozen foreign troops, but also killed and maimed hundreds of Afghan civilians. "Avoid operations that cause death and injury to innocent people," Omar said in a message marking the end of Ramadan this past December. "We are obliged to target only our enemy."

His word is law—or so his followers say. "No one can or dares to challenge Mullah Omar," says Zabibullah. Last year, for example, he dismissed his Ghazni province commander for "selfishness." And yet not every order is followed. Suicide bombings have continued to rock Kandahar. Dadullah says such attacks are no more than a prelude to bigger things soon to come. "With new war tactics, we possibly will get control of a provincial capital," he told NEWSWEEK. Commander Momin Ahmed, a heavy-set Taliban subcommander in Ghazni province, says provincial commanders have been promised detachments of 30 suicide bombers apiece from the batches of new recruits.

Most Coalition officers shrug at such threats. The militants suffered horrendous casualties last year while failing to stop the spread of NATO control into southern Afghanistan. In a single battle last September for the village of Panjwayi in Kandahar, the Taliban lost more than 500 men. At the same time, Afghan civilians are heartily fed up with all parties. They despise the Karzai government's weakness and corruption; they blame the Coalition for the collateral damage caused by its massive firepower; they don't want Mullah Omar's lightning-rod fighting forces anywhere near their homes. The guerrillas have little to no chance of ever regaining power though force of arms. What they do have in abundance is stubbornness—just like their leader, Mullah Omar. "We respect him even more than we did five years ago," says Ghul Agha. "He refuses to give up, no matter what the odds." That's not the message most Afghan civilians want to hear.

Iraq President Falls Ill, Flies To Amman (AP)

By Shafika Mattar

AP, February 26, 2007

AMMAN, Jordan (AP) - Iraqi President Jalal Talabani fell ill Sunday and was rushed unconscious to a hospital before being flown to neighboring Jordan for an immediate medical checkup, medical and government officials said.

A brief statement issued by Talabani's office said the 73-year-old president had fallen ill because of "continuing hard work over the past few days," but added there was "no cause for worry."

DOJ_NMG_0136072

Iraq's ambassador to Jordan, Saad al-Hayyani, said Talabani had not suffered a stroke or a heart attack. He said he suffered from "general fatigue and exhaustion and he needs medical examination to determine what is causing that."

A doctor at Amman's King Hussein Medical City said Talabani would be admitted to the heart center at the facility. Several Arab leaders have been treated at the military hospital in the past, including the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

He said Talabani would be checked into the heart center because the facility has sophisticated and modern equipment to check the president's condition, not because he necessarily suffers from a heart ailment.

"It appears that his medical condition is not worrisome" because he is not being flown in by a helicopter or transported in an ambulance, the doctor said on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to speak to the media. "He is being driven by a car from Amman airport to the hospital, escorted by his private physician."

A doctor in Sulaimaniyah, Talabani's hometown, told The Associated Press that the president was unconscious when an ambulance rushed him to a hospital there earlier Sunday.

"After his condition stabilized, the doctors advised him to go to Jordan for a complete check up," the doctor said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information.

Talabani, a Kurd, appeared in public Saturday in Sulaimaniyah where he met with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Massoud Barzani, leader of the self-ruled Kurdish region in northern Iraq.

Senior Kurdish politician Barham Saleh said Talabani was on his feet when he headed for a meeting Sunday with top aides shortly before he left for Jordan. Saleh, a deputy prime minister, said members of Talabani's immediate family accompanied him to Amman.

An official at Talabani's Patriotic Union of Kurdistan party said the president has a long history of fainting when he is exhausted - a condition dating back to his years as a Kurdish guerrilla leader fighting Saddam Hussein's regime decades ago.

The official also spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject.

Baghdad Plan Has Elusive Targets (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

BAGHDAD -- The engineer stood aside as Iraqi and American soldiers rifled through his daughter's wardrobe and peered under her bed. He did not mind when they confiscated the second clip for his AK-47, because he knew it could be easily replaced. He demurred when asked about insurgent activity in the neighborhood, afraid to be stamped an informant and driven from his home of 14 years. Face to face with the Baghdad security plan, it seemed to him a bit absurd.

"Obviously, the soldiers lack the necessary information about where to look and who to look for," said the government engineer, who declined to give his name in an interview during a sweep through his western Baghdad neighborhood last Monday. "There are too many houses and too many hide-outs."

American military commanders in Iraq describe the security plan they began implementing in mid-February as a rising tide: a gradual influx of thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops whose extended presence in the city's violent neighborhoods will drown the militants' ability to stage bombings and sectarian killings. The first brigade of 2,700 American reinforcements is patrolling the capital, bringing the total U.S. troop presence in Baghdad to 40,000, and members of three additional Iraqi military brigades have entered the city, though not at full strength. Soldiers have opened 14 of the estimated 30 joint policing stations they will operate in the capital.

But U.S. troops, Iraqi soldiers and officials, and Baghdad residents say the plan is hampered because security forces cannot identify, let alone apprehend, the elusive perpetrators of the violence. Shiite militiamen in the capital say they are keeping a low profile to wait out the security plan. U.S. commanders have noted increased insurgent violence in the Sunni-dominated belt around Baghdad and are concerned that fighters are shifting their focus outside the city.

Military patrols frequently push into neighborhoods where they have been shot at or struck with improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, only to find no one to arrest.

"I don't know who I'm fighting most of the time," said Staff Sgt. Joseph Lopez, 39, a soldier based in the northern outskirts of the capital. "I don't know who is setting what IED."

DOJ_NMG_0136073

Many people in Baghdad express deep reservations about the Iraqi security forces' ability and desire to battle their fellow citizens. U.S. soldiers say their Iraqi counterparts are swayed more by the anti-American speeches of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr than by the public appeals of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki for even-handed enforcement.

On the streets of the capital, it is impossible to miss the increased military presence. Iraqi police pickups speed down the avenues, sirens wailing, as masked officers fire machine guns to clear their path. Iraqi army soldiers and policemen stand sentry at checkpoint after checkpoint, but more often than not allow cars to pass through without inspection.

"They're just standing and waving at the cars," said Sgt. Haider Hasim, 20, a member of the Iraqi National Guard's 1st Brigade, 2nd Regiment of the 6th Division, who patrols the western Baghdad neighborhood of Amiriyah. "They won't take weapons from their friends."

Commandos and policemen from the predominantly Shiite Interior Ministry have little desire to raid or arrest members of their own sect or residents from their home neighborhoods, said Hasim, whose father is Sunni and mother is Shiite. From what he has seen, the Iraqi soldiers brought in for the security plan are accomplishing little.

"They're doing nothing, they're just sleeping at the camps," he said. "We do not go out if the Americans are not with us."

For the Americans, the security plan depends heavily on pushing along the Iraqi security forces. The so-called joint security stations envisioned under the plan are intended not only to generate intelligence about insurgents and militias but also to bring together Iraqi military and police personnel, who often fail to communicate, as well as U.S. troops. The stations will be scattered throughout the city's 10 newly designated security districts. The plan originally divided the city into nine sectors, but one was split in two.

Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman, said that although part of the stations' function is to encourage Iraqis to visit, their locations would not be disclosed because of concern within the Iraqi government that such information would facilitate attacks.

Under the security plan, the Iraqi government has granted itself broad powers to impose martial law. Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar, the Iraqi commander of the effort, said in a speech last week that the government could hold and search individuals "whenever deemed fit." The government can disperse any public gatherings, inspect any public or private property, and "search, control, and seize all parcel post, mail, telegraphs, communication devices as needed," Gambar said.

To prevent car bomb attacks in Baghdad, the U.S. military has adopted a "city manager" approach, looking at "where all the different marketplaces were, the ingress-egress routes, the side roads, the traffic pattern flows," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell told reporters in a briefing last week. But he also acknowledged that as security forces focus on threats from vehicles, insurgents have been shifting tactics, increasingly deploying suicide bombers wearing explosive vests.

Some of the 21,500 additional troops President Bush is sending to Iraq have arrived. Top U.S. commanders are considering sending at least one of the five new brigades to the outskirts of the city and another to Diyala province, which this month has become increasingly deadly for U.S. soldiers.

"This is the very start, and it's too early to make any determinations at all on whether it's working, not working, what effect it's had," said a senior U.S. defense official in Baghdad who spoke on condition of anonymity. "We just don't have all the forces on the ground yet. People are looking for this big D-Day event and it's not going to happen."

Two days after the plan's official start on Feb. 14, Maliki, the prime minister, hailed its "fabulous success." Two days later, a double car bomb attack along a commercial strip in New Baghdad killed more than 60 people. A week after the plan's launch, a truck bomb rigged with tanks of chlorine gas blew up in southern Baghdad, killing seven people. It was among at least three attacks that involved chlorine gas in the past month. U.S. officials warned that it was a new insurgent tactic designed to sow panic and incite further sectarian violence.

At the end of the first week of the security crackdown, Caldwell announced, without providing statistics, a "very significant" decrease in such sectarian violence, while cautioning that it was premature to judge the plan's success.

Death tolls in February provided by an official at the Baghdad morgue, who is not authorized to speak publicly, appear to support Caldwell's statement. The official said that from Feb. 1 to Feb. 13, the bodies of 806 people who died as a result of violence were brought to the morgue, including 211 unidentified bodies, many of them bound, shot and showing signs of torture. Over the next nine days, 244 bodies were brought in, among them 58 unidentified corpses.

But there is still a bunker mentality among residents of the capital, who are afraid to venture out for any but the most necessary errands. The owner of a deserted fabric shop in Baghdad's Zayuna neighborhood, Manaf Ali, said his children continue to attend school only once a week because he is afraid for their lives. A goldsmith working next door at al-Faiq shopping center, Haider Mohammed, 31, sleeps on the floor of an unfurnished apartment close to his shop rather than travel to work from his embattled Sunni neighborhood of Adhamiyah. Both men carry guns.

"How can we notice any change in the streets? We are just like chickens, staying in our cages," Mohammed said. "I am a goldsmith. What am I doing carrying a gun?"

To Ali, 41, there are only small signs of increased order. He welcomes the presence of more soldiers on the streets, and sees fewer Shiite militiamen. "Thank God now the mass abductions and the militias seem to be slowing down, and we are only left with the suicide bombs and car bombs," he said.

Along Palestine Street, a once vibrant commercial district, shop owners were relieved not by the greater military presence, but by the absence of Mahdi Army militiamen from neighboring Sadr City, the impoverished Shiite district and militia stronghold. The owner of a photography studio, a Sunni, pulled from his wallet a receipt for the "tax" that militiamen extract from merchants for their protection. Another merchant said he, too, faced extortion, which costs the equivalent of $30 a month. This month, the "savages" have not been around to collect, said the studio owner, who would not allow his name to be published.

"There needs to be raids against the militias, and not only in Sadr City," said Ahmed Abdul Rahman, 29, who works in an art gallery on Palestine Street. "Until then, this is not real."

Backstory: US Marines 'Invade' The Pop Tucci Diner (CSM)

By Bill Sasser

The Christian Science Monitor, February 26, 2007

After a frigid night camped under pine trees at an airfield, the convoy of 20 US Marines rolled into this sleepy town just as businesses were opening. The rumble of their Humvees unnerved some local residents. Even more jarring was the sight of the soldiers leaping from their vehicles with weapons.

In the parking lot of the Zion Lodge, a marine scanned the quiet street from behind a .50-caliber machine gun. One elderly man seemed shaken at the sight of marines striding into the Realo drugstore.

Yet this was no hostile invasion. As final preparation for a one-year deployment in Iraq, a US Marine unit recently brought the war home to tiny Trenton, N.C. (pop. 240), and the nearby coastal towns of Pollocksville and Maysville with a three-day training exercise. It was camouflage meets denim, Kevlar helmets meet Tar Heel caps, war-gaming meets the Pop Tucci diner.

It was also significant. The 5th Battalion, 10th Marine Regiment is unusual – the first active-duty unit in the Marine Corps to retrain for civil affairs work in Iraq. That means the 250 soldiers in the group will be departing from their frontline combat role to help Iraqis rebuild their cities and neighborhoods.

The 5/10's six-month retraining has included study of Arabic and the Iraqi culture. The unit will be important in determining whether the US's latest – and perhaps final – initiative in Iraq works. Under the new command of Gen. David Petraeus, US forces in Iraq will be trying to secure, hold, and then help stabilize and reconstruct embattled neighborhoods. Units like the 5/10 will be instrumental in gaining the confidence of local residents and acting as intermediaries between combat troops and civilians, particularly as the US tries to shift more security and reconstruction functions to the Iraqis.

"Our mission is to bridge the gap between a local population and the local military command, to say, 'Hey, sir, if you want to blow up that water tower, you can do it, but you're going to leave X amount of people without water," said Capt. Jim Burgess, who is leading a team of 10 marines and a Navy corpsman in the exercise here. "There are some civil issues you need to take into consideration."

The transition isn't easy for marines, who are trained to kill the enemy rather than engage in the softer skills of negotiation – say, quizzing local residents about their sewer system. "Some of these marines would rather be out on an artillery range pulling a lanyard, so it's important to get them out of their comfort zones preparing for this mission," said Maj. Andrew Dietz, who commanded one of the three training detachments.

While the soldiers were learning new skills, local residents were discovering a few things about Marine training and the rigors of war. The troops were generally greeted as heroes after the initial shock of seeing marines standing guard by doorways and patrolling downtown sidewalks with their M-16s, which weren't loaded.

"We're talking to town leaders to find out what they do and engaging in foot patrols to get to know the locals," said Captain Burgess. "Some are looking at us like, 'Hey, what are you guys doing here?' "

Later that morning, Glen Spivey sat down with a second civil affairs team at Pop Tucci's restaurant. "You get such a mix of emotions when you see them," said waitress Marti Rouse. "The first time they walked in it sort of took us all back, then we got used to having them all here. You're proud of them, and then you worry about where they're going, and now I'm sorry to see them go."

A woman having an early lunch exchanged a knowing glance with her friends as she changed seats for a better view of the men in uniform. "Don't you feel safe?" she asked.

Mr. Spivey explained the mechanics of the town sewer system, which he directs, and the volunteer fire department, which he has belonged to for 46 years. "I was glad to do anything I could to help them prepare for the job they have ahead," said Spivey, who is also commander of the local American Legion post. "I was impressed with the way they rolled in and did these interviews and tried to learn how the systems work."

Maj. Leland Suttee, commander of one of the detachments, said the transition to civil affairs has come with growing pains. "Every marine is trained as a rifleman first, and it's easy for us in an artillery unit to be good at that," he said. "It's easy to go kick down a door, and marines love that, so this is actually much harder for them."

While there's a huge difference between Al Anbar Province and Jones County, N.C., the goal of the exercise was to show marines what a well-run, fully functioning local government looks like. "They will know what the goal is when they go into Fallujah or Ramadi," Major Suttee said. "In Ramadi, we have a burgeoning city government. We need to be able to go in and show them how to take funding from the provincial government, prioritize projects, get contractors to start rebuilding their cities, and get businesses running again."

One morning, 1st Lt. Steven Aguilera and his civil affairs team rolled into Maysville, where they secured the Maysville Milling Co. and interviewed manager James Harper about the business. Mr. Harper, whose father served in the Marine Corps in Korea and for two tours in Vietnam, was born in 1950 at Camp Lejeune, where the 5/10, part of the 2nd Marine Expeditionary Force, is stationed.

Harper's son is also a marine and served during the 2003 invasion of Iraq. "I don't advise any parent watching CNN when their kid is over there, because it will drive you mad," said Harper, an Army veteran himself. "I don't know about this war. This one is hard to figure out, and it would be really hard to have to bury one of your own for it."

Harper explained the basics of operating a mill and some of the social ills of seemingly idyllic Jones County. "We've got a crack epidemic here," he said, pointing to a neighborhood across US Highway 17. "On the weekends during the summer, you can see them set up outside selling it. They have guys riding on bicycles selling it."

Along the tree-lined streets of Trenton, another Marine patrol stopped to introduce themselves to residents and ask who they were, what they do, and what problems they have in town. They passed the Jones County courthouse without a glance at the two war memorials out front, one for a Navy seaman who was killed during World War II, another for Michael Harris Jr., an Army sergeant who died in Saudi Arabia in 1991 during Operation Desert Storm.

Turning down a side street, the patrol parted for a passing pickup truck, apparently driven by another veteran who had emblazoned "68 Viet Nam Vet 69" on the back of his cab. "Check that," one Marine commented.

A moment later, they chatted with a resident walking to her mailbox. "Civil affairs is like customer service – you're out shaking hands, you're trying to be nice to people, and the customer is always right," said Cpl. Jason Talbot.

By lunchtime on the final day of the exercise, most of the marines had exited Trenton. Paula Tucci, who runs Pop Tucci's with her husband, had collected signatures from the arines on a "Pop Tucci's" T-shirt. She pinned the memento on the wall by the front counter.

"It's been a trip having them here this week," she said. "Even though I don't know them, I'm sorry to see them leave."

DOJ_NMG_0136076

At Jones Middle School, a civil affairs team engaged dozens of students with an outdoor display of Marine equipment. LCpl. Joel Vannatta reached down to shake the hand of an awed sixth-grader. "When I first joined the Marines, I knew that going to Iraq was a good possibility," said Corporal Vannatta of Jacksonville, Fla. "I would have been disappointed if I had spent four years in the Marines without going. I want to do something with all this training I have."

Fratricide In Iraq's Anbar May Escalate (AP)

By Brian Murphy,

AP, February 26, 2007

The killers started early. Just after sunrise, they tracked the imam to his modest brick mosque, where he was praying on a green carpet. Three masked gunmen muscled past a handful of worshippers and pumped four bullets into the chest of Sheik Adbul Rahman Jawhar al-Karbouli.

His murder Feb. 16 in a village near the Syrian border was barely noticed in Iraq's daily body count. But — like a vivid footnote in a dry collection of statistics — it helps bring the violence among Iraqi into sharper focus.

To much of the world, the meltdown in Iraq is a two-act spectacle: insurgents versus U.S.-led forces and Iraqi allies, and the sectarian bloodletting between Sunni Muslims and the majority Shiites. Yet out in the desert of the western Anbar province there is another story — told one attack at a time — of an internal struggle among Sunnis, between militant factions and those who have stood up against them.

It's a fratricide that may be escalating.

A suicide truck bomb killed more than 50 people Saturday leaving a mosque in the Anbar village of Habbaniyah, 50 miles west of Baghdad. The mosque's imam — like the slain al-Karbouli — had spoken out against the insurgents, which include extremists inspired by al-Qaida.

The showdowns in Anbar demonstrate how the battle for Iraq can reach into every home and mosque. Political and religious leaders are being pushed to choose between the insurgency or the U.S.-backed government.

Heads of the province's powerful desert clans also must decide if they will assist or resist the militants — setting off mafia-style turf wars along tribal lines.

"The first step, before we talk about reconciliation, is to bring the outlaw places under control," said Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi, a spokesman for the Iraqi military.

No place, it seems, shelters more outlaws than wild Anbar, a huge wedge of badlands and dunes with the Euphrates River as its lifeline.

Supply lines from Syria are thought to lace this vast empty landscape, bringing weapons and goods to Sunni insurgents. Among the militant groups operating here are those loyal to the former regime of Saddam Hussein, as well as al-Qaida in Iraq — which has committed suicide strikes, kidnappings and beheadings, in addition to attacks on U.S.-led forces.

Anbar's capital — Ramadi — is often referred to as Iraq's "wild west." It's the scene of near daily battles that produce a steady flow of U.S. body bags.

As insurgents clash with government forces, Anbar's clan leaders are caught between them.

Clan chiefs often act as judges, policy makers and intelligence chiefs for entire neighborhoods and villages. They also have the firepower at their disposal to enforce their decisions. Both the government and the insurgents need their support.

Some clans have thrown in with the insurgents — providing them with safe houses and protection along the suspected smuggling lines. Others have spurned the al-Qaida inspired "mujahadeen" — such as Jordanian-born leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, killed by a U.S. airstrike last June — as foreign interlopers.

The result for Anbar's Sunnis has been division and bloodshed.

"Anbar represents the breakdown of Iraq at its most basic levels. It has forced tribes and families to pick sides," said Mustafa Alani, an expert in Iraqi affairs at the Gulf Research Center in Dubai.

The imam al-Karbouli was a victim of this splintering of Anbar along clan lines, one of perhaps hundreds of similar killings since 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0136077

Members of his tribe had publicly denounced the insurgents. Al-Karbouli often used his Friday sermons at the Ameen mosque in Karabilah to warn worshippers against joining the "terrorists," said residents of the town, located about 240 miles west of Baghdad.

The 45-year-old al-Karbouli spoke out in other prominent forums. As a member of the municipal council, he tried to rally young men to join the police or military. As a lawyer, he mocked the declarations by al-Qaida in Iraq to establish an Islamic state.

Resident of Karabilah say his opposition to the insurgents cost him his life. "The only reason for this brutal act was his stance against al-Qaida," said one resident, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of fear of reprisals.

Family members refused to release a photograph of the imam. They are worried that insurgents may attack the four children he left behind.

The impact of Anbar's clan-against-clan violence on the people living in this desert landscape is difficult to measure. Reports, however, give a sense of how ruthless and thorough the killers can be.

On Feb. 19, gunmen ambushed a minivan on the main highway from Baghdad to Anbar. The attackers accused the 13 aboard of opposing al-Qaida in Iraq. All 13 were executed, including an elderly woman and two boys, police said. The bodies lay on the roadside for hours.

The same day, a suicide bomber tried to kill Abdul Sattar Abu Risha, leader of the Anbar Salvation Council, an alliance of clans backing the government.

"We give al-Qaida and their supporters these choices: either surrender, kill themselves or we kill them," said Col. Tarik Youssif Mohammed al-Assal, the deputy interior minister in Anbar and the Salvation Council's top security adviser.

The council, he said, uses a network of informants to hunt for insurgent backers and weapons stashes. He declined to give a clear breakdown on how many clans back the militants, but he suggested that the tide was turning.

"Al-Qaida is dying in Anbar," he claimed.

What progres has been made has come — in part — because the Pentagon has learned some painful lessons about dealing with the insurgency here.

During the 2003 invasion, the province was largely bypassed as U.S.-led columns pushed toward Baghdad. Small detachments were sent into the Anbar desert to try to block Scud missile batteries from moving within range of Israel.

But Anbar's expanses were too vast and its population too small to draw much attention after Saddam Hussein's fall.

That all changed in March 2004 when mobs in Fallujah ambushed U.S. security contractors and displayed the mutilated remains of two victims on a bridge over the Euphrates. The intense street-by-street battles that followed foreshadowed the bloody struggles ahead for U.S.-led forces across Anbar.

The Pentagon struck back with offensives to try to block the cross-border networks of suspected foreign fighters. These were the first major campaigns joined by the new Iraqi Army and another allied force: Several hundred Anbar tribesmen pledged to fight against the insurgents, who called themselves the Desert Protectors.

Since then, Washington has tried to expand the ranks of pro-government clans in Anbar by wooing clan leaders. The Pentagon's No. 2 commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, traveled Thursday to Anbar towns near the Syrian border, where he met political leaders and tribal elders.

But it can be difficult to recruit nervous Sunnis to the government's side.

The Shiites can count on the protection of the police, who are led by Shiites, and on their miliitas, including the powerful Mahdi Army of radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. The Kurds of northern Iraq are protected by their traditional mountain guerrillas, called the peshmerga.

Many Sunnis — who were favored under Saddam — now feel vulnerable without a homegrown armed faction on their side.

"Groups like al-Qaida in Iraq exploit these fears among Sunnis and tell them things like, `We are here to protect you,'" said Alani, the security analyst.

Andrew Exum, a specialist in Iraqi issues at The Washington Institute for Near East Policy, believes the White House is still struggling to grasp the "tribal geography and social geography" of Anbar.

"For the most part, the complications of tribal politics remain a mystery for the Americans," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0136078

"No doubt they may be getting better at getting some clan leaders over to the government side," he added, "but they still have to make sure that empowering one faction does not appear be at the expense of another group. It's a very difficult place."

U.S. Says Raid In Iraq Supports Claim On Iran (NYT)

By James Glanz And Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 25 — A raid on a Shiite weapons cache in the southern city of Hilla one week ago is providing what American officials call the best evidence yet that the deadliest roadside bombs in Iraq are manufactured in Iran, but critics contend that the forensic case remains circumstantial and inferential.

The new evidence includes infrared sensors, electronic triggering devices and information about plastic explosives used in bombs that the Americans say lead back to Iran. The explosive material, triggering devices, other components and the method of assembly all produce weapons with an Iranian signature that has never been found outside Iraq or southern Lebanon, where Hezbollah is believed to have used weapons supplied by Iran, the Americans say.

But critics assert that nearly all the bomb components could have been produced in Iraq or somewhere else in the region. Even if the evidence were to establish that Iran is the source, they add, that does not necessarily mean that the Iranian leadership is responsible.

The raid by American and Iraqi forces discovered a fake boulder made of polyurethane and containing three of the deadliest kind of roadside bombs in Iraq. Smeared with dirt and pebbles to give it the color and texture of a rock, the polyurethane blob was resting in the back seat of a Toyota, apparently in preparation for a roadside attack, American officials said in lengthy briefings with two New York Times reporters last week.

The Toyota, along with a second vehicle and a nearby house described as an assembly point, contained components and other weaponry that the officials believe demonstrate that the bomb parts must have originated in Iran. Called explosively formed penetrators, or E.F.P.'s, bombs like the ones hidden inside the fake boulder are designed to eject molten slugs that slice through American armor with deadly precision.

The assertion that the latest find greatly bolsters the theory of the Iranian origin of the E.F.P.'s is significant because it could provide the United States with a new justification to take action against Iran. But the evidence is unlikely to satisfy skeptics who have been suspicious that the Bush administration is trying to lay the groundwork for attacking Iran. They point to the flawed intelligence used by the administration to accuse Saddam Hussein of harboring weapons of mass destruction before invading Iraq nearly four years ago.

All of the items found in the Hilla raid have been used by Hezbollah in southern Lebanon, said Maj. Marty Weber, a master explosives ordnance technician who has studied many kinds of improvised bombs in the Middle East and elsewhere and is closely involved in the effort in Iraq.

In addition, the shallow concave caps, which are made of copper and change into armor-piercing balls when the E.F.P.'s explode, were smooth and flawless, indicating to the explosives expert that they were manufactured in Iran because of the high precision required to make them so. Also found during the raid were 10 107-millimeter Strella rockets that had Iranian markings.

A Question of Technology

The most specialized part of the E.F.P.'s that were found is the concave copper disc, called a liner, that rolls into a deadly armor-piercing ball when the device explodes. Although American explosives experts say that the liner is deceptively difficult to make properly, the discs in Hilla look like a thick little alms plate or even a souvenir ashtray minus the indentations for holding cigarettes.

The electronics package is built around everyday items like the motion sensors used in garage-door openers and outdoor security systems; in fact, at the heart of some of the bombs found in Iraq is a type of infrared sensor commonly sold at electronic stores like RadioShack.

Still, American military officials appear to be making an attempt to respond to critics who say the evidence is inconclusive. In the course of the detailed briefing on the Hilla discovery, Major Weber said that most of the E.F.P.'s in Iraq use C-4 plastic explosive manufactured in Iran. At the request of the Bush administration, The Times is withholding some specific details about the weapons to protect intelligence sources and methods.

In addition to the Hilla discovery, military officials are expected to disclose at a briefing on Monday details about materials found in a raid in Diyala Province, the mixed Sunni-Shiite battleground north of Baghdad, that, according to one defense official, included enough components to make more than 100 E.F.P.'s. The official asked not to be identified by name because the matter is so sensitive.

Major Weber said the use of precision copper discs combined with passive infrared sensors amounted to "a no-brainer" that the explosive components were of Iranian origin, because no one has used that sort of configuration except Iranian-backed Shiite militias.

Could copper discs be manufactured with the required precision in Iraq? "You can never be certain," Major Weber said. But he said that "having studied all these groups, I've only seen E.F.P.'s used in two areas of the world: The Levant and here," meaning in Hezbollah areas of Lebanon and in Iraq. Hezbollah is thought to be directly armed and trained by Iran.

Skeptics say the new details do not support a conclusion that only Iran could be providing the components. "Iran may well be involved in the supply of these weapons, but so far they haven't proved it," said Joseph Cirincione, senior vice president for National Security at the Center for American Progress, a liberal research and advocacy organization.

"Before we act on the assumption that these are Iranian we've got to rule out all these other possibilities," he said. "The military hasn't done that."

He noted that a related weapon, the shape charge, "has been around for decades. This is not new stuff. There is a vast international arms market selling shape charges from many countries."

New Details

The new information is more substantial than the limited details disclosed earlier this month in Baghdad, said John Pike, director of GlobalSecurity.org, a research group based in Alexandria, Va.

"That initial briefing was not much to write home about," Mr. Pike said. "The points that they are making here are rather more convincing. Whether they're true is a completely different question."

Mr. Pike said he was not swayed by arguments that the copper discs could only be made by equipment in Iran. All that is required are machine tools, he said. "You can buy them. I mean, look at all those cylinders people use for L.P.G. cooking gas. Do you think they are all imported from Iran? Probably not. I bet there are guys all over Iraq who make those things for a living."

But he found other details more persuasive. "The two points they are making about the tradecraft of the fuse and the wrappings of the explosives those are pretty good pieces of evidence," he said. "I will say that, totally apart from any of this evidence, I would be astonished if Iran was not providing military support to the Shia militias. It should be self-evident that they are doing that."

Afternoon Attack

The Hilla raid took place at 1:30 p.m. on Feb. 17 after a tipster reported seeing a tow truck carrying rockets.

The fake rock with three E.F.P. canisters inside was sitting on the back seat of a different vehicle, a Toyota Crown. The trunk of the same car contained various equipment including an infrared sensor, a G.P.S. unit, two compasses and a jug filled with an unknown explosive.

Tools and materials for making fake rocks were found inside the house along with a partially completed rock and two E.F.P.'s. Among the items found there were seven battery packs needed to set off the blasting caps that initiate the E.F.P. explosion, four cans of epoxy foam and three of the infrared sensors.

The E.F.P.'s were designed to inflict maximum damage. The positioning of the sensor and the exact angles of the E.F.P.'s inside the rock were fixed to find weak points in American armored vehicles like Humvees and Strykers.

"The E.F.P. canisters are typically arrayed at angles to minimize the effects of countermeasures," Major Weber said. "They want to hit the truck when it is already well into the kill zone."

The infrared sensors could be armed and disarmed at a distance with cellphones, long-distance cordless phones or radios. That allows the attackers to arm the devices only when American or Iraqi convoys are approaching. Then, when the convoys trip the sensors, the E.F.P.'s explode.

DOJ_NMG_0136080

Major Weber said that many of those techniques were clearly Iranian in origin. Critics said that all of them could be replicated by skilled Iraqis or others in the Middle East with a solid knowledge of electronics and basic manufacturing techniques.

Still, Major Weber said, there were other indications of Iranian involvement in Hilla. In the raid, the Iraqi and American troops also found a red 1988 Chevy tow truck carrying 10 Strella rockets under a false bottom in the bed. The rockets had MJ-1 contact fuses and were probably made in China and repainted with Iranian markings — the usual practice for weapons that Iran imports and resells. Following international convention, the markings were in English, not Persian. They indicated that the rockets had been made in 2005 and each carried 18 kilograms of explosive.

As to why the Iranians would leave such obvious markings on the shells, Major Weber speculated that they had simply been taken out of stock and shipped across the border.

Comparisons to Others

Major Weber said he doubted that Hezbollah — the group Mahdi militia leader Moktada al-Sadr has used as a model for his political movement — would have provided the material and technology to the Mahdi militia or to other Shiite fighters in Iraq.

"It is possible, but based upon my experience we have not seen Hezbollah share information or technology on anything until they have been told to," Major Weber said.

"The E.F.P. is their silver bullet," he said, referring to Iran and its allied militias.

Major Weber also said that the use of passive infrared sensors, or P.I.R.'s, was one of the strongest markers of Iranian involvement, based on years of experience indicating that only Iranian-backed groups employ the sensors in that manner. But he also acknowledged that the electronic components needed to make the sensors are easily available off the shelf at places like RadioShack.

Those components are usedin commercial products, such as motion sensors for a lighting system or garage door openers. Those products are opened up, rewired and repackaged. Sometimes on products where multiple beams must be triggered to close the circuit, masking tape is used to cover up some beams so that only one is triggered.

"Every P.I.R. in Iraq has been RadioShack, Digigard or Everspring," Major Weber said. "But in southern Lebanon I never saw them use Radio Shack."

While he maintained that the copper liner also required specialized equipment and skills to make properly, that assertion also rests on some rather subtle distinctions. A senior defense official displayed pictures of a stack of some 30 copper E.F.P. liners seized in a raid in Mahmudiya, a town south of Baghdad. The liners, Major Weber said, were "copycats" stamped in Iraq, not Iran. To the untrained eye, the liners initially looked identical to the genuine ones.

But Major Weber then pointed out that there were slightly visible cracks often running in circles around the tops of the liners when they sat on a table with their concave sides pointing down. Those imperfections were signs that the liners had been made in Iraq, Major Weber said. And because of the imperfections, he said, an E.F.P. made with them would be much less deadly. Such an E.F.P. would fragment rather than curl into a ball, he said, and the fragments would be much less likely to pierce armor.

Iraqi Ministry Casts Doubt On Oil Law (AP)

By Bushra Juhi,

AP, February 26, 2007

The Oil Ministry cast doubt Sunday on statements indicating the Kurds had agreed to support a draft oil law that would divide revenues among all Iraqi factions and meet a key U.S. benchmark in Iraq.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government had promised to enact a new oil law by the end of 2006 but missed the deadline due to objections from the Kurds. Many of Iraq's vast oil reserves can be found in the Kurdish north and the Shiite south, and the Kurds wanted a greater role in awarding contracts and administering the revenues.

Massoud Barzani, president of the self-governing Kurdish administration in the north, said Saturday that he and President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, had discussed the latest draft law by telephone with al-Maliki and "the results were good."

Barzani made the comments in a joint press conference with Talabani after a meeting with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad in the northern Kurdish city of Sulaimaniyah.

DOJ_NMG_0136081

"We reached a final agreement," Barzani said, without elaborating. "We accept the draft."

An Oil Ministry spokesman, however, stressed that the draft law still needed to be discussed at the Cabinet level.

"Today, we got confirmation that Barzani said that they support the draft law but he mentioned nothing about agreeing to it," ministry spokesman Assem Jihad said. "The discussions and the negotiations are still ongoing."

It was unclear if Barzani was saying he supported the idea of a law or the draft as currently worded. Kurdish officials could not be reached for clarification.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she had stressed the importance of making rapid progress on the oil law with Iraqi leaders when she was in Baghdad last week. But she said she recognized the difficulty of the task.

"The oil law is not just an oil law. It's a law about dividing the resources of the country and therefore maintaining the unity of Iraq. So it's not easy," she said on "Fox News Sunday."

Once the Cabinet signs off, the measure goes to parliament for final approval once the legislators return from a recess early next month.

The Bush administration, facing growing pressure to end the Iraq conflict, has been urging the Iraqis to finish the new oil law.

A new law is needed, most outside experts believe, to encourage international companies to pour billions of dollars into Iraq to repair pipelines, upgrade wells, develop new fields and begin to exploit the country's petroleum reserves, estimated at about 115 billion barrels.

Panel: Military Health System Needs Help (WP/AP)

By Seth Borenstein, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Many Iraq war soldiers, veterans and their families are not getting needed psychological help because a stressed military's mental health system is overwhelmed and understaffed, a task force of psychologists found.

The panel's 67-page report calls for the immediate strengthening of the military mental health system. It cites a 40 percent vacancy rate in active duty psychologists in the Army and Navy, resources diverted from family counselors and a weak transition for veterans leaving the military.

The findings were released Sunday by the American Psychological Association.

More than three out of 10 soldiers met the criteria for a "mental disorder," but far less than half of those in need sought help, the report found. Sometimes that's because of the stigma of having mental health problems, other times the help simply wasn't available, according to the task force. And there are special difficulties in getting help to National Guard and Reserve troops, who have been used heavily in Iraq, the report said.

The special task force found no evidence of a "well-coordinated or well-disseminated approach to providing behavioral health care to service members and their families."

The psychology task force, chaired by an active military psychologist and comprised of psychologists working for the military or Veterans Administration, said "relatively few high-quality" mental health programs exist in the military now.

"There are tremendous needs; the system is stressed by these needs," said pediatric psychologist Jeanne Hoffman, a task force member and a civilian pediatric psychologist at Tripler Army Medical Center in Honolulu.

The Defense Department's mental health experts hadn't read the report. Pentagon spokeswoman Cynthia Smith said the military is proud of its mental health services record, including a new program this year that checks up on service members after they return home to their families.

"For the past four years, DOD has been aggressively reaching out to support our military personnel before and after deployments. This is unprecedented," Smith said in an e-mail to The Associated Press. "We have assessed the health, including the mental health of more than 1 million service members before and after deployments. We have worked with their families and others to address mental health concerns associated with deployments and with war."

One of the major problems is that four out of 10 "active duty licensed clinical psychologist" slots in the Army and Navy are not filled, a problem worsened by the dire need to send mental health experts into war zones, the report said.

DOJ_NMG_0136082

That high vacancy rate has several side effects. One is that the psychologists left are overwhelmed, the report said. It found that one-third of Army mental health personnel reported "high burn out" and 27 percent reported "low motivation for their work."

Because of the shortage, there are even fewer stateside therapists to help families of those deployed and to help returning soldiers readjust, the report found.

Hoffman, the pediatric psychologist, said she's seen children regress on toilet training, have severe headaches, stomach pains, and suffer in school because of the stress of having a parent deployed.

And for soldiers and veterans returning home, only 10 to 20 percent of the military's mental health experts are trained to help those with post-traumatic stress disorder, the report found.

"I know guys that are waiting for appointments," said Russell Terry, chief executive officer of the Iraq War Veterans Organization. "I know guys who are dealing with doctors who have no concept of PTSD."

Terry was on the phone with an Iraq war veteran last year when the vet killed himself.

Report co-chair Michelle Sherman, a psychologist at the Veterans Administration Medical Center in Oklahoma City, said the military and VA are "working very hard to meet the needs" of those returning from Iraq.

At VA headquarters, Antonette Zeiss, deputy chief consultant in the agency's office of mental health services, said the report "misses the mark by quite a way." She said her agency didn't have "an opportunity to present data (to the panel) about what the VA is really doing."

Sherman said the panel did seek data from the VA, but when asked if the agency provided information to the psychologists' panel, she said: "I'm not supposed to answer that question."

Zeiss said the VA has been increasing spending on mental health services yearly, opening new centers and hiring more psychological professionals.

"We have the strongest mental health system in the country and we are making it stronger," she said.

But veterans groups disagree.

"The system as it exists today ignores the readjustment needs specific to Iraq and Afghanistan service members," Veterans for America President Bobby Muller said in a statement. "We have to stop throwing money at a problem that requires a complete overhaul. The system is broken."

Troops' Needs Not Met, Psychological Group Says (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya, Usa Today

USA Today, February 26, 2007

Task force: Families vulnerable to war trauma

A task force of the nation's largest group of mental health professionals warns that the U.S. military is not fully addressing the needs of troops and family members traumatized by war.

In a report issued Sunday, the American Psychological Association task force said families are particularly at risk. It noted that 700,000 children have had a parent sent overseas since Sept. 11, 2001, and estimated that 2,733 children have lost a parent killed in Iraq or Afghanistan.

"Many service personnel and their family members are going without mental health care because of the limited availability of such care and the barriers to accessing care," a news release accompanying the study said.

The Pentagon declined to comment on the study but defended its record of treating troops and their families. Spokeswoman Cynthia Smith said physical and mental health screenings before and after deployments have been provided to 1 million troops during the past six years, and mental health teams are sent into combat zones to monitor and assist servicemembers there. She said the military also has created several family support systems.

"No military in the history of the world has done more to identify, evaluate, prevent and treat the mental health needs and concerns of its personnel than the military services of the United States," Smith said.

Among the problems, according to the psychological task force:

•The Pentagon failed to implement the best mental health treatment programs across the military. Rather, plans varied by installation and included only a few that were deemed high quality.

DOJ_NMG_0136083

•The military hasn't hired enough psychologists. The study notes a 22% decline in the number of uniformed clinical psychologists in the military and a 40% vacancy among licensed clinical psychologist positions in the Army and Navy.

•Not enough research has been done on the war's impact on military spouses and children. "Given that our country has been at war for nearly six years, the absence of systematic research … is striking," the study said.

Psychologist Ron Palomares, who headed the task force, said the problems the report identified "kind of crept up on us."

Smearing Like It's 2003 (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

Even as jurors pondered whether Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff should be convicted for lying about what the Bush administration did to smear one of its critics, there was Cheney accusing another adversary of doing the work of the terrorists.

The fabricate-and-smear cycle illustrated so dramatically during the case of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby explains why President Bush is failing to rally support for the latest iteration of his Iraq policy. The administration's willingness at the outset to say anything, no matter how questionable, to justify the war has destroyed its credibility. Its habit of attacking those who expressed misgivings has destroyed any goodwill it might have enjoyed. Bush and Cheney have lost the benefit of the doubt.

Yet Cheney has learned nothing and forgotten nothing. His latest demon is House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, whom he accuses of validating al-Qaeda's objectives.

"Al-Qaeda functions on the basis that they think they can break our will," Cheney told ABC News on Friday by way of explaining his earlier attack on the speaker. "That's their fundamental underlying strategy, that if they can kill enough Americans or cause enough havoc, create enough chaos in Iraq, then we'll quit and go home."

Cheney added: "And my statement was that if we adopt the Pelosi policy, that then we will validate the strategy of al-Qaeda. I said it, and I meant it."

No doubt he did, and those words illustrate the administration's political methodology from the very beginning of its public campaign against Iraq. Back in 2002 and early 2003, it browbeat a reluctant country into this war by making assertions about an Iraqi nuclear program that proved to be groundless and by inventing ties between Saddam Hussein and al-Qaeda that didn't exist.

Then, once our troops were committed, anyone who had second thoughts could be trashed and driven back as a pro-terrorist weakling. The quagmire would be self-perpetuating: Once you checked in, you could never leave.

The evidence presented at the Libby trial has demonstrated how worried Cheney was that this scheme could unravel. Thanks to Patrick Fitzgerald, the painstaking prosecutor, we know that Cheney was beside himself over former ambassador Joseph Wilson's July 6, 2003, New York Times op-ed article undercutting the administration's claim that Saddam Hussein had sought nuclear materials in Niger.

Whatever the jury decides, Fitzgerald has amply demonstrated that Cheney directed Libby to destroy Wilson's credibility, partly by leaking that his wife, Valerie Plame Wilson, was a CIA operative who had suggested Wilson was well qualified to investigate the claims in Niger. For Libby, Fitzgerald said in closing his case, Valerie Wilson "wasn't a person. She was an argument, a fact to use against Joe Wilson."

Libby-Cheney apologists have argued over and over that Cheney had a right to be angry because Wilson said that Cheney had sent him to Niger. But Wilson said no such thing. In his New York Times piece, Wilson wrote only that he had been "informed by officials at the Central Intelligence Agency that Vice President Dick Cheney's office had questions about a particular intelligence report." That was true.

The attack apparatus has now turned on Fitzgerald, whose record is that of a thoroughly nonpartisan prosecutor. Fitzgerald's perjury rap against Libby, Cheney allies say, is a cheap attempt to criminalize politics.

Really? Here's what Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) had to say about perjury: "Lying under oath is an ancient crime of great weight because it shields other offenses, because it blocks the light of truth in human affairs. It is a dagger in the heart of our legal system, and indeed in our democracy. It cannot, it should not, it must not be tolerated."

DOJ_NMG_0136084

Ros-Lehtinen made that statement not about Libby, but to justify the impeachment of Bill Clinton back in 1998. I have no idea where she stands on the Plame-Wilson case. But it's certainly amusing that so many who were eager to throw Clinton out of office for perjury and obstruction of justice when he lied about sex are now livid at Fitzgerald for bringing comparable charges in a controversy over the rationale for war. Do they think sex is more important than war?

Whatever price Scooter Libby pays, the country is already paying for the divisive practices of a crowd that wanted to go to war in Iraq in the very worst way -- and did exactly that. As a result, we confront the mess in Baghdad and the continued threat of terrorism as an angry, polarized nation.

Town's Elders Plead For Help With Taliban (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa And Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 24 — Taliban fighters who seized control of a remote town in southern Afghanistan three weeks ago have started a campaign of arrests and reprisals against tribal elders and townspeople, according to tribal elders. The elders called on NATO forces and the government to move against the insurgents, even if it means bombing the town.

Five elders from the town, Musa Qala, including a member of its tribal council, traveled to Kabul this week to plead for help, expressing bitterness that neither Afghan forces nor NATO troops responded when Taliban forces overran the town on Feb. 2.

In October, in a controversial deal brokered by the town's 50-member tribal council, both British NATO troops and the Taliban withdrew, and the town enjoyed three months of calm. But the Taliban remained at large in the district, and when NATO forces killed eight of their members in an airstrike last month, their leader seized control of the town, putting elders who did not flee under house arrest and issuing death threats.

Hundreds of families fled, anticipating NATO bombing. NATO airstrikes have continued in the region and have killed several local insurgent leaders, but the elders said that had made the situation harder for the townspeople. "Mullah Ghafoor was killed in an airstrike, and the Taliban started to blame the elders and people for spying for NATO troops," said the main spokesman for the group that came to Kabul, identifying one insurgent leader. Another leader, Mullah Manan, was killed, and the house where his body was taken was bombed, he said.

"Since Tuesday the Taliban started to arrest people and elders and charge them with helping the government," he said. Ten people had been arrested, including an elder who had served as police chief, and one man was hurt and may have died, the elders said. The spokesman and an elder interviewed by telephone said that a Taliban leadership council in Quetta, Pakistan, was ordering the arrests and issuing the death threats.

The elders who spoke asked not to be identified for fear of reprisals from the Taliban. Two said they had received death threats from the Taliban and had fled their homes. Other members of the tribal council were in hiding, they said.

One elder said the Taliban had told him by telephone that they were under strong pressure from Pakistan to seize control of the town and now to go further. "One of the Taliban told me on the telephone, 'Hajji Sahib, I am respecting you like my father, but we are ordered to kill you,' " he said.

One landowner from Kajaki, a neighboring district, said the Taliban had executed 13 people from their own ranks and arrested three more.

About 1,000 Taliban are in Musa Qala's broader district, also called Musa Qala, the elders said. The Taliban have boasted that they control 10,000 fighters in the region.

"We want the government to take back Musa Qala," said one elder who helped broker the October deal. "People are ready to help NATO and the government, but we don't know what we are waiting for."

Asadullah Wafa, the governor of Musa Qala's province, Helmand, was at the NATO airbase at Kandahar discussing the situation with NATO commanders. He said that he was not aware that the Taliban had begun making arrests but that the government and NATO were poised to act. "We have a comprehensive plan to resolve the issue of Musa Qala, and it will be solved very soon," he said by telephone.

Former Afghan Warlords Rally For Amnesty (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

DOJ_NMG_0136085

The Christian Science Monitor, February 26, 2007

In one corner of a soccer stadium that has seen both athletic contests and executions stands a poster some 20 feet tall of Afghanistan's president, Hamid Karzai. Perhaps appropriately, Feda Mohammad Mujahid has turned away from it.

The 25,000 Afghans crowded into this bare concrete oval hoist up different posters of stern-faced mujahideen commanders who first fought the Soviets, and then each other, before joining with America to oust the Taliban in 2001.

To Mr. Mujahid, wrapped in a white scarf against the winter chill, these are the heroes of Afghanistan's "holy wars," not war criminals. So he has come here to rail against Mr. Karzai and the tyranny of Western nations, which have opposed an Afghan bill that would grant the mujahideen amnesty for war crimes committed during the past 25 years.

"This is a mujahideen nation," he says, as nearby loudspeakers crackle with speeches of defiance. "We want the law of Islam, and the government of mujahideen."

Away from the teeming streets around the stadium, the attitudes of average Afghans take on a different air. Many express frustration that former military leaders who killed thousands and destroyed Kabul in a four-year civil war might never be brought to justice. Yet in a country still divided by tribes, tongues, and traditions, Friday's rally sent a clear message – that even now, Afghanistan's onetime warlords alone have the power to muster the masses.

In this rally, "you saw their continuing ability to mobilize people and to potentially influence politics," says Paul Fishstein, director of the Afghanistan Research and Evaluation Unit, an independent analysis organization here.

Some see amnesty as political ploy

The bill itself, which was recently approved by both houses of Afghanistan's parliament, has attracted international attention largely because it has been portrayed as a self-serving political ploy. Those likely to benefit most from the legislation are legislators and government officials themselves, many of whom are former mujahideen who stepped into the political vacuum following the fall of the Taliban.

Among the speakers at Friday's event were members of parliament, the vice president, the president's top security adviser, an army chief of staff, and an energy minister.

To them, amnesty does offer a measure of self-preservation. The momentum for warlord amnesty here began after the execution of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, a onetime US ally.

Former mujahideen members of parliament "thought that there might be a day that maybe they will face the same thing that Saddam Hussein faced," says Najibullah Kabuli, a member of the lower house of the Afghan parliament, the Wolesi Jirga, who abstained from voting on the amnesty bill because he thinks it is too broad.

"Didn't the US support the mujahideen?" asks protester Abdul Malik, noting how the mujahideen, too, were allies of the United States during the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979.

Even after the fall of the Taliban, the international community could have taken a stronger stand against allowing former warlords into politics, says Mr. Kabuli, the member of parliament. For a country that has been at war for 25 years, "it was not possible to have a government that was free of war criminals," he says. "But it was possible for the government to have fewer of these."

As the political winds have shifted from a focus purely on stability to issues of human rights and good governance, former mujahideen have emerged as an easy target.

A report by Human Rights Watch, for instance, called for several members of the government to be tried for war crimes.

"Human Rights Watch should consider the stability of Afghanistan, otherwise Afghanistan will go toward crisis again," cried security adviser Mohammed Qasim Fahim. "This country we have today was created by the holy war, by the mujahideen, and by their sacrifices."

In this conviction lies the warlords' greatest power. In a nation with a tribal heritage and a history of endless foreign interventions and abandonments, Afghans have come to trust only on those closest to them. As a result, warlords are able to mobilize unshakable support though regional or ethnic alliances.

Protesters say amnesty brings unity

DOJ_NMG_0136086

For those who slogged through the mud of Kabul's soccer stadium, thrusting frenzied fists into the air and bearing massive posters of commanders around the field in a triumphal march, the amnesty is partially an act of healing these historic rifts. Mujahideen commanders who once turned Kabul to rubble in their attempts to kill each other were now standing side by side.

"This is a war-torn country," says Mujahid, his hands folded behind his back, counting crimson prayer beads. "We have suffered a lot and we don't want to fight each other again."

"Let's forget about the past and think about a prosperous future," he says. "We want to be united."

A peaceful protest is a part of that message, some say. "We want to show the people of the world that one day we were evil to each other, but we can be peaceful, too," says Mr. Malik.

However, many Afghans and experts alike are skeptical. "These things tend to be cyclical – there tend to be alliances of convenience," says Mr. Fishstein.

Far from the echoes of the soccer stadium, Kabul resident Mohammad Ewaz sits on a stone wall in the hills high above the Kabul plains. In the amber light of late afternoon, he sips his tea, taking a break from the new wall he and his friends are building a few feet away.

Farther down the slope, the remnants of shattered houses, destroyed in the civil war, emerge from the hillside. "This is the work of the people who are asking for amnesty," he says.

"If they are really intending to bring unity, then it is a good idea," he adds. "But if it is just words and nothing else, then I don't think that it is a useful thing."

Why Have So Many U.S. Attorneys Been Fired? It Looks A Lot Like Politics (NYT)

By Adam Cohen

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

Carol Lam, the former United States attorney for San Diego, is smart and tireless and was very good at her job. Her investigation of Representative Randy Cunningham resulted in a guilty plea for taking more than $2 million in bribes from defense contractors and a sentence of more than eight years. Two weeks ago, she indicted Kyle Dustin Foggo, the former No. 3 official in the C.I.A. The defense-contracting scandal she pursued so vigorously could yet drag in other politicians.

In many Justice Departments, her record would have won her awards, and perhaps a promotion to a top post in Washington. In the Bush Justice Department, it got her fired.

Ms. Lam is one of at least seven United States attorneys fired recently under questionable circumstances. The Justice Department is claiming that Ms. Lam and other well-regarded prosecutors like John McKay of Seattle, David Iglesias of New Mexico, Daniel Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona — who all received strong job evaluations — performed inadequately.

It is hard to call what's happening anything other than a political purge. And it's another shameful example of how in the Bush administration, everything — from rebuilding a hurricane-ravaged city to allocating homeland security dollars to invading Iraq — is sacrificed to partisan politics and winning elections.

U.S. attorneys have enormous power. Their decision to investigate or indict can bankrupt a business or destroy a life. They must be, and long have been, insulated from political pressures. Although appointed by the president, once in office they are almost never asked to leave until a new president is elected. The Congressional Research Service has confirmed how unprecedented these firings are. It found that of 486 U.S. attorneys confirmed since 1981, perhaps no more than three were forced out in similar ways — three in 25 years, compared with seven in recent months.

It is not just the large numbers. The firing of H. E. Cummins III is raising as many questions as Ms. Lam's. Mr. Cummins, one of the most distinguished lawyers in Arkansas, is respected by Republicans and Democrats alike. But he was forced out to make room for J. Timothy Griffin, a former Karl Rove deputy with thin legal experience who did opposition research for the Republican National Committee. (Mr. Griffin recently bowed to the inevitable and said he will not try for a permanent appointment. But he remains in office indefinitely.)

DOJ_NMG_0136087

The Bush administration cleared the way for these personnel changes by slipping a little-noticed provision into the Patriot Act last year that allows the president to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for an indefinite period without Senate confirmation.

Three theories are emerging for why these well-qualified U.S. attorney were fired — all political, and all disturbing.

1. Helping friends. Ms. Lam had already put one powerful Republican congressman in jail and was investigating other powerful politicians. The Justice Department, unpersuasively, claims that it was unhappy about Ms. Lam's failure to bring more immigration cases. Meanwhile, Ms. Lam has been replaced with an interim prosecutor whose résumé shows almost no criminal law experience, but includes her membership in the Federalist Society, a conservative legal group.

2. Candidate recruitment. U.S. attorney is a position that can make headlines and launch political careers. Congressional Democrats suspect that the Bush administration has been pushing out long-serving U.S. attorneys to replace them with promising Republican lawyers who can then be run for Congress and top state offices.

3. Presidential politics. The Justice Department concedes that Mr. Cummins was doing a good job in Little Rock. An obvious question is whether the administration was more interested in his successor's skills in opposition political research — let's not forget that Arkansas has been lucrative fodder for Republicans in the past — in time for the 2008 elections.

The charge of politics certainly feels right. This administration has made partisanship its lodestar. The Washington Post reporter Rajiv Chandrasekaran revealed in his book, "Imperial Life in the Emerald City," that even applicants to help administer post-invasion Iraq were asked whom they voted for in 2000 and what they thought of Roe v. Wade.

Congress has been admirably aggressive about investigating. Senator Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, held a tough hearing. And he is now talking about calling on the fired U.S. attorneys to testify and subpoenaing their performance evaluations — both good ideas.

The politicization of government over the last six years has had tragic consequences — in New Orleans, Iraq and elsewhere. But allowing politics to infect U.S. attorney offices takes it to a whole new level. Congress should continue to pursue the case of the fired U.S. attorneys vigorously, both to find out what really happened and to make sure that it does not happen again.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

In Brief (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

The Securities and Exchange Commission moved to withdraw charges against a former Halliburton Co. chief financial officer after accusing him more than two years ago of failing to ensure that the company disclosed an accounting change that was material to investors. In a filing in federal court in Houston, the SEC said it wanted to dismiss its pending claims against Gary Morris "in the interest of justice."

Shareholders Push For Vote On Executive Pay (WSJ)

By Erin White And Aaron O. Patrick

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

Some shareholders are angry about soaring executive pay. Soon, they may get a voice.

Ahead of this year's annual meetings, activist investors have submitted shareholder proposals at roughly 60 companies seeking an advisory vote on executive pay, according to Institutional Shareholder Services. Targets include Citigroup Inc., Wells Fargo & Co., WellPoint Inc. and Northrop Grumman Corp.

The vote would be nonbinding, but activists hope that public censure, or the threat of it, would prompt directors to curb outsized awards and better link pay with performance. The proposals come as new Securities and Exchange Commission rules requiring greater disclosure promise to cast a brighter spotlight on compensation.

One company facing a shareholder proposal, insurer Aflac Inc., agreed earlier this month to give investors a nonbinding vote on executive compensation, beginning in 2009. Others, including Pfizer Inc. and Schering-Plough Corp., are discussing the possibility of similar moves.

This week, U.S. Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.), the new chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, plans to introduce a revised version of his 2005 bill that aimed to give shareholders power to veto executive-pay deals. He will hold a hearing next week on his latest measure, which instead would require advisory votes.

The activists are taking a page from the British. Since 2003, United Kingdom shareholders have cast advisory votes on corporate compensation policies and how much they pay executives. Investors and companies say the practice, which began after the British government passed a law requiring it for all public companies, has generated more discussion between shareholders and boards.

But it hasn't necessarily curbed compensation.

"We have better disclosure and better accountability," says Ian Jones, head of responsible investment at Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd., an insurance company with about $40 billion under management. But "I don't think it's had much effect on the amount of remuneration."

British CEOs have long made less on average than their U.S. counterparts, but pay in both markets has risen at roughly comparable rates in recent years, with some indications pay may have risen faster in the U.K. than in the U.S. The median salary and bonus for CEOs at 250 large and mid-size U.K. companies totaled £610,000 ($1.2 million) in 2005, the latest year for which data are available, according to the U.K. arm of ISS. That's up 9.9% from 2004 and 35.6% from £450,000 in 2003.

In the U.S., median CEO salary and bonus hit $2.4 million in 2005, up 7.1% from 2004, and up 13.7% from $2.1 million in 2003, at 350 large companies studied by Mercer Human Resource Consulting. The companies in the 2003 and 2005 samples varied somewhat.

Stephen Davis, a fellow at Yale University's Millstein Center for Corporate Governance and Performance who has studied the U.K. experience, says the advisory vote has strengthened the link between pay and performance. For example, pay consultants say the practice has pushed British companies to shift executive compensation toward bonuses and away from big salary increases. But Mr. Davis says "Investors still feel...that pay is not yet fully aligned with performance in the way that they would like."

Mr. Davis says companies and investors are on a learning curve, but he says the vote appears to have helped curb severance packages. At the start of the decade, a three-year payout was standard; today, a one-year payout is "virtually universal," Mr. Davis says. But he says directors worry that investors reviewing dozens of pay plans are issuing "cookie-cutter" judgments rather than evaluating packages individually.

Big U.K. shareholders applaud the increased discussion. Talks, often held in advance of annual meetings, are "more meaningful" than the occasional formal presentations managers used to offer shareholders, says Colin Melvin, head of corporate governance at London-based Hermes Pension Management Ltd., which manages $120 billion in assets.

For instance, in 2003, 50.7% of votes cast by shareholders opposed a pay package for GlaxoSmithKline PLC Chief Executive Jean-Pierre Garnier. The pharmaceutical maker later agreed to overhaul its pay policies and end "what might be deemed 'payment for failure,'" according to its 2004 letter to shareholders. Dr. Garnier's total pay package fell slightly in 2004, to $4.56 million from $4.57 million the year before.

Ahead of the 2004 shareholder meeting, Glaxo sent draft copies of its compensation report to large shareholders, according to Richard Singleton, the director of corporate governance at F&C Asset Management. Mr. Singleton emailed Glaxo's then-chairman, Sir Christopher Hogg, suggesting tougher performance targets for executives to earn bonuses. The company added a clause stating performance targets would consider analysts' forecasts.

"I was delighted," Mr. Singleton says. The clause remains part of Glaxo's compensation policy.

A Glaxo spokesman confirmed the clause was inserted in the 2004 report, but he declined to comment on the process. Sir Christopher couldn't be reached.

Tlk doesn't always translate into action. Early last year, London-based investment manager Amvescap PLC decided to pay its departing chairman, Charles W. Brady, a $9 million bonus. ISS's British arm believed the payment was unjustified, according to director of research David Paterson, and considered opposing the compensation report.

Amvescap's company secretary, Michael Perman, told an ISS analyst that executives considered the bonus reasonable because Mr. Brady had shepherded Amvescap through a tough period and had hired a new chief executive. The analyst wasn't convinced, and ISS recommended that investors oppose the compensation report; at the annual meeting, 48% of votes cast did. Mr. Brady did get the bonus.

An Amvescap spokesman declined to comment beyond a written statement from Amvescap Chairman Rex Adams on the day of the vote: "Over the last weeks, Amvescap has initiated direct discussions with many of our company's major shareholders, and we believe we have a good understanding of their views."

Despite the shortcomings, U.K. investors are among those pushing U.S. companies to adopt the advisory vote. In January, a group of 13 institutional investors, nine British, wrote SEC Chairman Christopher Cox to endorse the practice. The group, which collectively has $1.5 trillion under management, said the votes would bolster communication between shareholders and directors, better link pay with performance and "provide a counter-weight" to rising executive pay. Companies in Australia, Sweden and the Netherlands also grant shareholders a vote on pay.

In the U.S., the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees union sponsored "say on pay" resolutions at seven companies last year and 10 so far this year, says Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefit policy for AFSCME. ISS says the resolutions last year won an average of 40% support, which is high for new issues.

This year, AFSCME is co-leading a group of companies and shareholders to discuss the idea. The group includes Pfizer, Intel Corp., Schering-Plough and American International Group Inc., as well as the California Public Employees' Retirement System and other funds.

Some corporate participants in the group think the concept has merit, but they worry about the mechanics. One sticking point: How to give shareholders a voice on elements of a pay package that companies are legally bound to pay, such as an executive's deferred compensation? "You create an expectation that you can do something about it" if investors reject the package, says one person close to the situation.

Alex Kelly, head of investor relations at Schering-Plough, says the company is willing to consider letting shareholders vote on pay. "We're willing to listen," he says.

Other companies oppose the notion. In a statement to be included in its proxy, Wells Fargo argues that an advisory pay vote "would provide no clear or meaningful guidance" because directors wouldn't know which portion of compensation investors objected to. Shareholders already have plenty of ways to tell directors what they think, the company states. Wells Fargo also contends that the U.S. and U.K. corporate systems have "significant differences in regulatory and corporate governance policies and practices."

Other companies aim to keep the proposal off the proxy. WellPoint contended to the SEC staff that the proposal could be kept off the ballot; SEC rules allow companies to exclude proposals in some circumstances, including if it's "misleading." On Friday, WellPoint was notified that the SEC staff agreed "there appears to be some basis for your view." So WellPoint will now keep it off the proxy, a spokesman says. A spokeswoman for proposal submitter Connecticut Retirement Plans and Trust Funds said it won't try to appeal to the SEC. Instead, it will support the say-on-pay idea in other ways, such as by supporting legislation Mr. Frank plans to introduce.

Another company, Northrop Grumman, has also argued to the SEC that the proposal should be kept off the proxy. As of Friday, the company had not heard back, a spokesman said.

Corporate America Fights Back (WP)

By Michael Seigel

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

Last time the public was tuned in, the Justice Department was vigorously prosecuting corporate giants such as Enron for massive frauds committed during the waning days of the stock bubble. Assisted by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, government lawyers were racking up victories in the battle against white-collar crime. One recent highlight was the October sentencing of former Enron chief executive Jeffrey Skilling to 24 years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0136090

Now that the public's attention has shifted to matters such as Iraq, however, corporate America has launched a counterattack. Its goal is to derail the Justice Department's efforts to maintain a heightened level of white-collar criminal enforcement. Its success thus far starkly illustrates how power and money influence our criminal justice system.

Big business, represented primarily by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, could not attack white-collar criminal enforcement head-on. Instead, it enlisted the aid of its lawyers, including the American Bar Association and the Association of Corporate Counsel, in a more oblique assault. Their strategy was to mount an all-out offensive against a seemingly obscure trend: the Justice Department's increasing insistence that corporations waive their attorney-client privilege as part of their cooperation with government investigators.

Through experience, government lawyers have learned that the efficiency of white-collar criminal prosecution can be significantly improved when companies facing indictment cooperate and provide relevant information. This way, prosecutors can get to the bottom of complex criminality and promptly indict those responsible. However, unlike an ordinary criminal who cooperates by telling what he knows, a corporation only "knows" what its employees tell it. Often, information relevant to a prosecution has been gathered by the corporation's counsel. Therefore, to cooperate, the corporation must waive its attorney-client privilege.

In a January 2003 document known as the "Thompson Memorandum," Justice told its prosecutors to consider a corporation's willingness to waive its attorney-client privilege in determining whether it ought to be indicted. This is where big business and its lawyers aimed their attack. Treating attorney-client privilege as if it were a sacrosanct American institution, akin to freedom of speech, they claimed that Justice was unfairly using its tremendous power to coerce corporations into privilege waivers. The resultant erosion of the privilege would be catastrophic, they contended. This tactic even garnered the support of the American Civil Liberties Union, and together the various lobbying groups formed the Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege.

The coalition's claims are hugely overstated. The government does not "coerce" corporations to waive their attorney-client privilege any more than it "coerces" drug dealers to waive their Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination when they agree to testify. Moreover, the attorney-client privilege is not an end unto itself but a means to an end. Its main purpose is to encourage individuals to be candid with their lawyers.

The coalition says that the prospect of a privilege waiver will cause corporate employees and officers to clam up, eviscerating internal investigations and compliance programs and resulting in more corporate crime. But employees of corporations have known since the Supreme Court's 1981 decision in Upjohn Co. v. U.S. that when they speak to corporate counsel, the decision of whether to keep the conversation confidential resides with the corporation, not with them. The necessity and complexity of legal compliance leads most employees to talk to counsel nonetheless. Little indicates that the recent increase in privilege waivers has upset this balance.

So the Justice Department simply carried on. But it underestimated the power of the forces allied against it. Through intense lobbying efforts, the coalition persuaded Congress to conduct hearings. The same politicians who expressed outrage at corporate fraud a few years back now expressed outrage at the government's vigorous pursuit of it. Eventually, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) introduced a bill that would prohibit federal prosecutors from seeking privilege waivers or considering a corporation's willingness to waive privilege voluntarily when evaluating its cooperation. Realizing that it was in danger of losing, Justice issued the "McNulty Memorandum" on Dec. 12. It reins in prosecutors' ability to request privilege waivers by requiring high-level supervisory approval.

But big business smells blood. Its reaction to the McNulty memo has been negative, and its goal continues to be the outright prohibition of waiver requests. Through reintroduction of the Specter bill, it is pressing its legislative "fix" in the new Congress, and the newly empowered Democrats -- eager for lobbyists' money -- are likely to be as responsive as their Republican predecessors. The result of a waiver prohibition, of course, would be a significant slowdown of white-collar criminal prosecutions -- exactly what the business lobby wants. And the losers, once again, would be the victims of white-collar crime: the American people.

CRIMINAL LAW:

In Alaska, An Oil Player Loses Favor (WSJ)

By Jim Carlton

Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

VECO Gets Chilly Treatment From Once-Friendly Politicians As FBI Probe Jolts Statehouse

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- The oil industry has long enjoyed a cozy relationship with the state government here -- not to mention the residents, who receive an annual dividend from the industry.

A Federal Bureau of Investigation probe of influence peddling -- which has focused on one of the oil industry's most powerful players -- is shaking up those ties.

At the center of the turmoil is closely held VECO Corp., the state's largest oil-services company, which has provided construction, engineering, management and other services for pipelines, refineries and other facilities.

VECO has long been one of Alaska's most prodigious campaign contributors; Chairman Bill Allen and top VECO executives have donated a total of more than $1 million to state campaigns since 1998. A year ago, a witness saw Mr. Allen in the gallery of the state legislature passing notes to a Republican politician backed by the company -- at the same time that legislators were debating a measure to cut taxes on the industry.

In August, FBI agents swarmed into legislative offices throughout the state seeking evidence of payments to state lawmakers by Mr. Allen and his executives, according to a warrant. Since then, a cloud from the investigation has hung over the state's capital, Juneau.

In recent months, a number of Alaska politicians have publicly distanced themselves from VECO and refused to take any donations from it. The new governor, Republican Sarah Palin, made a refusal to accept any VECO donations part of her platform when she challenged former Gov. Tony Knowles -- a Democrat who had made a similar pledge.

No VECO executives have been charged in the probe. FBI officials and Mr. Allen declined requests for comment. Amy Menard, an Anchorage attorney representing VECO, said, "There is no question that VECO and some VECO executives have always, from day one, had an interest in politics. But to suggest that there has been improper or inappropriate political contributions is an unfair charge."

In December, one state official was charged in connection with the influence-peddling investigation. The legislator, Tom Anderson, was indicted by a federal grand jury in Anchorage on charges of extortion, conspiracy, bribery and money laundering stemming from an FBI undercover operation in the case. Mr. Anderson, who had accepted campaign contributions from Mr. Allen and other VECO executives, faces up to 115 years and fines of up to $2.5 million. He has pleaded not guilty.

It isn't clear whether his case was related to VECO, nor whether the investigation extends beyond the company. It isn't clear what spurred the initial investigation. According to the search warrants executed in August on offices of VECO and six state legislators, FBI agents were authorized to seize documents relating to VECO, Mr. Allen and several other VECO officials.

For years, regulators paid relatively little attention to the industry here. As the nation's energy supplies have become more uncertain amid political tensions around the world, the Bush administration and its allies have made tapping Alaska's oil reserves a top energy strategy. That has brought attention to the once oil-friendly political scene in Alaska.

The Environmental Protection Agency last year launched a criminal probe into BP PLC's maintenance of its aging oil facilities at Alaska's Prudhoe Bay. BP was forced to shut down the giant oil field for several days during the summer. EPA officials launched a criminal inquiry into corrosion problems on the 800-mile Trans-Alaska Pipeline, which ferries crude across the state to the ice-free port of Valdez, Alaska. The investigations are continuing.

Mr. Allen, who arrived in Alaska in 1968 as a high-school dropout from New Mexico, has built VECO into an oil-services giant, with more than 5,000 employees and $5 billion in world-wide contracts. It has helped companies like BP and ConocoPhillips construct pipelines, transport equipment and design oil-field power plants.

Along the way, the 69-year-old has fashioned himself into one of the state's formidable, behind-the-scenes political forces. From early in his career, he has talked about making sure the oil industry's views are represented in the state capital -- and sometimes gotten in hot water.

In 1983, Mr. Allen co-founded a political-action committee to support five Republican legislative candidates who promised to hold down taxes on the oil industry. VECO and some of its subsidiaries then set up a payroll-deduction plan through which employees donated about $40,000 to the candidates, according to state documents.

Two years later, the Alaska Public Offices Commission fined VECO $72,660, saying the employee contributions weren't properly disclosed. The fine later was reduced to $28,000 on appeal by VECO. The candidates Mr. Allen recommended all went on to win, and later helped vote down a proposal by Democrats to increase taxes on the industry.

In 2002, Mr. Allen spent so much time personally lobbying for legislation in Juneau that state regulators ordered him to register as a professional lobbyist. Mr. Allen complained, saying he considered contacts with legislators his right as a businessman. Soon afterward, the legislature passed a law that critics dubbed "the Bill Allen bill." The law increased the time someone could spend pushing for legislation before being considered a lobbyist to 40 hours each month from four hours -- effectively exempting Mr. Allen from registering as a lobbyist.

In early 2006, then-Gov. Frank Murkowski presented a proposal to give oil producers a tax break as an incentive to build a natural-gas pipeline that would ship an estimated $20 billion of natural gas from the state's North Slope field. Democrats argued that Alaska would be giving away millions in potential revenue. Mr. Allen took up residence in Juneau to help push for the measure. Though it failed to pass in the regular session, it was approved in a special session last summer.

In his December indictment, Mr. Anderson was accused of accepting $26,000 in payments from a consultant for a private corrections company. In return, the indictment claims he agreed to perform unspecified "official acts" to help that person's business, according to a Justice Department news release. The consultant was working as a confidential informant for the FBI.

Federal officials won't discuss the case nor say whether it ties into VECO. But Mr. Allen and VECO did lobby for a private prison in Alaska in 2002. Though much of VECO's business is with the oil industry, the company does other work, including building prisons.

Mike Chenault, a Republican state legislator who co-chairs the House finance committee, said he has voted for oil-industry bills backed by Mr. Allen, but not because he received money from him or anyone else. He professed an admiration for the VECO chairman, who got his start in Alaska in the legislator's district on the Kenai Peninsula. "He's actually fulfilled the Alaskan dream to come up here and do well," Mr. Chenault said.

Papers Show Mixed Result From Legislator's Years In Business (NYT)

By Mike Mcintire

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

It is an oft-told tale that has become part of Albany lore. Long before he became the State Senate majority leader, Joseph L. Bruno borrowed $5,000 to start a telephone equipment company, built it into a profitable business and sold it for $23 million in 1990. Born into poverty, Mr. Bruno became a millionaire.

Or did he?

A review of records and interviews with his former partners showed that while Mr. Bruno indeed built his publicly traded firm , Coradian Corporation, from scratch, its sale did not make him a millionaire. In fact, the company had been steadily losing money, and Mr. Bruno made less than $400,000 from the transaction.

As a result, Mr. Bruno began to pursue other sources of money, and those pursuits are now the subject of a federal investigation.

Some of Mr. Bruno's other business ventures, before and after he sold Coradian, did poorly. In one case, he lost about $150,000 on a real estate project that dragged on for 17 years, a former partner said. And in the past six years, he has lost at least $50,000 on investments in high-tech companies, according to financial disclosure records and interviews with his aides.

Mr. Bruno's mixed success as a businessman might have important implications for a federal grand jury investigation into his financial dealings. Soon after selling Coradian, Mr. Bruno — who has for years complained that being in office has hurt his ability to make money — opened a consulting business out of his home. That business is now the focus of the federal investigation into whether Mr. Bruno provided government favors to his consulting clients, people who have been briefed about the inquiry have said.

Records show that the consulting business has been a consistently reliable stream of income for Mr. Bruno. Yet the firm does not advertise or have a published telephone number and Mr. Bruno has refused to publicly identify its clients, describing them only as "substantial and important business people."

Mr. Bruno, who declined to be interviewed for this article, has consistently defended his right to remain a businessman while serving in the Legislature, asserting that he has never used his power to enrich himself or his business associates.

It is impossible to know the full extent of Mr. Bruno's wealth because he is not required to provide details about his income or assets on disclosure forms made available to the public. There are no indications that he is in financial trouble; he lives on a sprawling farm in Rensselaer County, owns thoroughbred horses and earns $121,000 as majority leader.

But interviews and documents suggested that Mr. Bruno, 77, has remained an active consultant and aggressive investor in part because he felt he needed the money. He suggested as much in an interview with The New York Times in December.

"Nobody wants to hear it, but my being in office has cost me a fortune — millions, literally millions," he said. "I'm worth a hell of a lot less today than I was 30 years ago. That's kind of sad. I'm worth a hell of a lot less now than I was 10 years ago."

By his own account, Mr. Bruno overcame humble origins in upstate poverty by selling ice and frozen food, obtaining an undergraduate degree in business administration and, in the 1950s, teaming with an older businessman, Stanley B. Ringel, to sell insurance and mutual funds. In the late 1960s, Mr. Ringel and Mr. Bruno began selling office telephone equipment, forming what would become Coradian.

Mr. Bruno, who associates said was a gifted salesman, handled the marketing side and pursued a second career in politics, while Mr. Ringel, the chief executive, managed the day-to-day operations. By 1981, Coradian had revenues of $35 million and employed about 500 people.

But a major supplier dropped its contract, profits dried up, workers were let go, and an ailing Mr. Ringel stepped aside as chief executive, allowing Mr. Bruno to take over.

In the years after Mr. Bruno was elected to the State Senate in 1976, questions were raised about possible ethical conflicts, since Coradian received $1.5 million in state contracts from 1983 to 1988, according to The Times Union of Albany. The State Commission on Government Integrity investigated Coradian's contracts with state and local government agencies in 1988, but reported no evidence of wrongdoing.

By 1989, with Coradian hemorrhaging cash and unable to pay its debts, the company was put up for sale. It hired a consultant to interview 24 prospective buyers, but 19 expressed no interest, securities filings showed.

Mitel, a Canadian firm that was a major equipment supplier to Coradian, eventually agreed to buy it, paying $10 million in cash and assuming $13 million in debt. Numerous newspaper accounts since then, including in The Times, have stated or implied that the $23 million sale price resulted in a windfall for Mr. Bruno worth millions of dollars.

In reality, Mr. Bruno owned only enough shares to earn at most $383,000 from the sale, according to the securities filings, and he agreed to remain with the newly merged company for a couple of years at his old salary of $110,000.

George L. Benson, Coradian's president at the time of the sale, recalled recently that "nobody made a lot of money out of it, I can tell you that. It was a graceful exit. That was all it was."

Even before leaving Coradian, Mr. Bruno began pursuing other ways to make money, an effort that intensified after the sale of the company. One of the earliest was a partnership called First Grafton that he created in 1987, along with his brother and some friends, to purchase and develop a large tract of forest into home sites, a project that seemed vexed from the start and would not be completed until just a few years ago.

After two of his original partners bowed out, Mr. Bruno's solution — to replace them with two lawyer-lobbyists he knew from his work at Coradian and the state capital — inflamed old charges of ethical carelessness that had begun to dog his Senate career. The ensuing uproar forced Mr. Bruno to place his interest in First Grafton into a blind trust.

One of the lobbyists, James D. Featherstonhaugh, has represented dozens of special interest groups, including banks, insurance companies, the horse racing industry and labor unions. In December, the federal grand jury investigating Mr. Bruno sent a subpoena to Mr. Featherstonhaugh for First Grafton's records.

Mr. Featherstonhaugh said everyone involved in First Grafton had lost money, and he estimated Mr. Bruno's losses totaled about $150,000 over the 17 years that the project dragged on. Despite that, he said Mr. Bruno "never seemed to be in financial stress." The senator, he said, tended to be frugal.

"He has never struck me as either outrageously wealthy or poor," Mr. Featherstonhaugh said. "He just seemed to me to be kind of O.K."

Mr. Bruno's willingness to mix public and private interests was apparent in another real estate deal he entered into in 1999, when he and his son Joseph bought a small apartment house in Troy from Russell C. Ball, a state contractor whose wife, Dori Evans, served as finance director for the Senate Republican campaign committee, which Mr. Bruno controls.

Mr. Ball's Brooklyn-based company, which does underground utility work, has had contracts on several major state projects, and a couple of years ago he created a nonprofit group that purchased full-page newspaper ads saluting Mr. Bruno. An official familiar with the investigation said the F.B.I. has questioned people about Mr. Ball's relationship with Mr. Bruno. Mr. Ball had no comment.

Not long after buying the building, Mr. Bruno's son decided he wanted out, and Mr. Bruno tapped a friend and neighbor, Joseph L. Magno, to step in and replace his son in the investment and on a $235,000 loan used to buy the property.

"He literally said, 'Will you please help me out,' " said Mr. Magno, who is now a lobbyist. He said that he lost as much as $30,000 on the investment, and that Mr. Bruno lost money as well.

Mr. Magno was not just a friend, but also an investor in high-tech companies. In 2000, Mr. Magno agreed to help Mr. Bruno, the senator secured $150,000 in state money to start a statewide trade association of technology firms headed by Mr. Magno.

The same year, an Internet company called Go2pay, whose directors included Mr. Magno, received $250,000 in state economic development funds, at a ceremony presided over by Mr. Bruno and Gov. George E. Pataki.

Mr. Bruno did not lose money on all his ventures. His financial disclosure statements showed that he seemed to have earned money, on a regular basis, from the consulting business he started, Capital Business Consultants L.L.C.

In a news conference in December when he revealed the F.B.I. inquiry, Mr. Bruno said he provided advice on marketing and business development to lawyers and businesspeople. He declined to release information about his fees or the names of his clients, though some have been identified as a result of the investigation.

One of his first clients was McGinn Smith, an Albany investment firm. Mr. Bruno has invested both personal and campaign funds in companies controlled by McGinn Smith's chairman, Timothy M. McGinn. In 1999, Mr. Bruno reported making an undisclosed amount of money on the sale of stock in Pointe Financial, a bank holding company of which Mr. McGinn was chairman. It was one of Mr. Bruno's few profitable stock investments in recent years.

Another consulting client was Jared Abbruzzese, a businessman and friend who has flown Mr. Bruno around on private jets and who, until recently, was part of a group competing for a statewide horse racing franchise. From 2002 to 2004, Mr. Bruno decided to award $500,000 in discretionary state grants to a company in which Mr. Abbruzzese was a major investor, Evident Technologies.

The F.B.I. is now investigating Mr. Bruno's dealings with both McGinn Smith and Mr. Abbruzzese, people who have been briefed about the inquiry said.

Mr. Bruno has defended his use of state money to support Evident and other businesses, saying his only goal was to create jobs. His aides have also shrugged off questions about his overlapping personal and public interests, saying that Mr. Bruno has been in business and politics so long that interaction with people in both spheres was unavoidable.

To old friends and supporters, some of whom have benefited from the millions in public money that Mr. Bruno has directed to projects over the years, the senator's current predicament is heartbreaking. Mr. Benson, who was once Mr. Bruno's partner at Coradian, said he recently heard about the F.B.I. investigation while listening to the radio and immediately called Mr. Bruno.

DOJ_NMG_0136095

"Joe called me back and left a message, saying he was O.K., that he had been re-elected majority leader and that everything was under control," Mr. Benson said from his home in Wisconsin. "But I have to say, he didn't sound all that good."

Brothel Leaders Sentenced (SEAPI)

By COLIN McDONALD, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, February 24, 2007

3 Chinese face prison, deportation

The three leaders of a ring of Seattle-area brothels and escort services were sentenced in U.S. District Court on Friday to two and three years in prison.

Kesheng Zhu, 38, Rujing Jiang, 36, and Yong Jun Kang, 36, who are all Chinese citizens and in the U.S. illegally, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to transport individuals for prostitution and conspiracy to launder money.

According to court documents, Zhu and his wife, Rujing, started in the prostitution business in 2003 with the opening of the Apple Spa massage parlor in Bellevue as the front for a brothel. The business was sold to Kang in early 2004 for $10,000, then raided that April by the Eastside Narcotics Task Force. Officers found hundreds of used condoms in the massage parlor's garbage.

One of the prostitutes who worked at the spa told investigators that a man, believed to be Kang or Zhu, would arrive at the business at the end of the day, pick up the money and receptionist, then lock the prostitutes inside the building.

Zhu, Jiang and Kang weren't charged with a crime then, but Zhu was deported to China. Jiang remained in the U.S. because she was pregnant with their child. Kang did not show up for his deportation hearing, court documents show.

Zhu then paid to be smuggled back into the U.S., where, with the help of Kang, he set up an escort service by placing ads in The Stranger and Seattle Weekly. Investigators later discovered that Kang had fled to Portland, where he set up a brothel. By May of 2005 Kang was back in Seattle operating another brothel in a private home in Seattle, according to prosecutors.

Both Zhu and Kang used a national network of prostitutes and brothels. That meant women would rotate every eight to 14 days among the brothels. Most of the women were in the United States on expired visas and came from across Asia.

In taped phone conversations used by prosecutors, Kang and Zhu talked with customers as if the brothels were restaurants and the women were food dishes using "kimchee" to refer to a Korean prostitute and "pho dish" for a Vietnamese woman.

During their 21-month investigation, investigators followed Zhu and Kang as they picked up and dropped off women at Sea-Tac Airport and at local hotels, documented Jiang's work as a secretary and manager of a brothel, put tracking devices on vehicles and paid a former customer of Kang's more than $30,000 for information.

In August the investigators arrested Zhu, Kang and Jiang along with six others tied to prostitution in the Seattle area.

Judge John Coughenour sentenced Zhu to 36 months in prison and Kang and Jiang to 24 months each. Because they are all in the county illegally, deportation proceedings to China will begin after they have served their sentences.

Zhu and Jiang will most likely not be reunited with their 2 1/2-year-old son until they are back in China, said defense lawyer Paula Deutsch.

"To become an orphan overnight," Jiang said about her son through an interpreter at her sentencing. "To lose a parent's love, I cannot express how this feels."

3 Chinese Nationals Sentenced To Prison Terms (AP)

AP, February 26, 2007

SEATTLE (AP) - Three Chinese nationals were sentenced to prison terms today in U.S. District Court in Seattle for conspiracy to transport individuals in furtherance of prostitution.

All three individuals will be deported following their prison terms.

The government says one was a brothel operator and two ran an escort service.

36-year-old Yong Jun Kang of Seattle was sentenced to two years in prison for conspiracy to transport individuals in furtherance of prostitution, conspiracy to transport and harbor illegal aliens and conspiracy to launder money. The government says Kang operated brothels in Seattle and Portland, Oregon.

38-year-old Kesheng Zhu and his wife, 36-year-old Rujing Jiang, both of Seattle, were sentenced for conspiracy to transport individuals in furterance of transportation. Zhu was sentenced to two years and nine months, while Jiang was sentenced to two years in prison.

The government says the couple ran an escort service in Seattle that was a front for prostitution, providing prostitutes to customers who called from homes, apartments and hotels in the Seattle area.

4 Alleged Gang Members Ordered Held (HC)

By Cindy George, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 24, 2007

The suspects all have lengthy criminal records

A federal judge ordered detention Friday for four alleged Texas Syndicate gang members who sought release pending trial.

Seventeen Houston-area men are charged in an indictment that alleges murders, armed robberies and drug trafficking.

The four who will remain detained after a two-day hearing this week are: Francisco Nuncio Jr., 34; Johnny Perez Jr., 35 of Houston; Robbie Lee Danas, 35, of Rosenberg; George Duran, 39, of Baytown.

While saying each was dangerous, U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley declined to call any of them flight risks, noting their families, employment histories and community ties.

Nuncio and Perez face charges that could bring them death sentences. All four have lengthy criminal records and two are convicted murderers.

Perez served time for a killing in the 1980s and had posted a bond for a pending murder charge in Harris County. His lawyer offered a letter from a Houston parish priest calling Perez "a kind, gentle and respectful person.

Duran also was convicted of murder 20 years ago. Nuncio was on federal supervision when he was arrested in a roundup last week and Danas, a six-time felon, is a "habitual criminal," Botley said.

The 11-count indictment is led by a 14-charge racketeering conspiracy, followed by accusations of three murders, five armed robberies along with marijuana and cocaine trafficking charges.

Grounds for detention were based on testimony this week from an FBI agent who has worked for five years building the case. Special Agent Randy Durney said the agency began investigating murders credited to the Texas Syndicate in 2002. The gang was founded in the Texas prison system in the 1970s and employs killing and stealing to enrich its members and preserve its power. Membership is lifelong, Durney said.

"This is a dangerous group of people who have no respect for each other or for the laws of the United States," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim Braley.

Four defendants — Jesus Galvan Jr., Roberto Garza, Michael Thaman and Jerry Villarreal — waived their detention hearings.

Nine others are serving time in various prisons and jails.

Judge: Texas Prison Gang Members To Remain In Jail (AP)

AP, February 24, 2007

(AP) HOUSTON A Texas prison gang's violent exploits over the last eight years, including murders and brutal robberies, were detailed over a two-day court hearing that ended Friday with a federal judge ordering four of the members to be held without bond.

Francisco Nuncio, Jr., 34, of Houston; Robbie Lee Danas, 35, of Rosenberg; George Duran, 39, of Baytown; and Johnny Perez Jr., 35, of Houston were part of a group of 17 members of the Texas Syndicate who were the targets of a five-year FBI investigation.

The federal probe resulted in an 11-count indictment charging the men with a variety of crimes in the Houston area, including murder, racketeering, aggravated robbery and drug trafficking.

Six of the gang members, including Nuncio and Perez, face a possible death sentence for their part in several murders.

DOJ_NMG_0136097

While the four men who appeared before U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley for their probable cause and detention hearing had such innocuous nicknames as "Porkchop" and "Sleepy," an FBI agent testified they were violent and ruthless individuals who wouldn't hesitate killing members of their own gang.

FBI agent Randy Durney said federal authorities began investigating the gang after learning from confidential sources the group was responsible for a series of murders in the Houston area.

Using wire taps and confidential informants, some who were gang members, Durney said the FBI learned the Texas Syndicate would routinely rob drug dealers at their homes.

One man was shot and killed for 50 pounds of marijuana. At another drug robbery, gang members stole $69,000 and two kilos of cocaine, Durney said.

Texas Syndicate members also killed two men for falsely claiming to be members of the group, Durney said.

During his lengthy testimony, Durney described how gang members would meet, sometimes at bars or at family barbecues, to vote on whether to kill other members.

One member was targeted for murder because he wasn't participating in gang business or regularly attending meetings.

Another was targeted for having an affair with another member's wife. He survived a shooting and was given a reprieve as long as he ended the affair. When he failed to do so, another vote was taken to kill him. But the order was not carried out, Durney said.

Defense attorneys for the four gang members tried to imply the confidential informants helping investigators were lying to protect crimes they had committed.

"Do you have a single eyewitness against Mr. Nuncio that is not participating in the crimes?" Richard Kuniansky, Nuncio's attorney, asked. Durney replied no.

Other defense attorneys said their clients joined the gang in prison simply to survive.

Baton Rouge Woman Pleads Guilty To Fraud (BRADV)

Baton Rouge Advocate, February 24, 2007

A Baton Rouge woman pleaded guilty in federal court to one count of making a false claim for disaster assistance benefits.

According to court documents, Latoya Dunn submitted a fraudulent application for FEMA benefits, falsely claiming that her primary residence had been damaged during Hurricane Katrina.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency mailed Dunn a $2,000 check.

Dunn could be sentenced to five years in prison, a fine of $250,000, or both, as well as additional court costs.

Ex-broker In Area Firm Is Charged With Scam; Investment Fraud May Reach $40M (TOLB)

By Mark Reiter, BLADE STAFF WRITER

Toledo Blade (OH), February 17, 2007

The former manager and vice president of a Toledo brokerage firm was charged yesterday in federal court in a $17 million-to-$40 million investment scam.

William A. Sirls of Grosse Ile, Mich., was charged in U.S. District Court in Toledo with money laundering and mail fraud.

A bill of information filed in the court alleges Mr. Sirls, who was manager and vice president of a Toledo Wachovia Securities office, engaged in fraudulent investment transactions to bilk investors, co-workers, and others in a Ponzi scheme.

The scheme, which began in January, 2000, and continued until September, 2006 - nearly 18 months after he left Wachovia, was used to defraud an estimated 45 people, federal prosecutors said.

But Toledo attorney Stephen Hartman said the case against his client emerged only after Mr. Sirls went to authorities late last year and confessed.

"There was no catching him in the act. He turned himself in and voluntarily came in and told authorities about his activities. He never did get caught," Mr. Hartman said.

The two charges carry a possible sentence of 30 years in prison and more than $34 million in fines.

Mr. Sirls, if convicted, would face a substantial reduction in punishment under federal sentencing guidelines because of his cooperation.

DOJ_NMG_0136098

Mr. Hartman said his client, the divorced father of two children, confessed to the activities partly out of guilt and to get it off his chest.

"He didn't feel right about it," he said. "A lot of people were shocked after he confessed. Some of the people who were [affected as investors] have been very supportive of him. He has done a lot of work in his life for charities and civic causes.

The government's case alleges that an assortment of fraudulent transactions involving bogus stocks and nonexistent property were used to lure money from investors.

In one method, investors were sold interests in what they were told were the last remaining unsold homes in a newly constructed housing development and that the discounted real estate could be flipped for a profit.

Other investors believed they were earning profits on purported stocks from nonexistent brokerage firms that were made available after the stock was ordered but never paid for by clients.

And investors were falsely promised returns on short-term promissory notes with high rates of interests.

Mr. Sirls also is accused of operating a Ponzi scheme, in which investors are paid returns resulting not from actual investment profits but from funds generated from new investors.

When he left in March, 2005, Mr. Sirls was manager of the Wachovia's former office on West Sylvania Avenue near Talmadge Road in West Toledo.

"At this point, because it is the subject of an ongoing investigation, we decline comment," said Tony Mattera, a spokesman for Wachovia, one of the nation's largest brokerage chains.

Randy Hunt, vice president of Wachovia's downtown Toledo offices in One SeaGate, said he was unaware of any investigation into Mr. Sirls' activities while he was employed at Wachovia.

Mr. Hartman disputed the amount of money that federal investigators believe was taken in the investment scams.

"While we agreed to have him charged in an information, we don't necessarily agree with the amount. We are still looking at the history to determine the actual loss that people suffered," he said.

"A vast majority of people got their money back and, in fact, the vast majority got their money back with interest. But that doesn't excuse what he did."

The reaction of former co-workers and colleagues was disbelief and shock.

"You've got to be kidding. I can't believe it," said John Carroll, the owner of River Road Investors and a former Wachovia employee.

Mr. Carroll knew Mr. Sirls from the days when the Toledo Wachovia offices were under the name First Union Securities.

After learning about Mr. Sirls' resignation two years ago, Mr. Carroll said he called him and wished him well in his future endeavors.

"I am perplexed. I am shocked. You hate to hear about that when it is about someone you like," he said.

An investment broker for nearly 40 years, Mr. Carroll feared that the scandal would harm the reputation of the firm and employees in the industry.

"It gives brokerages a bad name and drags down everybody who is in the business," he said.

Montana Man Sentenced To 15 Years In Online Luring Case (SEAPI)

By Casey McNerthney, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, February 24, 2007

Federal investigation part of nationwide effort

A Montana man was sentenced in federal court Friday to five years in prison and 15 years of supervised release for traveling to Washington state and attempting to have sex with a minor.

Andy Maxfield, 55, was arrested September 12 at a Holiday Inn in Kent, where police say he intended to meet a 13-year-old girl. He had been investigated since June 2006 when he entered an online chat room under the screen name "Gentlooking4fun" and contacted a federal investigator posing as the girl's mother, Department of Justice officials said.

Maxfield engaged in sexually explicit chat with the undercover officer, who posed as the girl, according to court documents. The former bus driver also made arrangements to engage in sexual activity with the minor, the documents said.

In online conversations, Maxfield told the 13-year-old he would teach her about sexual activity and that she was not to tell anyone about it because he would go to jail, Justice Department spokeswoman Emily Langlie said.

Maxfield brought condoms to the Holiday Inn hoping to meet the mother and daughter, but met federal agents instead, according to court documents.

"The United States Attorney's Office is committed to the aggressive prosecution of sexual predators like Maxfield," said Jeffrey C. Sullivan, U.S. Attorney for the western district of Washington.

U.S. District Court Judge Thomas S. Zilly said the 15-year period of federal supervision following his imprisonment was appropriate for the case.

Maxfield's case was brought as part of Project Safe Childhood -- a nationwide initiative designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse. The program was launched in 2006, following a year when federal prosecutors charged 1,447 child exploitation cases involving child pornography, coercion and enticement offenses, according to the Department of Justice.

Sex-offender Residency Laws Get Second Look (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, February 26, 2007

Oklahoma state Rep. Lucky Lamons was a police officer for 22 years. He calls himself a "lock-'em-up kind of guy."

Yet Lamons wants to loosen his state's law that bans registered sex offenders from living within 2,000 feet of a school or day care center. He says it forces many offenders to live in rural areas where they are difficult for authorities to monitor. Also, he says, it does not differentiate between real predators and the type of men he recalls arresting for urinating in public, a sex offense in Oklahoma.

"We need to focus on people we're afraid of, not mad at," says Lamons, a Tulsa Democrat who wants the rules to focus more on high-risk offenders.

Lamons is among a growing number of officials who want to ease the "not-in-my-backyard" policies that communities are using to try to control sex offenders. In the past decade, 27 states and hundreds of cities have reacted to public fear of sex crimes against children by passing residency restrictions that, in some cases, have the effect of barring sex offenders from large parts of cities. They can't live in most of downtown Tulsa, Atlanta or Des Moines, for example, because of overlapping exclusion zones around schools and day care centers.

Now a backlash is brewing. Several states, including Iowa, Oklahoma and Georgia, are considering changes in residency laws that have led some sex offenders to go underground. Such offenders either have not registered with local police as the laws require or they have given fake addresses. Many complain they cannot find a place to live legally.

The push to ease residency restrictions has support from victims' advocates, prosecutors and police who say they spend too much time investigating potential violations.

They're battling a mountain of momentum, however, because residency restrictions remain popular.

New or expanded ones have been proposed in 20 states this year. Some legislators are reluctant to pare back restrictions they passed only recently.

DOJ_NMG_0136100

"We ought to give it time to work," says state Rep. Jerry Keen, author of Georgia's law, passed last year, which bans sex offenders from living, working or loitering within 1,000 feet of where kids gather. Keen, Republican majority leader of the House, says Georgia's rules put children's safety before the convenience of sex offenders.

Illinois Attorney General Lisa Madigan has a similar view. "We're trying to protect children," she says. "We're dealing with people raping children. These are horrible crimes." She says Illinois' restrictions target those who have seriously hurt children.

Others see growing problems with the residency laws.

Broad restrictions provide a "false sense of security," says Nancy Sabin of the Jacob Wetterling Foundation, which fights child exploitation. She says such laws do not protect the more than 90% of abused children who suffer at the hands of people they know. And many of the laws bar offenders from living near schools but do not stop them from loitering there, she says.

Most of the restrictions also lump all sex offenders together, even though some are child rapists and others may be 18-year-old men who had sex with underage girlfriends. There is no national breakdown of sex offenders by severity of their crimes.

"You can't paint sex offenders with a broad brush," says John Walsh, host of Fox network's America's Most Wanted. He says residency laws are worthwhile only if they can be enforced, and tens of thousands of the nation's 600,000 sex offenders are giving police fake addresses.

Walsh prodded Congress to pass a law last year — named for his son Adam, who was abducted and killed 25 years ago — that makes failure to register a felony for serious sex offenders such as rapists and child molesters. Those are the people Walsh says residency rules should target.

Some state lawmakers are trying to move in that direction:

•Iowa — Legislators began holding hearings in January on the effectiveness of a 2002 law that bars sex offenders from living within 2,000 feet of a school or day care facility. Sen. Keith Kreiman, Democratic co-chairman of the Judiciary Committee, says he expects the law to be revised but not repealed. "It is very politically risky to even hold hearings," he says, because lawmakers who change the rules could be called "soft on crime."

State figures show sexual-abuse convictions have remained steady since the law took effect, but the number of sex offenders failing to register has more than doubled. Sen. Jerry Behn, a Republican who wrote Iowa's law, says it may be overly broad. He says he's talking to colleagues about how to focus on "true predators."

•Oklahoma — Like Lamons, other legislators say they'll try to narrow their state's restrictions. "Let's apply them to those who are the highest risk to society," says state Rep. Gus Blackwell, the Republican majority whip.

Sgt. Gary Stansill, head of the Tulsa Police Department's sex-crimes unit, says the current law applies to too many offenders and that he spends "way, way too much of my time" trying to enforce it. He says he investigates as many cases of sex offenders not registering as he investigates rape reports. He considers less than 10% of the state's 8,000 convicted sex offenders to be high-risk and is lobbying lawmakers to focus on them.

•Georgia — Republican state Rep. Robert Mumford, vice chairman of a judiciary panel, says he plans to propose a bill to scale back the state's law. With the backing of the Georgia Sheriffs' Association, he suggests removing many bus stops and churches from the list of areas where offenders are banned.

•Kansas — On Feb. 12, the state Senate passed a bill that extends for another year Kansas' moratorium on local governments restricting where sex offenders can live.

Some cities have rejected such restrictions. Among them: Topeka; Maplewood, Minn.; and Covington, Ky.

Several offenders have challenged residency rules in court, claiming they unfairly punish offenders who have served their time. In December, New Jersey Superior Court Judge Valerie Armstrong rejected a local ordinance as too broad. She said it had several flaws. For example, she said, it violated U.S. law that says being on a sex offender registry cannot disqualify someone from housing.

Many of the state laws are known as "Jessica's Laws" because they were passed or expanded after the slaying in Florida of 9-year-old Jessica Lunsford in 2005. Her neighbor, convicted sex offender John Couey, is on trial for the crime.

The surge in residency restrictions happened in the absence of research proving that they work.

DOJ_NMG_0136101

"Residency restrictions have a lot of unintended consequences," says Jill Levenson, professor of human services at Lynn University in Boca Raton, Fla. She says many offenders are "more likely to resume a life of crime" if pushed into rural areas, because they have less access to jobs and mental health services that bring them needed stability.

Levenson surveyed 135 sex offenders in Florida, which passed a law in 2003 barring those who hurt children from living within 1,000 feet of where kids gather. Most said they had been careful not to commit crimes near their homes, so residency rules made little difference. Others said that even outside restricted areas, they live near kids.

Sex offenders seeking victims are likely to go to another neighborhood so they won't be recognized, the Minnesota Department of Corrections found in a 2003 study.

In Colorado, convicted molesters who committed more offenses lived no closer to schools or child care centers than those who had not re-offended, according to a report in 2004 by the state's Department of Public Safety.

In Arkansas, however, Jeffrey Walker of the University of Arkansas found in 2001 that child molesters are nearly twice as likely to live near schools than those convicted of sexually assaulting adults. Walker says he doesn't know why that's the case, or whether proximity to kids makes them more likely to offend again.

The need for housing for paroled sex offenders in Illinois is "close to crisis levels" because of residency restrictions, says Jorge Montes, chairman of the Illinois Prisoner Review Board. He says it's in a Catch-22 situation, because without a place to live, a parolee cannot be released.

"We go into cyclical incarceration," he says, adding that more than 400 sex offenders are doing parole in prison because they have no place to go. He says many are not child predators.

Janet Allison, 45, a mother of five in Georgia, says she was forced to move from a four-bedroom home in downtown Dahlonega to a two-bedroom mobile home "way off on a dirt road" because she is a convicted sex offender and her former home was within a quarter-mile of a church.

Allison's situation also reflects how residency laws can affect those who aren't sexual predators. Allison says she was arrested five years ago for allowing the 17-year-old boyfriend of her pregnant daughter, then 15, to move in with them. She was convicted of being a party to child molestation.

Allison didn't go to prison, but three of her children were put in foster care, and she's not allowed to have contact with her daughter or grandson. "I didn't touch anyone," Allison says. "I just thought I was protecting my daughter."

Keen, author of Georgia's residency law, says it applies to all released sex offenders, regardless of their offense, because the state has not classified them by risk. He says those released in the future will be assessed, and the restrictions will target more serious offenders.

Dyersville, Iowa, is among the cities with the strictest residency laws for sex offenders: It bars them from living anywhere in the city.

Mayor Jim Heavens says the city did so to protect public safety and property values. "We consider this a crude tool, but at least we can do something. We're not trying to banish people," he says, adding that the city might make an exception for sex offenders who pose little risk to public safety.

Researchers who study sex offenders say that other approaches could be more effective in dealing with released sex offenders than broad residency laws:

•More checks by probation officers — David Finkelhor of the Crimes Against Children Research Center at the University of New Hampshire says the best way to monitor offenders is to require frequent meetings with well-trained officers.

•Mandatory therapy — Kim English of Colorado's Division of Criminal Justice recommends having freed offenders attend therapy in group residential centers.

•Polygraphing — Levenson says lie-detector tests also can be helpful, along with electronic monitoring and required driving logs.

Illinois is inviting officials from other states to a conference in April to discuss the effects of residency restrictions.

"Somebody is going to end up with a huge problem," says Frances Breyne of the Kansas Department of Corrections, "unless we all get on the same page."

CIVIL LAW:

Ga. Whistleblower Shakes Up U.S. Dept. Of Education (AJC)

By Bridget Gutierrez

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 26, 2007

Reading Teacher From Savannah Shows Flaws In Federal Progam

Savannah — Cindy Cupp strode into the kindergarten classroom at Heard Elementary Academy and launched into an introduction.

"Good morning, boys and girls! My name is Dr. Cupp, and I'm the reading doctor," she enthused as a girl giggled. "I'm not going to give shots or anything. I'm just going to listen to you read."

Cupp has been teaching children to read for 35 years. She's so good at it, she rose to the top — becoming Georgia's director of reading instruction — before she retired and created her own brand of "Dick and Jane" textbooks. But four years ago, Cupp found herself in a fight over her storybooks that led from her port city all the way to Washington.

Cupp had no idea what she was getting into in 2003 when she tried to have her "Dr. Cupp Readers" approved for use in Reading First, a major federal initiative promising to make all children successful readers by fourth grade. Cupp just figured her company could benefit from the $6 billion flowing to schools for new reading programs.

Now, after years of pursuing perceived wrongs that blocked Cupp Publishers from winning lucrative contracts, she stands as a key whistle-blower whose complaints helped touch off a federal audit of the Georgia Department of Education, a shake-up at the U.S. Department of Education and possible congressional hearings on conflicts of interest that may have compromised Reading First.

"This is what one person on a mission can do," said Dick Allington, a University of Tennessee education professor who has been critical of the handling of Reading First, a linchpin of President Bush's signature No Child Left Behind Act. "It was just sheer persistence on her part."

Nearly 150 elementary schools, including some in Atlanta and in Clayton and DeKalb counties, are serving 53,000 Georgia students through Reading First. So far, nearly $100 million has been spent statewide on textbooks, training and reading specialists.

Cupp's curriculum — which teaches children to read with phonics instruction, where students decipher the sounds letters make, and by tutoring in common words — is used in about 80 elementary schools. Only three are part of Reading First.

State and federal officials have said mistakes made in implementing the program have been corrected, but deny taking any intentional actions that may have favored big national publishers with connections over smaller companies such as Cupp's.

"It is a very effective program," said Katherine McLane, a spokeswoman at the U.S. Department of Education. "It's very regrettable to see it viewed in this light, rather than in the light of its merits."

Turned down by state

When Sheree Bryant, an associate superintendent for instruction in Butts County, wanted to apply for Reading First funds, her school system about 45 miles south of Atlanta already had used Cupp's program in one class with success. But the state education department, which was doling out the grants, initially turned down Butts' request, which included funding for Cupp's material.

Reading First rules required use of materials proved effective through research, a hallmark of the program. Some experts the state hired to review systems' applications for Reading First funds had never seen Cupp's curriculum, which uses stories about "Jack" and "Jilly" — a pair of cape-wearing turtles — to teach new words. Yet, according to Bryant and Cupp, her books received poor marks, dooming Butts' proposal.

After Cupp complained to state officials, they relented, but only allowed Butts County to use Cupp's readers on a limited basis. By then, Cupp said, most systems had selected other materials.

Clifford Johnson, a reading expert at Georgia State University, which is aligned with another literacy program called Reading Recovery, also complained to the State Board of Education about department officials.

DOJ_NMG_0136103

"They let it be known if you didn't adopt a certain type of material you wouldn't get Reading First funds," Johnson said. "Now, Cindy and I disagree on her program. But ... there ought to be freedom of choice and fair access to the public money."

After months of feeling thwarted in her attempts to get her series approved for Reading First schools, a friend suggested Cupp contact the Office of the Inspector General, a state agency created to root out corruption, waste and abuse in government. In March 2005, Cupp filed a complaint alleging that, as a small-time publisher, she was largely prevented from selling to Reading First schools.

An Oregon connection

The day she met with the agency, Cupp started to wonder why department officials acted the way they had. Why, for instance, did Georgia use a University of Oregon guide to screen textbooks such as Cupp's before they could be used in Reading First classrooms?

Unable to sleep, Cupp logged on to the Internet, began running searches on the university, and stumbled onto a newspaper article — "Oregon education professors wield influence with Bush" — that reported that the university had developed methods and a program for teaching students to read that had influenced the president's policies. One of those professors, the article said, was a longtime adviser to Bush.

For the first time in two years, Cupp said, she realized her problems went beyond Georgia. "I cried," Cupp recalled. "I thought: If there's that much strength ... that's coming from that high up in government, then what did one little person like me think I was gonna do?"

What Cupp did was begin researching the players behind Reading First, using e-mail and the Internet. She began finding professional connections between experts hired to assist with Reading First's national rollout, including some of those Oregon professors, and large textbook publishers for whom they also worked.

Emboldened, Cupp sent a complaint to the inspector general at the U.S. Education Department that May, alleging that Reading First had been rigged to force schools to use a handful of select products. Two weeks later, Robert Slavin, an education researcher at Johns Hopkins University, filed a similar complaint, saying his program, Success For All, also had been shut out. In August 2005, the Reading Recovery Council of North America followed with a third plea for an investigation.

"She was the first to submit a complaint. We would have done so anyway, but she gave us, perhaps, a model and a little courage to go forward with it," said Slavin, who began probing Reading First when he saw schools drop his program to get funding. "Filing a complaint like this is an extraordinarily dangerous thing to do. You don't do it unless you have exhausted all other alternatives."

Conflicts of interest

Much, but not all, of what Cupp found through her Internet sleuthing turned out to be true. In two recent reports, the federal inspector general gave a scathing review of the program that detailed rampant favoritism for certain teaching methods; conflicts of interest with consultants, including some of those Oregon professors, who were hired to advise states on products they themselves had authored; and willful disregard for the law, which prohibits the federal government from dictating specific curriculums.

Last month, the agency issued an audit of Georgia's program, which also backed Cupp's claims of bias, although she was not named. State officials have played down the audit, which charged that they ran the program with no written policies, hired consultants who had blatant conflicts of interest or didn't meet standards, and created mandates for publishers such as Cupp that were not part of approved guidelines.

Wanda Barrs, chairwoman of the State Board of Education, said through a spokesman that she was pleased the audit didn't find any malfeasance. "I know other states have been audited and the resulting reports were much harsher than what Georgia received."

Today, Cupp says her phone frequently rings with calls from staffers at the U.S. House Committee on Education and Labor, which is considering holding hearings on Reading First, and from journalists, including from ABC News and the New York Times, which has published a profile of her. This month, she received an award from the Wisconsin State Reading Association for her role in exposing the problems that led to a shake-up of federal employees overseeing Reading First and stronger policies to avoid conflicts of interest.

Now Cupp is waiting to hear whether the U.S. Department of Justice will open another investigation as she continues her life's work: visiting schools to assist teachers, checking students' progress and prescribing remedies for those who struggle.

As she walked down the hallway to leave Heard Elementary recently, Cupp stopped abruptly. "This is my song, can you hear it?" she asked as she stepped toward a classroom where kindergartners were singing.

"These are the letters of the alphabet! No we are not finished yet! Come join in and clap with me! As we learn the letters from A to Z!"

Within seconds, Cupp was in front of the class — smiling, clapping and leading her song.

Overly Punitive? (WP)

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

REGARDLESS OF what you think about tobacco companies, you should welcome last week's Supreme Court decision that repudiated an $80 million ruling against Philip Morris. Beyond question in this case was that the tobacco giant had misled Jesse Williams, a longtime cigarette smoker who died of lung cancer, into believing that smoking was not dangerous and that it therefore was culpable for his illness. The issue instead revolved around how the jury calculated the size of the punitive damages it awarded Mr. Williams's estate -- almost all of the $80 million package.

The majority held that the Oregon court considering the case should have made clear to the jury that it was not to punish Philip Morris directly for the harm it might have caused smokers other than Mr. Williams. During the trial, the plaintiff's lawyer asked the jury to consider the ill health the deceptively advertised product might have produced in other Oregonians. The result was a fat punitive award, though it is unclear how much the jury heeded the plaintiff's counsel when it settled on the amount. Regardless, the high court has set an important precedent: Defendants should not be punished for injuries they might have caused "strangers to the litigation," as Justice Stephen G. Breyer wrote in the majority opinion. Otherwise, they would not have a fair chance to defend themselves against the hypothetical harm they might have done to an unspecified number of people under varying conditions.

The question the court did not answer is whether the punitive award the jury handed down was "grossly excessive," a standard that the court established in the past but has not concretely defined. The court has indicated that punitive damages generally should be a single-digit multiple of the base compensation a jury awards a plaintiff. That vague standard and the current majority's sidestepping of the issue reflect the difficulty judges have had in establishing clear limits on the often outrageous size of punitive awards.

Capping punitive damages is a task suited for state legislatures, and it's one states should complete. States should also ensure that punitive damages -- meant to serve the public interest by punishing companies for wrongdoing, not to enrich plaintiffs -- go into public coffers.

Arlington Officials Scramble To Make Ice Center Fully Accessible (AP)

By Sarah Karush, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 26, 2007

ARLINGTON, Va. (AP) - When Arlington County officials unveiled a new ice complex to serve as the Washington Capitals' practice facility, they emphasized it would also be a community resource serving diverse groups, particularly the disabled.

So Rosemary Ciotti, who lives nearby and uses a wheelchair, was particularly dismayed when she visited the new facility shortly after it opened in November and discovered there was no room in the bleachers for her to watch the action on the ice. Despite its $42.8 million price tag, the Kettler Capitals Iceplex is not compliant with the Americans with Disabilities Act.

"It makes you want to bang your head against the wall," said Ciotti, a member of the county planning commission.

Another disabled Arlington resident, Sheri Denkensohn, said she visited the iceplex after hearing about the problems from Ciotti. Outraged by what she saw, she filed a complaint with the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0136105

Arlington officials say such glitches are common in construction projects. They say they already have addressed most of the ADA problems that were noted by building inspectors before the facility opened and are working to correct the problem with the bleachers.

In April, the Special Hockey International Tournament is expected to draw 1,500 people to the iceplex. In March, USA Disabled Hockey and other groups are hosting a sled hockey clinic there. Officials said the bleachers should be fixed in time for both events.

Construction of the iceplex was paid for by the county, and the Capitals signed a long-term lease. The 137,000-square-foot facility, built atop a seven-story public parking garage in Arlington's Ballston neighborhood, has two NHL-sized rinks, office space and locker rooms, as well as a Capitals training center with a weight room and medical facilities. It also houses the front offices of the Capitals and the WNBA's Washington Mystics.

The complex has regular ice time for skating programs and youth, high school and college hockey. In addition, the Capitals are donating 500 hours of ice time a year for "economically disadvantaged and physically and mentally challenged members of the community," according to a county news release issued in November.

But when the project was finished, officials learned they had committed several ADA no-no's: A men's room urinal was several inches too high, and a locker-room shower was half an inch too narrow. A door in front of a wheelchair ramp was too heavy.

But the biggest problem was the bleachers. Wheelchairs are supposed to be able to access the front row, but the only place for them at the ice rink is at the back, where they would block the exit, Ciotti said.

"There's really no lawful place to sit in your wheelchair," she said.

Tom Newman, real estate development director for Arlington Economic Development, said the mistake happened during last-minute changes to the project.

"It sort of got forgotten in the rush to get the building finished," he said.

Newman estimated it would cost $30,000 to $40,000 to fix the bleachers. He said the county would get it fixed first and then figure out who should pay for it.

A message seeking comment was left for William Drury, president of Reston-based Architecture Inc., the iceplex architect.

Ciotti, who joined the planning commission after the iceplex was nearly complete, worries the changes won't address all the concerns of disabled residents _ even if they do satisfy the legal requirements.

"What we keep saying is we want to be at the table and we want to see the fix," she said.

Ciotti said Arlington is by and large a hospitable place for the disabled. But she is frustrated that people still need to be reminded about ADA requirements.

"Architects know the ADA. They know what they're legally bound to do," she said. "The law is 17 years old."

Sharpton's Ancestor Was Owned By Thurmond's (WP)

By Robin Shulman

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 25 -- The Rev. Al Sharpton, the prominent civil rights activist, is descended from a slave owned by relatives of the late senator and one-time segregationist Strom Thurmond, a genealogical study released Sunday reported.

"It was probably the most shocking thing of my life," Sharpton said of learning the findings, which were requested and published Sunday by the New York Daily News. He called a news conference to respond publicly to the report. "I couldn't describe to you the emotions I have had . . . everything from anger to outrage to reflection to some pride and glory."

Sharpton, 52, said he had suspected that his forebears may have been slaves but had never attempted to confirm that or find out any details.

"I had never really traced my family history, particularly on my father's side, since my parents separated when I was going on 10 years old," he said.

The newfound knowledge that his great-grandfather was a slave, Sharpton added, gave him a new perspective on his life.

DOJ_NMG_0136106

"You think about the distance that you've come, you think about how brutal it was, you think about how life must have been like for him. And then you start wondering whether or not he would be proud or disappointed in what we have done," Sharpton said, with his eldest daughter, Dominique, 20, at his side.

The revelation was particularly stunning for the juxtaposition of the two men's public lives.

Sharpton, known for his fiery rhetoric and a tendency to intervene as an advocate in racially charged incidents, ran for president in 2004 on a ticket promoting racial justice. Thurmond made his own bid for the presidency in 1948, promising to preserve racial segregation, and in 1957 he filibustered for more than 24 hours against a civil rights bill.

After his death in 2003, though, it became clear that Thurmond had a complicated history with issues of race. A 78-year-old retired schoolteacher, Essie Mae Washington-Williams, revealed that she was the offspring of his extramarital relationship with his family's black housekeeper.

"In the story of the Thurmonds and the Sharptons is the story of the shame and the glory of America," Sharpton said Sunday.

The genealogy study was produced by researchers for the Web site Ancestry.com. Daily News reporter Austin Fenner initially asked them to research his own roots. He then approached Sharpton and asked if he would permit an investigation of his family history as well, for use in a story. Sharpton agreed. Neither the Daily News nor Sharpton paid for the research.

The research was led by chief Ancestry.com genealogist Megan Smolenyak, who was also the lead researcher for the 1997 PBS series "Ancestors" and has written several books on the subject. She was assisted by researchers including Tony Burroughs, who has been honored by the National Genealogical Society. They used documents including census, marriage, death and military records over a three-week period to examine Sharpton's family roots.

They found that Sharpton's great-grandfather, Coleman Sharpton, was a slave owned by Strom Thurmond's distant cousin.

Coleman Sharpton was given as a gift to Julia Thurmond, whose grandfather was the late senator's great-great-grandfather, said Mike Ward, a spokesman for Ancestry.com. Coleman Sharpton was later freed.

Al Sharpton met Strom Thurmond once with his friend James Brown, the late singer, who knew Thurmond and wanted to pay him a visit while in Washington.

"I was not happy to visit him because of what he had been all his life," Sharpton said.

Sharpton said his family origins in Edgefield County, S.C., brought him nearer to his closest mentors, Brown and the Rev. Jesse Jackson, who had lived nearby. Sharpton said he mused with Brown's family about whether their families might have a shared past.

"I told his daughters last night about this, and we all wondered whether some of James Brown's family might have been slaves with my great-grandfather," Sharpton said.

While some of Thurmond's relatives contacted by the Daily News expressed skepticism about the report, Doris Strom Costner, a cousin of the late senator, said Sharpton should be proud to know his family's connection to hers. "He's in a mighty good family," she said by telephone from Edgefield, S.C.

Asked how she feels to learn of evidence that her family owned slaves, she said: "I can't help it. I'm 74 years old, and I certainly can't help it. I don't feel one way or the other." Most white South Carolinians at the time owned slaves, she said.

Sharpton said he hoped the news of his roots would help heal the lingering wounds of slavery.

"If we open the scars just to leave them open, we've done a misdeed to both sides," Sharpton said. "We should open them and deal with them toward healing them so we can come together on some genuine level."

Staff writer Rob Stein and staff researcher Rena Kirsch in Washington contributed to this report.

Sharpton Learns His Forebears Were Thurmonds' Slaves (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

On the eve of the Civil War, in segregated Florida, a white man died in debt at age 40, leaving his wife, Julia Thurmond Sharpton, alone to raise their four children and to honor his financial obligations.

Determined to offer a helping hand, Mrs. Sharpton's father-in-law, a plantation owner in South Carolina, gave her a gift: four slaves, two adults and two children, who would work to pay off the money owed.

DOJ_NMG_0136107

In that transaction, the bloodlines of two emblematic figures of the next century, each representing an opposite side of America's racial divide, intersected. Mrs. Sharpton was a first cousin, twice removed, of Senator Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, a longtime segregationist. And one of the slaves given to her, Coleman Sharpton, was the paternal great-grandfather of the Rev. Al Sharpton, one of the most vocal and recognizable civil rights leaders of our time.

The connection, sealed in a slave contract signed in 1861, might have remained unknown had it not been for a Web site's efforts to publicize its extensive collection of African-American genealogy records, a reporter's curiosity and Mr. Sharpton's willingness to let researchers dig into his family's past, a topic he often avoids discussing in public.

The results of the investigation, pieced together from census documents, slave narratives and birth and marriage registries, were unveiled yesterday in The Daily News, with the front-page headline, "Shock of My Life!"

"In the story of the Thurmonds and the Sharptons is the story of the shame and the glory of America," Mr. Sharpton said at a news conference at the office of The Daily News yesterday, with the older of his two daughters, Dominique, standing behind him.

"The shame is that people were owned as property, and the shame is that I'm the heir of those who were property to the Thurmond family," he said. "The glory is that Strom Thurmond ran for president in 1948 on a segregationist ticket; I ran in '04 on a ticket for racial justice, and that shows what America can become, if you're determined to beat" discrimination.

Mr. Sharpton said he had not heard from the Thurmonds and had no immediate plans of contacting them. "This is not family," he said firmly. "This is property."

While news of Mr. Sharpton's link to Mr. Thurmond might have tickled the public's curiosity, its impact was tame when compared with the shock of four years ago, when Essie Mae Washington-Williams, the daughter of the Thurmond family's black maid, stepped forward to acknowledge that she was the senator's daughter.

Ms. Washington-Williams, as well as Mr. Thurmond's other daughter and two sons, did not return phone calls last night.

Mr. Sharpton was born in Brooklyn on Oct. 3, 1954, the son of Alfred Charles Sharpton and Ada Richards. His parents divorced before he turned 10; he and his father have since had a distant relationship, he said yesterday.

Ancestry.com approached The Daily News last month seeking to publicize its African-American ancestry database, which it says contains 55 million historical documents. A reporter asked Mr. Sharpton if he would agree to have the Web site's researchers look into his family history. Mr. Sharpton said he had never considered investigating his lineage and did not know that his father's side of the family had roots in South Carolina.

The researchers tracked three generations of Mr. Sharpton's ancestors to the pre-Civil War era, eventually uncovering the slave contract, also known as indenture, in the Liberty County Courthouse in Bristol, Fla., about an hour west of Tallahassee.

The contract registered the ownership transfer of Coleman Sharpton, along with a woman and two boys, presumably his wife and sons, to Julia Thurmond Sharpton.

The familiar middle name spurred Megan Smolenyak, the Web site's chief family historian, to "play six degrees of separation," she said, reviewing Mrs. Sharpton's own past and establishing a blood connection between her and Senator Thurmond.

Coleman Sharpton took his surname from his owners, as was common practice among slaves, Ms. Smolenyak said. After emancipation, he worked as a wood hauler, at least until age 65, as recorded in the 1900 census.

"I cannot redo what happened to my great-grandfather, but I can make him say that I'm glad my great-grandson redeemed what happened," Mr. Sharpton said.

"I would hope that this story will make America deal with the pains of its past and present, the continued fight for social equity," he added. "But I also would hope that it would encourage obligation of many of us in the African-American community that have ourselves not lived up to the dreams and hopes of those who suffered before us."

Report: Sharpton Descended From Slaves Owned By Strom Thurmond's Relatives (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 26, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) — Genealogists have revealed that the Rev. Al Sharpton is a descendent of a slave owned by relatives of the late Sen. Strom Thurmond — a discovery the civil rights activist on Sunday called "shocking."

DOJ_NMG_0136108

Sharpton learned of his connection to Thurmond, once a prominent defender of segregation, last week through the Daily News, which asked genealogists to trace his roots.

"It was probably the most shocking thing in my life," Sharpton said at a news conference Sunday, the same day the tabloid revealed the story.

Some of Thurmond's relatives said the nexus also came as a surprise to them. Doris Strom Costner, a distant cousin who said she knew the late senator all her life, said Sunday she "never heard of such a thing."

"My momma never would talk to me about nothing like that," Costner said of ancestors who owned slaves. "She only talked to me about good things."

The revelations surfaced after Ancestry.com contacted a Daily News reporter who agreed to have his own family tree done. The intrigued reporter then turned around and asked Sharpton if he wanted to participate. Sharpton said he told the paper, "Go for it."

The genealogists, who were not paid by the newspaper, uncovered the ancestral ties using a variety of documents that included census, marriage and death records.

Thurmond, of South Carolina, was once considered an icon of racial segregation. During his 1948 bid for president, he promised to preserve segregation and, in 1957, he filibustered for more than 24 hours against a civil rights bill.

Sharpton, who ran for president in 2004 on a ticket of racial justice, said he met Thurmond only once in 1991 when he visited Washington, D.C., with the late soul singer James Brown, who knew Thurmond. Sharpton said the meeting was "awkward."

"I was not happy to meet him because what he had done all his life," Sharpton said.

Thurmond was seen as softening his segregation stance later in his life. He died in 2003, at 100. The long-serving senator was originally a Democrat but became a Republican in 1964.

Thurmond's children have acknowledged that Thurmond fathered a biracial daughter. Essie Mae Washington-Williams' mother was a housekeeper in the home of Thurmond's parents.

Telephone message left by The Associated Press on Sunday for Strom Thurmond Jr. and an attorney who once represented Thurmond's biracial daughter, Essie Mae Washington-Williams, were not returned.

UCLA To Establish Unique Law Chair (LAT)

By Larry Gordon

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

Thanks to a more than $1-million donation from a gay male couple who hope one day to marry in California, UCLA's law school is planning to establish what is described as the nation's first endowed academic chair in sexual orientation law.

The cash gift from John McDonald and Rob Wright will help fund the research of a still-to-be-named professor at UCLA Law School's Williams Institute on Sexual Orientation Law and Public Policy. That 5-year-old think tank investigates such topics as anti-homosexual discrimination, the impact of the military's don't ask-don't tell policies and the demographics of same-sex couples who have adopted children.

"This is going to support legal scholarship, legal research and education that covers a whole area so fundamental to creating change," said McDonald, a retired businessman and attorney who earned his bachelor's degree at UCLA. "We just think this is one of the best things we've ever done."

The UC system recently approved an agreement to accept the money, but formal establishment of the chair awaits a review to ensure that it matches UC's research and teaching missions and is not too narrowly drawn, system officials said. Although the research topics may upset social conservatives, approval is expected.

The donation for the chair was announced publicly in connection with a Williams Institute conference Friday at the Westwood campus.

Though some universities have chairs in gay and gender studies, those have been in the humanities and social sciences and not in a law school, said Brad Sears, executive director of the Williams Institute. A professor from the current UCLA law faculty will be appointed to the chair in three to six months, and the funds will help pay for such things as teaching assistants and research costs, Sears said.

"This is a big step," he said, expressing his gratitude to the donors.

The gift for the chair was described by experts across the country as giving a prestigious boost to a budding field of scholarship. "It is a terrifically exciting and important development. And it is another marker that sexual orientation law has come into its own as an important field of study," said Suzanne B. Goldberg, a Columbia University law school professor, who runs a clinic on those topics for students at that New York school.

Jennifer Pizer, a senior counsel for Lambda Legal, the national gay civil rights organization, agreed. She said that an endowed chair would be especially noteworthy because UCLA is such a well-respected school and a state university.

Pizer was among the conference speakers Friday who discussed laws that allow gay marriage in some European countries and the panoply of lawsuits involving the issue in the United States. In the keynote address, before an audience of about 150, Boris O. Dittrich, a former member of the Dutch Parliament, spoke about how his legislation led the Netherlands to be the first nation in the world to recognize homosexual marriage, starting in 2001.

McDonald and Wright, who split their time between homes in Colorado and West Hollywood, have lived together for nearly 25 years and have registered as domestic partners. But they said they faced financial and legal burdens that a heterosexual couple would not.

For example, they made costly inheritance and insurance arrangements that "would have been totally unnecessary" for a straight married couple, Wright said. And when they travel, they always take legal documents that name each other as caretakers in case of a medical emergency, he said.

McDonald, 74, was the chief executive of Mullikin Medical Enterprises, a medical and hospital management firm that was sold in 1995. Wright, 58, worked in advertising and real estate.

If gay marriage were approved in California, the pair "would do it instantly," McDonald said.

The state Supreme Court this year is expected to review an appeals court ruling that upheld a prohibition on same-sex marriage in California. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in 2005 vetoed a bill that would have permitted gay marriage and said the issue was a matter for the courts to decide.

McDonald and Wright previously donated $100,000 so the Williams institute could offer training for judges and lawyers in sexual orientation law. They are well known in the gay community for a $1.5-million donation in 1996 to the Los Angeles Gay & Lesbian Center, which then named its headquarters building after them.

The couple stress that they want the professor who takes the McDonald/Wright chair to avoid partisan advocacy and stick to objective research on a wide range of legal topics involving same-sex relationships, including adoption and property settlements after gay couples break up. But they clearly hope that such studies will aid the campaign for gay marriage and other gay rights issues.

The institute, which has a staff of 12, is named after its prime donor, Charles Williams, a UCLA alumnus who was a senior executive for Sperry Corp. Williams has given a total of $10 million to the institute, Sears said.

Williams, who was at Friday's meeting, said he wanted to help establish an academic research unit rather than an advocacy group. "You don't get change in the law or in public policy by saying it's a nice thing to do or it's right or it benefits people. You only do it by proving, through research, the facts," said Williams, who lives in Malibu.

The institute's recent studies have found, among other things, that more homosexuals live openly in rural areas of the United States than in the past and that nearly half of skilled nursing homes in the Los Angeles area will not treat HIV patients. Though the overwhelming majority of Friday's participants appeared to support gay marriage, Sears stressed that the institute seeks to present both sides of the issue. For example, last year it and Brigham Young University in Utah co-sponsored debates on the topic.

Conspiracy Weary (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136110

In today's paranoid political climate, any bow toward reality is welcome. So we thought you'd like to know that an independent team of computer scientists has absolved touch-screen voting machines of stealing an election in Florida's 13th Congressional District last November.

Republican Vern Buchanan won his seat by a mere 369 votes over Democratic challenger Christine Jennings, who has nonetheless refused to concede and has sued to demand a new election. Ms. Jennings claims that faulty software was the cause of 18,000 "undervotes," or incidences where voters cast ballots in other races but not in the Congressional contest, in what is a mainly GOP district on the Florida Gulf Coast south of Tampa.

However, eight computer experts from several universities looked at the iVotronic software and last week concluded unanimously that it "did not cause or contribute to the CD13 undervote." Ms. Jennings and her allies at People for the American Way aren't giving up and are demanding to see the source code themselves. Naturally, they're also claiming that one of the scientists who conducted the audit is known to have voted for President Bush. Some people will believe anything, but Ms. Jennings looks worse with each day she continues to rage against the machines.

Energy Firm Accepts $45 Billion Takeover (WP)

By Steven Mufson And David Cho

Washington Post, February 26, 2007

Buyers Made Environmental Pledge

TXU, the largest energy provider in Texas, agreed last night to a $45 billion buyout that would not only be the largest private-equity deal in history but would also feature an unusual twist: The buyers have promised environmental groups they would cancel a slew of coal-fired power plants on the firm's drawing boards.

The buyout firms' deal with environmental groups, which could become a landmark in the battle over climate-change policy, would force an abrupt turnaround in the strategy of TXU, which has defied environmentalists' and congressional criticism of its plans to expand coal use and carbon dioxide emissions.

The environmental agreement was the idea of the private-equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, which made it a condition of the acquisition, according to several sources involved in the negotiations, who gave details of the deal on condition of anonymity because it had not been announced yet.

Texas Pacific's head, David Bonderman, is no stranger to creative deals in the energy sector or in the cause of environmentalism. Bonderman sits on the boards of the World Wildlife Fund and the Grand Canyon Trust. He was a key figure in negotiating with power plants in Arizona to reduce air pollution over the Grand Canyon. In the TXU case, he tasked William K. Reilly, who had led the Environmental Protection Agency under President George H.W. Bush, to reach out and negotiate with environmental groups.

If shareholders approve the acquisition, TXU would back federal legislation that would require reductions in carbon dioxide emissions through a cap-and-trade system. It would shelve plans for eight of 11 coal-fired plants that current TXU executives had proposed for Texas and would drop plans to build new coal plants in Pennsylvania and Virginia. The company would also double its spending to promote energy efficiency, to $80 million a year, for five years.

"We think this is really a big deal, a watershed moment in America's fight against global warming," said Jim Marston, regional director of Environmental Defense in Austin and who helped forge the environmental accord in a 17-hour negotiating session with the buyout firms on Wednesday. He said it would reshape the electricity sector in Texas and alter the attitudes of Texas congressmen toward climate-change legislation.

The buyout firms also promised to cut TXU's emissions of carbon dioxide, the most prevalent of greenhouse gases scientists blame for global warming, to 1990 levels by 2020. This matches the targets contained in legislation passed last year in California but exceeds anything TXU is obligated to achieve. When the three new coal plants are on line, the company's emissions are projected to be nearly 20 percent higher than they were in 1990.

DOJ_NMG_0136111

In return, Environmental Defense, which has been leading the fight against TXU's coal expansion plans, would drop its objections to the three large new units, including two 800-megawatt units at Oak Grove, Tex., and a 600-megawatt plant at Sandow, Tex. The private-equity firms held an initial round of talks on Friday with another environmental group that opposes the Oak Grove units.

The unusual talks between the buyout firms and environmental groups began Feb. 14. Reilly, who now heads a Texas Pacific subsidiary that invests in water projects in the developing world, called Fred Krupp, president of Environmental Defense.

"Reilly told us that they were negotiating to buy TXU but that they would not go through with the deal unless they could re-create the company as a green electricity generator," Marston said.

Last Tuesday, Marston got a phone call asking him to get on a plane in two hours and fly to the Texas Pacific headquarters in downtown San Francisco. Talks began 8 a.m. in a Texas Pacific conference room, and by 1 a.m. Thursday, they had a three-page list of commitments. Then the buyout executives flew in a private jet to Austin to discuss them with Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R) and other state leaders.

Although the deal is not a contract and wasn't signed, the buyout firms say they intend to fulfill the commitments.

The board of TXU met last night to vote on the leveraged buyout, which would eclipse the previous record of $31.3 billion, paid for RJR Nabisco in 1989. That deal was the subject of the popular journalistic account "Barbarians at the Gate." Texas Pacific and KKR would pay about $70 per share for TXU, or about $32 billion, and assume more than $12 billion in debt. The deal could be officially announced as early as today.

Bonderman is trying to ensure that this buyout has a happier ending than a utility deal he attempted in 2004. Then, Bonderman tried to acquire Portland General Electric from the bankrupt Enron, but it ended up as a public relations disaster. Despite efforts to assuage customers and grass-roots groups, the buyout sparked picketing and vociferous opposition from Oregon legislators. The state's utility commission rejected the proposal in 2005.

This time, Bonderman was personally involved in the initial meetings with environmental groups. He assigned Reilly to lead the negotiations. He and his partners at Kohlberg Kravis Roberts also told TXU that they would walk away from the deal if the energy giant didn't scale down its coal plant expansion plans as a concession to environmental groups.

"I think anyone doing an energy investment in today's situation has got to be sensitive of the change in the attitudes of the culture and the change in the attitudes of the country, and particularly the attitudes of Congress," said a person involved in the negotiations who spoke on condition of anonymity because the deal had not yet been announced.

But there are financial advantages to the environmental agreement, as well. When they acquire companies, private-equity firms typically try to cut costs rather than expand operations. TXU had estimated that the ambitious coal plant expansion would cost at least $10 billion; others suggested that with soaring construction costs, the ultimate price tag could be much higher.

Many power industry executives said they doubted TXU ever meant to build all 11 plants. "I think it is a bit of a gimmick," said the chief executive of another utility, who spoke on condition of anonymity for business reasons. He said that deregulation of the utility business in Texas has opened the state to competition on power generation. But with TXU claiming to build so much new generation, "who's going to jump in and say they don't believe them?"

Sources involved in the negotiation said TXU's assets -- which encompass a retail business with 2.4 million customers; more than 50 generating plants, including a nuclear facility; and a power wholesale business -- would not be split up if the deal gains approval from shareholders.

A turnaround at TXU would represent a reproach to C. John Wilder, TXU's chief executive, who in the past has criticized new technology that burns coal with fewer greenhouse gases as too expensive or technologically unsound. Although he is expected to retain his position at TXU, Wilder would be expected to consult with a new environmental advisory board that would include representatives from Environmental Defense and the Natural Resources Defense Council in San Francisco.

TXU Sale Going Forward (DMN/AP)

The Dallas Morning News, February 26, 2007

Plans for coal-fired plants may be abandoned

DALLAS – Directors of TXU Corp., the largest electric producer in Texas, gave tentative approval Sunday to sell the electric company to two private-equity firms that would abandon plans to build eight new coal-fired power plants, according to people close to the situation.

Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Texas Pacific Group were offering about $32 billion plus the assumption of more than $12 billion in TXU debt, which would make it the largest private buyout in U.S. corporate history.

Final details were still being worked out late Sunday, and TXU was expected to announce a deal early Monday, said the people, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the companies had not officially announced the deal.

Since a turnaround that began in 2004, TXU has become highly profitable, but the dramatic rise in its stock price had stalled, making it an attractive takeover target.

KKR and Texas Pacific Group agreed over the weekend to drop most of TXU's ambitious plans for building eight new coal-fired power plants, a move designed to win support for the deal from environmentalists and other critics of the company.

The new buyers also agreed to support a mandatory national program to cap emissions of greenhouse gases and pledged not to build coal-fired plants outside Texas.

TXU is the largest electric provider in Texas, with 2.3 million customers. Wall Street expects TXU to report this week that it earned more than $2.5 billion last year.

If TXU shareholders approve the sale, the deal would eclipse the previous record private buyout, KKR's $25.1 billion purchase of RJR Nabisco Inc. in 1988.

An obstacle to a TXU sale had been the company's controversial proposal to build 11 new coal-fired power plants in Texas. Environmentalists and civic leaders in some cities, including the mayors of Dallas and Houston, are fighting the company's plans.

TXU has acknowledged that the new plants would produce 78 million tons of carbon dioxide each year, more than doubling the 55 million tons the company releases now.

The Natural Resources Defense Council said the new buyers have agreed to withdraw permit applications for eight of the 11 proposed plants and decline to propose new coal plants outside Texas and support caps on emissions linked to global warming. The buyers also agreed to support a system of trading credits for cutting emissions, called cap and trade.

KKR and Texas Pacific declined to comment publicly. TXU officials did not return phone calls.

TXU's coal play was already in trouble. Last week, a state court judge blocked Texas Gov. Rick Perry's order to speed up the process of gaining permits for six plants. Hearings on the proposal were delayed four months, until June 27.

According to people close to the situation, the buyout firms approached environmental groups and a few Texas legislators in the past week with a plan for making the deal palatable.

"Certainly the sponsors were conscious of a large audience beyond just the (TXU) shareholders," said one of those with knowledge of the process.

David Hawkins, director of the Natural Resources Defense Council's climate center, said he was approached by an old friend, William Reilly, who led the Environmental Protection Agency under President George H.W. Bush and negotiated terms of the TXU agreement for Texas Pacific Group.

The environmental terms "don't have everything that we would have liked, and it's not a legally binding document, but it's a new direction for this company," Hawkins said. He added that having the support of a large Texas-based power company could help pass global-warming legislation and "make the difference in whether hundreds of coal plants get built" in coming decades.

Even if the buyout fails, Hawkins said it would now be much harder for TXU to build new coal-fired plants in Texas because potential buyers agreed to drop most of them.

The agreement between the environmental groups and the private-equity firms would let TXU build three new coal plants in Central Texas at sites called Oak Grove and Sandow.

Shares of TXU soared in after-hours trading Friday, when news of the offer leaked out. The shares closed regular trading at $60.02, up $2.38, or 4.1 percent on the New York Stock Exchange.

At that price, TXU has a market value of about $27.5 billion, far higher than late 2002, when the shares sunk to about $5 apiece.

DOJ_NMG_0136113

The company responded by selling off troubled units in Europe and Australia and getting out of the natural gas business to focus on producing and selling electricity to 2.3 million customers in Texas.

Besides the coal controversy, TXU has also been under attack from consumer groups and legislators over high rates and compensation paid to its chief executive, C. John Wilder, who was hired in early 2004.

In 2004, TXU lost $386 million but paid Wilder $55 million, mostly in stock-related bonuses that kicked in as the company's shares soared. TXU returned to profitability in 2005, earning $1.72 billion.

The company is scheduled to report its final 2006 results Tuesday, and analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial expect it to post a profit of $5.54 per share, or more than $2.5 billion. Forecasts call for only slightly smaller gains in each of the next two years.

TXU's electric rates have risen sharply since deregulation. Some state legislators propose to cap electric rates and force TXU to sell generating plants.

Within hours of the news Friday that the company could be sold, state Rep. Sylvester Turner said he was worried that private buyers "will further bleed residential and small business ratepayers." The Houston Democrat said the deal should force the Legislature to reconsider electric deregulation.

POWER PLAY Bidders Try To Pre-Empt Gridlock In TXU Deal (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith, Dennis K. Berman And Henny Sender

Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

Long a Tempting Target, Utilities Have Proved Elusive for Buyout Firms

For years, cash-rich buyout firms have tried to break into the lucrative electricity business only to be rebuffed by wary regulators, consumer groups and environmentalists. Now, in what would be the biggest leveraged-buyout ever, an investor group is hoping it has cracked the code.

A total of seven firms -- led by Kohlberg, Kravis, Roberts & Co., Texas Pacific Group and Goldman Sachs Group -- are close to signing a deal to buy utility powerhouse TXU Corp. for $32 billion plus more than $12 billion in TXU debt, according to people familiar with the matter. In a creative twist, the firms have moved quickly to pre-empt opposition from powerful environmental groups while seeking support from various regulators and politicians. Already, the potential buyers have promised to cancel plans to build all but three of the company's 11 coal-fired plants under development. And they are planning to placate consumers with rate reductions.

The deal marks a quantum leap in the political sophistication of the buyout world, and may signal a broader remaking of private equity's image in the utility industry. Buyout firms have generally received a chilly reception from utility regulators because they're seen as temporary, profit-driven caretakers not answerable to public shareholders or sensitive to consumers. If the prospective TXU buyers can overcome that perception, they could potentially open the door for more private-equity investors.

A successful deal will also create a chance to profit from a central predicament facing today's utility industry: a public that hungers for more and more electricity to burn, but has limited will to build new plants for providing it.

But it's far from a sure thing. Regulators at all levels of government could trip up the deal. It may also be subject to complaints from consumers who regard reasonably priced electrical service as a basic right.

Twice before, two of the private-equity investors involved in the deal -- KKR and Texas Pacific -- have tried to buy utilities and come up short after running into a buzz saw of criticism from state officials and consumers.

The firms are attempting to get out in front of TXU's many detractors and make concessions early, so that dislike of TXU's operating practices does not taint the deal.

On Saturday, two big environmental organizations that had fought TXU's plans to build the new coal-fired operations in Texas agreed to support the deal on the assurance that the buyers would cancel most of the plants.

There is an element of stagecraft at work, too. TXU already had plans to cut six of those plants, said people familiar with the effort. The plants that remain on the drawing board are responsible for the lion's share of the profits of the entire 11-plant project, said another person close to the company.

DOJ_NMG_0136114

Private-equity firms once shunned utilities as capital-intensive, regulated and low-return businesses. But now, in a world of cheap debt, their steady and predictable cash flows have made them desirable targets.

One reason the buyers have zeroed in on TXU: It possesses unrivaled power in a state that has removed nearly all price controls for the sale of electricity. It owns the largest fleet of power plants, 19 in total, and serves the most customers.

Under the tenure of Chief Executive C. John Wilder, TXU became one of the nation's most controversial utility companies, known for turning off the service of late-paying customers, boosting rates rapidly and building plants that produce huge amounts of harmful gases. It also became one of the most profitable utilities in U.S. history.

In 2003, Texas Pacific announced its intention to buy Enron Corp.'s Oregon utility, Portland General Electric. The deal attracted widespread opposition because Texas Pacific was seen as a short-term investor that wouldn't have customers' interests in mind. Among the firms Texas Pacific had acquired were Burger King, Continental Airlines and retailer J. Crew. Texas Pacific told investors in 2005 that its returns, before taxes, have averaged 55% a year. The Oregon utilities commission eventually rejected the Portland General deal on the recommendation of its staff.

Also in 2003, KKR announced an agreement to buy UniSource Energy Corp., an Arizona utility, for $2.85 billion in cash and debt. That effort ended in late 2004 when the Arizona commission, on a 4-to-1 vote, rejected KKR's bid. In both cases, rate concessions didn't look substantial enough to overcome fear of the risks to customers if service deteriorated amid cost-cutting.

This time around, it was clear that the buyers needed a more strategic approach. At the heart of the potential new owners' campaign for support lies Texas Pacific representative William Reilly, a former administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency under President George H.W. Bush. Mr. Reilly became the public face for the buyout group largely because of his reputation among environmentalists. David Bonderman, co-founder of Texas Pacific, has a similar reputation. He is touting his board membership of World Wildlife Fund as evidence that the group will behave responsibly.

The two men have a solid history together. Back in the late 1970s, Mr. Reilly tapped Mr. Bonderman -- then a Washington, D.C., lawyer -- to write a supporting brief for environmentalists before the Supreme Court. Later, when Mr. Reilly served as chairman of the board of World Wildlife Fund, he asked Mr. Bonderman to join the group's board. Mr. Bonderman, in turn brought Mr. Reilly to Texas Pacific.

Still, Mr. Reilly was stunned five or six weeks ago when Mr. Bonderman walked into his office at Texas Pacific and asked for his help in connection with the planned buyout of TXU, according to people familiar with the matter. Initial conversations with environmentalists quickly made the two realize that the campaign would not be easy.

The efforts to woo conservation groups quickly focused on the Environmental Defense Fund, along with Public Citizen, one of the two key plaintiffs in environmental litigation against the Texas utility and the Natural Resources Defense Council.

On Wednesday, Jim Marston, an attorney with the Environmental Defense Fund, went to San Francisco to listen to Texas Pacific's case in a meeting that went from 8 a.m. to 1 a.m. the following day.

Many of the proposals that Texas Pacific and KKR came up with were developed in connection with Green Strategies, a consulting firm based in Washington state headed by Roger Ballentine, a former Clinton White House staffer.

Under Mr. Reilly, the potential owners are also planning a sustainable energy advisory committee that would include Mr. Marston and a representative from the Natural Resources Defense Council as well as a host of prominent Texans. About six days ago, Michael MacDougall of Texas Pacific, along with Fred Goltz and Marc Lipschultz from KKR reached out to James Baker, the veteran Texas politician and former cabinet member, to serve in an advisory capacity at TXU. One of the first things he asked was about environmentalists' position on the deal, according to people familiar with the matter.

On Thursday, the investors took their campaign to Texas Gov. Rick Perry. Mr. Bonderman and Henry Kravis of KKR led the delegation, which included Mr. MacDougall and Mr. Goltz, in a 90-minute meeting at the governor's mansion. "The governor gave them the message that Texas is in dire need of new capacity," said Robert Black, Mr. Perry's press secretary.

Support of the governor and the legislature is critical both to approval and to the financial viability of the deal. There are several bills before the Texas legislature now which if enacted could have a negative impact on the potential profitability of the buyout.

The buyers will need all the goodwill they can get -- and must address more than just the environmental issue. Consumer resentment of TXU runs high in Texas, where under deregulation the company has aggressively moved to raise power prices that are now among the highest in the nation. In a bid to win over consumers, the private-equity buyers have put out the word to Texas lawmakers that they plan a 10% rate reduction. Already, some lawmakers who have been briefed are unimpressed. Texas state Rep. Sylvester Turner of Houston says he believes rates should drop at least 30%.

Mr. Turner said Sunday the sale "is causing me to re-evaluate the market we created in 1999. I have serious questions about the direction we're headed and the impact on consumers who never wanted deregulation to begin with."

Per terms of the deal being contemplated, Mr. Wilder and other top executives would remain at the company, while rolling over their 5% ownership stakes into the new ownership plan. They would then have access to options that could give them another 5% stake over time. Private-equity firms generally need the support of management when making a bid for a public company. By giving management equity, that support is usually forthcoming. Mr. Wilder appears to be entitled to change of control payments that could be worth $65 million or more.

On Tuesday, TXU is expected to show record earnings for 2006. In the first nine months of 2006, it earned $2 billion on operating revenues of $7.5 billion, nearly double its profits a year earlier on a slight increase in revenues.

Insiders have described Mr. Wilder as brilliant but "tone deaf" to the niceties of the utility business. Regulated utilities, traditionally, are generous community givers and are solicitous of politicians and regulators. Erle Nye, the longtime chief executive whom Mr. Wilder replaced, typified the courtly utility chief; Mr. Wilder seemed brusque by comparison.

TXU did not return calls seeking comment.

Dallas Mayor Laura Miller said TXU has communicated poorly with elected officials. She's never met Mr. Wilder and said he has refused to meet with critics to discuss a long list of grievances that range from the coal plants, which she opposes, to nagging problems like perpetually burned-out street lights in downtown Dallas, undermining a $190 million redevelopment effort.

"Large swaths of downtown have been dark and scary," she said. "How's customer service going to get better with a bunch of outsiders running the company from New York or San Francisco?"

The buyers have tried to show that the company's tone will change. Tom "Smitty" Smith, director of Public Citizen, an advocacy organization, said he met with a KKR representative on Friday who said, "You've been a frequent critic of TXU, let's open a dialogue."

Mr. Smith -- a loud critic of both TXU's consumer relations and its coal-plant program -- said he found the overture "refreshing," particularly since he'd been trying to get a meeting, he says, with Mr. Wilder for more than a year to express concerns.

Whether the new owners could come to terms with the management of TXU was also a big question. But at a long meeting 10 days ago, Messrs. MacDougall and Goltz met with Mr. Wilder to review the specific commitments the two planned to make to reduce hostility to their bid.

Among the several u-turns: TXU was planning to introduce coal-fired plants into Virginia, Maryland and Pennsylvania. Indeed, David Hawkins of the NRDC already had 16 lawyers trying to derail the proposed move. The new owners promised environmentalists that there would be no such expansion if their bid went through, these people say.

Once environmentalists get over the euphoria of getting eight coal-fired plants off the table, however, some may wonder whether they got enough out of the bargain. After all, they've garnered an agreement that the buyers won't build plants they never had permission to build. But prior to the deal, it appeared that the opposition was at least making it difficult for TXU to navigate the approval process.

One administrative judge recommended that permits on an early project be denied because he didn't believe TXU could deliver the pollution reductions it had promised.

In a separate victory last week, challengers -- including a coalition of Texas cities led by the Dallas and Houston mayors and the Chickasaw Indian nation in Oklahoma -- were given four months to prepare cases and line up expert witnesses to challenge the TXU plan.

TXU was advised by Credit Suisse and Lazard, with attorneys Cravath Swaine & Moore and Sullivan & Cromwell. The buyers were advised by Citigroup, Goldman Sachs, J.P. Morgan Chase, Lehman Brothers, Morgan Stanley and attorneys Simpson Thacher & Bartlett and Vinson & Elkins.

Citigroup, J.P. Morgan Chase, Lehman and Morgan Stanley are also smaller investors in the deal.

A Buyout Deal That Has Many Shades Of Green (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

New York Times, February 26, 2007

About two weeks ago, Fred Krupp, the president of a nonprofit advocacy group called Environmental Defense, received an unusual phone call.

William K. Reilly, the former administrator for the Environmental Protection Agency under President George H. W. Bush, was on the other end. But before Mr. Reilly would explain the reason for his call, he said he needed an assurance from Mr. Krupp that he would keep the conversation confidential.

After receiving such a pledge, Mr. Reilly dropped a bombshell: the TXU Corporation, the Texas energy giant that had become the whipping boy of the nation's largest environmental groups, was in talks to be sold to a group led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and Texas Pacific Group, two large private equity firms.

Mr. Reilly, who works for Texas Pacific, said he wanted to negotiate a cease-fire. If the investors succeeded in taking over TXU, Mr. Reilly said, they would commit themselves to scale back significantly on TXU's plan to build 11 new coal plants and adhere to a strict set of environmental rules. In return, he wanted the support of Mr. Krupp and his peers, who had spent the past several months waging a bitter and public war against TXU.

Last night, after several weeks of marathon negotiations that brought together both environmentalists and Wall Street bankers, the board of TXU was moving toward a vote to accept the bid from Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific for about $45 billion, which would be the largest buyout in history.

The deal would be noteworthy not just for its size, but for the confluence of business decisions and environmental concerns that drove the ultimate transaction. Because private equity firms are unregulated and historically have valued their privacy, neither Kohlberg Kravis nor Texas Pacific were eager to become an "enemy combatant" of the environmental groups, people involved in the talks said. Reducing the coal plant initiative will also free up billions of dollars in planned spending that the firms will be able to use for other projects or to help finance the transaction.

Within TXU, the controversial plan to build a raft of coal plants had become so damaging to its stock price that its board had been privately weighing a plan to scrap part of the project, said people involved in the talks, bringing the number of new plants to 5 or 6 from 11. Shareholders had sent the stock on a roller coaster ride from more than $67 a share to as low as about $53 over concerns about the risk and vast expenditure; the stock closed at $60.02 on Friday.

Indeed, it was the quick drop in TXU's stock price that got the attention of Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific, which look for undervalued companies and try to turn them around. Together, both firms approached C. John Wilder, TXU's chief executive, in January with an offer for the company, these people said.

At the time, neither Kohlberg Kravis nor Texas Pacific told TXU about their ambition to scale back its controversial coal plants. But behind the scenes, both firms had been developing a new strategy for the company with the help of Goldman Sachs, their lead adviser.

Goldman Sachs has been a longtime proponent of reducing carbon emissions. Its former chief executive, Henry M. Paulson, now the secretary of the treasury, was also the chairman of the Nature Conservancy, an environmental activist group.

Texas Pacific's co-founder, David Bonderman, is member of the board of the World Wildlife Fund, and Mr. Reilly is chairman emeritus. Mr. Bonderman called Mr. Reilly to help work on the deal and create what they ultimately called The Green Group, a committee of advisers that included Mr. Reilly, Roger Ballentine of Green Strategies and Stuart E. Eizenstat, the former chief domestic policy adviser for President Jimmy Carter.

"We didn't want to be on the wrong side of history," said a person involved in the bidding group who was not authorized to talk about the transaction before its formal announcement, which is expected today.

Under the terms of the deal, Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific will pay $69.25 a share for TXU, people involved said. Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley, Lehman Brothers and Citigroup are expected to take small stakes in TXU as well as help finance the debt with J. P. Morgan Chase. In addition, the investor group will assume more than $12 billion of TXU's debt.

The deal represents about a 17 percent premium over TXU's closing price on Thursday before word of the deal began to leak and was reported Friday on CNBC after the market closed.

It is unclear whether shareholders will agitate for a higher price from the investor group or push for other suitors to emerge. Several recent "go private" deals have drawn opposition from shareholders who expressed concern that they were being shortchanged.

The investor group has not laid out any specific plans to grow revenues through alternatives to the coal plants, but TXU is not likely to lose money, at least initially, as a result of scaling back. Three of the plants are already in the works and other eight that will be canceled would not have been built for years.

And the group will be getting more than just a utility. TXU is in the midst of an experiment to run broadband Internet over its power lines as part of a venture with Current Communications.

Both TXU, which was advised by Credit Suisse and Lazard, and the investor group spent weeks holed up in three conference rooms at the Gaylord Texan, a hotel just outside of Dallas. With armies of bankers and lawyers that frequently numbered more than 40, the group negotiated the buyout deal, including an unusual provision that will allow TXU to seek higher rival bids over the next 50 days. This clause could potentially create a bidding war, perhaps bringing other private equity firms and utilities into an auction.

Mr. Bonderman and Henry R. Kravis, the founder of Kohlberg Kravis, pleaded their case to the Texas governor, Rick Perry, on Thursday in person at his mansion, mindful that Oregon had rejected Texas Pacific's deal to buy Portland General and that Arizona had rejected Kohlberg Kravis' deal to buy UniSource Energy. The pair has also reached out to James A. Baker, a Texan and former Reagan cabinet member.

But perhaps the most difficult talks were with the environmentalists, who often seemed more like Wall Street negotiators than green activists.

Mr. Krupp of Environmental Defense used his conversation with Mr. Reilly as an opportunity to negotiate even harder for further concessions. The men agreed that Mr. Krupp's lieutenant, James D. Marston, who was leading the charge against TXU in Texas, would meet with Mr. Reilly and other representatives of the buying group. And representatives from Natural Resource Defense Council, another climate-control advocacy group, was brought into the discussion to help formulate a plan that all sides could agree on.

So last Wednesday, Mr. Marston flew to San Francisco, where he found himself face to face with Mr. Reilly over breakfast at the Mandarin Oriental hotel. There, over scrambled eggs and croissants, Mr. Reilly laid out a plan that included reducing the coal plants from 11 to 3.

Then the men went to Texas Pacific's conference room overlooking Alcatraz and the San Francisco Bay for a day-long negotiation that stretched until early the next morning. The group, which included Mr. Reilly, Mr. Bonderman and Frederick Goltz of Kohlberg Kravis, worked out a "10-point plan" that included a commitment by the investors to return the carbon-dioxide emissions by TXU to 1990 levels by 2020 and support a $400 million energy efficiency program.

When an agreement was finally struck, at 1 a.m. the next morning, Mr. Reilly grabbed a bottle of pinot noir from his colleague's office to toast the group. But he couldn't find a corkscrew. So he ran back to the Mandarin Oriental to borrow one.

Not all of TXU's historical opponents are popping corks. Some noted that a decision by one company did not sway the others that are building plants. In Dallas, Laura Miller, the mayor and leader of a coalition of municipal officials that has spent $600,000 fighting the TXU plants, said the agreement with the environmental groups might not get TXU as much help as it wanted.

Ms. Miller pointed out that one of the three surviving projects, a plant near Waco, is still opposed by local officials and had drawn a negative recommendation from a panel of Texas judges. She said she hoped that TXU's plans would leave an opening for cleaner projects, like a proposal to build a power line to West Texas, where power producers propose to build large wind farms.

For TXU, One Of The Street's Fabled Barbarians Is Back In The Hunt (NYT)

By Landon Thomas Jr.

New York Times, February 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136118

He has been there, done that, and now, close to 20 years after clinching the grandest buyout deal ever, Henry R. Kravis seems to be doing it again.

As always, the raw numbers loom large: $45 billion for the proposed buyout of the TXU Corporation, compared to $39 billion for the Blackstone Group's recent deal with Equity Office Properties and $25 billion for his RJR Nabisco takeover in 1988.

As this era's generation of hedge fund executives and private equity moguls use their billions to buy art, assume leadership roles in New York's cultural institutions and publicly celebrate their successes, they are working from a two-decade-old playbook of one of Wall Street's oldest masters, Mr. Kravis himself.

In contrast to the giddy exuberance of this era's newly minted billionaires, however, Mr. Kravis, who is 63, is making his resurgence not only as a cornerstone of New York's social and financial landscape, but also as a seasoned executive whose survival of a series of tough business setbacks and personal tragedies during the 1990s has given him a more measured perspective.

"Look, don't congratulate us when we buy a company, congratulate us when we sell it," Mr. Kravis said in an interview he gave to the Academy of Achievement. "Because any fool can overpay and buy a company, as long as money will last to buy it."

It's a telling comment, and according to people who know him it has become a favored maxim for Mr. Kravis, one that he trots out whenever anyone tries to praise him for a large deal. In this heady period, a deal maker's time on the mountaintop can be short indeed.

Just last year, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company was involved in a $33 billion takeover for the health care provider HCA Inc., that was the largest ever until the Equity Office deal. Last year, K.K.R. distributed $837 million in fees to investment banks, an amount that surpassed all other buyout firms.

Mr. Kravis's wider renown largely came from the RJR deal, memorialized in the best seller "Barbarians at the Gate." But the deal itself, the culmination of a frenzied bidding war that was in some ways reminiscent of the battle for Equity Office Properties, did not come close to producing a satisfactory return.

K.K.R. reaped extraordinary riches from its early deals — minting $7.4 billion from an investment in Safeway that prompted a rush of private equity imitators, for example — but the firm's failures were also monumental and industry-rattling. K.K.R.'s billion-dollar loss in Regal Entertainment — one that it shared with Hicks, Muse, Tate & Furst, now called HM Capital Partners — was one of the biggest ever.

Born in Tulsa, Okla., the son of a successful oil and gas executive, Mr. Kravis worked as an investment banker at Bear Stearns in the late 1960s. By the early 1970s, leveraged buyouts were the work of a small sideline industry that largely focused on family-owned businesses. Even in 1976, when Mr. Kravis, his first cousin George R. Roberts and Jerome Kohlberg Jr. all left Bear Stearns to found today's firm, the deals were just a couple of hundred million dollars in size. (Mr. Kravis's initial investment in the firm was $10,000; his two colleagues invested $10,000 and $100,000 respectively)

During the 1980s buyout boom, fueled by the easy availability of high-yield debt, K.K.R.'s returns led the industry. According to Fortune magazine, its first five funds averaged close to 37 percent. Mr. Kravis became a trustee of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and Mount Sinai Hospital, and the lush dinner parties he put on with his second wife, Carolyne Roehm, came to define the mores of that decade, as captured in Tom Wolfe's "Bonfire of the Vanities."

But in the 1990s, Mr. Kravis's luck changed. Tragically, his 19-year-old son Harrison was killed in a car crash in 1991 in Colorado. A run of less-than-stellar investments led to fund returns that fell considerably short of earlier successes. A clutch of private equity competitors began to assert their presence in the field, and while K.K.R. remained influential, it was by no means dominant.

Mr. Kravis's public profile also underwent a shift.

In 1994, he married Marie-Josée Drouin, a Canadian economist, who now sits on the boards of Ford Motor, the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center and the Robin Hood Foundation, and is president of the Museum of Modern Art.

Short and sleek, with slicked-back graying hair, Mr. Kravis looks more than ever like a central establishment figure as opposed to the bomb thrower he once was (he is a prominent supporter of Senator John McCain; a trustee at the Council on Foreign Relations; and a member of the exclusive club for chief executives, the Business Council).

But in the industry he had such a hand in creating — and that is now sending shock waves through the global economy — Mr. Kravis is again making his presence felt. K.K.R. is near completion of a $16 billion fund, and last year became the first of the giant buyout firms to list shares of a fund to raise money, $5 billion to be specific, from smaller investors.

"He is the Roger Clemens of the industry. He was a winner when he was 20 years old, and he is winner in his 60s," said James B. Lee Jr., vice chairman of JPMorgan Chase and a banker to Mr. Kravis for close to 30 years. Mr. Lee also disputes the notion that landing the biggest deal is what drives Mr. Kravis. "Henry does not keep score that way," he said. "What matters to Henry is being an agent of change in the alignment of capital and management."

While Mr. Kravis's relentless, hands-on management style has changed little over the last 30 years, the growth of larger and more complex deals has forced K.K.R. to alter its approach in managing the many companies in its portfolio.

In the 1980s, as a result of the small amounts of equity invested in deals, turning companies around depended largely on feats of fast financial engineering. With the recent flood of private equity capital, buyout firms are investing higher proportions of equity when they take firms private, which places a larger onus on them to work with management to effect longer-term results.

When K.K.R. adds a new company to its portfolio now, executives at the firm, in the spirit of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's first 100 days in office, outline a 100-day game plan that sets specific targets to be met for each of the 100 days.

Mr. Kravis, a billionaire several times over, still has the drive to succeed that pushes all business titans. But, in Mr. Kravis's own words, he also is driven by a deeper anxiety. "It's the fear of failure," he said in the Academy of Achievement interview. "Of not wanting to fail. That makes people as great as they are. I know that's what pushes me, a lot."

Tribune Mulls Revamp As Auction Founders (WSJ)

By Sarah Ellison

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

Despite considering a late-breaking bid from Chicago real-estate magnate Sam Zell, Tribune Co.'s board is inching closer to a "self-help" restructuring deal it will implement on its own, say people familiar with the situation.

The board met with its advisers Saturday for an update on the five-month-old auction. Unlike the past couple of board meetings, it issued no statement afterward. Tribune -- which owns the Los Angeles Times, the Chicago Tribune and 23 television stations -- has promised shareholders a resolution of the auction by March 31.

Mr. Zell's offer to take the company private emerged after the deadline for offers last month. People familiar with the situation noted that his proposal is structured in a way that would take time to implement, a strike against it for executives.

Mr. Zell didn't return a phone call seeking comment.

The board's preferred plan continues to be a recapitalization involving a spinoff of Tribune's TV stations and the payment of a big dividend to shareholders. Such a plan could involve buying out part of the 20% stake in Tribune held by the Chandler family, the company's biggest shareholder and the instigator for the sale process last year.

One option under consideration is for the Robert R. McCormick Tribune Foundation, the company's second biggest shareholder, to use part of the money it would get in the dividend payout to buy out part of the Chandler stake, according to people familiar with the matter. Such a deal is possible because the foundation has strong ties to Tribune management. Its board includes three current Tribune executives -- who have recused themselves from voting on the charity's shares in the sale process -- and two former executives. The foundation and a related charity own about 14% of Tribune.

Sale of part of the Chandlers' stake could cost the family its three board seats.

Tribune fielded offers for months before opting to explore a self-help deal. The company on Friday said its January revenue fell 5% from a year earlier to $442 million, mainly due to weakness in newspaper advertising. The January numbers, which the company presented to potential bidders weeks ago, pushed Tribune's management to lower its internal projections for the full year, according to people familiar with the matter.

Tribune Considering Late Offer From Real Estate Magnate (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye And Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136120

The Tribune Company, in discussions about its future, is weighing a proposal from Sam Zell, the Chicago real estate maverick and billionaire who sold his huge office development company this month for $39 billion in the biggest leveraged buyout ever.

A special committee of Tribune board members was close to settling on an internal overhaul when Mr. Zell made a last-minute entry into the discussions, people close to the situation said.

His bid for Tribune all but eliminates other offers — including one from the Los Angeles billionaires Ronald Burkle and Eli Broad — from consideration.

Mr. Zell, 66, has never owned a major media property, but gained the nickname the "Grave Dancer" for his ability to spot and exploit undervalued properties in the real estate business.

His proposal would involve buying the entire company with the participation of an employee stock ownership plan, these people said. Although the deal would be highly leveraged, the employee stock plans have many tax advantages, including the ability to write off interest on debt.

Tribune has received two other bids, but considered both inadequate and has been putting together what it called a self-help plan in which it would spin off its two dozen broadcast outlets, keep most if not all of its 11 newspapers, and borrow money to pay shareholders a large dividend.

It has also been considering ways to buy out the Chandler family, the company's biggest shareholder, possibly with the help of the McCormick Tribune Foundation, the second largest.

The Tribune Company declined to comment yesterday.

The board committee is taking Mr. Zell seriously enough that it has slowed its deliberations, which continued over the weekend, to explore his proposals further. It intends to reach a decision no later than the end of March.

Tribune's newspapers include The Los Angeles Times, which is the nation's fourth-largest paper, as well as The Chicago Tribune, The Baltimore Sun and Newsday.

It is not clear how the newspapers might change if Mr. Zell had a controlling stake in them. He told The Chicago Tribune last month that "there is no difference" between running a newspaper and managing any other for-profit business.

The Chicago Tribune first reported Mr. Zell's interest this month. It also reported that the Tribune Company was exploring selling its newspapers in Stamford and Greenwich, Conn., to Gannett, the nation's biggest newspaper company, and might consider selling the Chicago Cubs baseball team.

Mr. Zell sold his Equity Office Properties Trust, the biggest office landlord in the United States, to the Blackstone Group in an auction on Feb. 9. He proved a cagey negotiator. When Blackstone first approached him, he said he was not interested and dismissed its approach as a flirtation. Months later, he accepted it, saying he did so because it was all cash and higher than he expected. He made almost $1 billion from the sale.

Of the two other bids, one came from the Chandlers, who proposed taking the company private in a deal that valued Tribune at $7.6 billion, or $31.70 a share. The second was from Mr. Broad and Mr. Burkle, valuing it at $34 a share. A third bid from the Carlyle Group, just for the broadcast stations, has been dismissed.

Zell Joins Auction To Buy Tribune (FT)

By Joshua Chaffin And James Politi

Financial Times, February 26, 2007

Sam Zell, the Chicago billionaire, has entered the frame for the Tribune auction, making a proposal for the media group ahead of a weekend board meeting, according to people familiar with the matter.

The value of Mr Zell's offer was not known, although these people suggested that the company's advisers were initially sceptical that it would outweigh the merits of a company-led restructuring. Tribune and Mr Zell could not be reached for comment.

Tribune, which owns 23 television stations as well as the Los Angeles Times, Chicago Tribune and other papers, put itself up for sale last year under pressure from one of its largest shareholders. So far, the sale has drawn scant interest, forcing

Tribune's board to push back their self-imposed deadline to the end of the first quarter, and highlighting investors' concerns about the future of the newspaper business.

Until Mr Zell, a real estate mogul, stepped in, Tribune had been weighing a combined offer from two billionaires, Eli Broad and Ron Burkle, and one from the Chandler family, which had originally pressed for the company's break-up. Neither, however, represented a premium to Tribune investors.

As a result, Tribune officials were leaning toward a "self-help plan," according to people familiar with the matter, in which the company would be split into newspaper and broadcasting divisions and offer investors a dividend. The downside of the plan is that it would add to the company's debt load, and could limit its financial flexibility.

The Zell offer would include the participation of Tribune's employee share ownership plan, according to reports in the Chicago Tribune and Los Angeles Times, allowing the bidders to take advantage of special tax breaks associated with the plan.

XM's Mark On Northeast D.C. (WP)

By Thomas Heath, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

Fate of Headquarters Uncertain if Sirius Merger Goes Through

XM Satellite Radio chief executive Hugh Panero and his top engineer were exploring an abandoned printing plant in Northeast Washington back in 1999, looking for a home for their growing space-age radio company.

"This is the greatest place I can imagine," Panero recalled saying to himself, noting its spacious rooms and 20-foot ceilings. Not even the spent bullets strewn across the roof dissuaded him, he said last week -- though the engineer, a retired Air Force brigadier general, "thought I was nuts."

XM bought the building. The company invested $70 million in high-tech and aerospace hardware. And as it grew into a $4.3 billion enterprise that today employs more than 700 people, it helped turn the area around New York and Florida avenues NE from a strip of boarded-up buildings into a growing commercial center with a Metro stop, office and condo space and the future headquarters of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

But XM itself has been on a wild ride, losing more than $3 billion over the past seven years. Its stock, which had rocketed from $2 to nearly $40 a share , closed at $15.10 Friday, four days after the company announced its plan to merge with its New York-based rival, Sirius Satellite Radio.

The $13 billion deal is far from a lock, because the companies will have to overcome antitrust regulatory hurdles. But inside XM and elsewhere in Washington there was concern that the District might lose a company that had added some cutting-edge glamour to a business community better known for its government contractors.

"That's been a feather in our cap that XM Satellite has made their headquarters in the District," said James J. Abdo, chief executive of Abdo Development, which has a big project about a mile up New York Avenue.

It was certainly a change for the neighborhood when the Allman Brothers crew unloaded a couple of semis full of equipment into the XM Performance Theater, where the band spent three days re-recording its classic "Eat a Peach" album for a show called "Then . . . Again . . . Live." Jethro Tull did the same thing with "Aqualung." Janet Jackson stopped by on a publicity tour and talked for four hours on various shows. Tori Amos and Ludacris came by.

Sirius chief executive Mel Karmazin, who would run the merged company, said in an interview that XM's headquarters building is a valuable asset and that he might even expand its workforce. But there was an anxious mood last week in the XM hallways -- where dimly lit studios have names like XM Kids and Liquid Metal, and the conference rooms are labeled Sinatra, Springsteen and Hendrix.

"There are definitely people who are nervous," said programming director Billy Zero. "Without a doubt, there's going to be some overlap. I'm a creative guy. I'm an innovator. Hopefully, I will be part of that team. That's what it's going to be about -- pulling the most creative and innovative people onto the next leg of this tour."

Scott Walterman, director of news programming, said he worried that most of the operation would be shifted to New York.

"I've done Manhattan when I was younger," said Walterman, 48, who has been with XM since 2001. But, he added, "you do what you've got to do and go where you've got to go at the end of the day. Nobody knows how everything is going to play out."

DOJ_NMG_0136122

Like many of his colleagues, he's uneasy about the idea of merging with a longtime rival. "It's kind of like the collapse of the Berlin Wall," Walterman said. "You fight an enemy for six years and now you are allied with them."

"It might take us a few more days to get on the bandwagon and huzzah," said Bob Edwards, the former National Public Radio mainstay who hosts an XM show weekday mornings. People are in "a period of adjustment because we've been in this toe-to-toe battle with these guys, and now we're brothers and sisters. If it helps the company and saves satellite radio and makes it viable, then we're all for it. It's already helped my stock."

XM has been a Washington company since 1998, when founder Gary Parsons purchased one of two available satellite-radio spectrum licenses from the Federal Communications Commission and subleased space at 23rd and M Streets NW to be near the FCC and Capitol Hill. He recruited Panero, 51, who was working for a start-up pay-per-view network in Colorado, soon after.

They started shopping their idea for a subscription radio service to investors such as General Motors, which put up $75 million. The company initially raised $250 million.

"I turned down the investment several times because the whole proposition seemed like a long shot," said Mark D. Ein, a Washington venture capitalist who later signed on as an investor. "But Hugh sold his vision, and his vision became true. It's one of the great business success stories in Washington ever."

By the time XM went public in 1999, it needed a headquarters. "We wanted to be easily accessible to the bands touring the East Coast," said XM spokesman Chance Patterson, who was a consultant to XM for the accounting firm KPMG at the time. "It seemed like a stretch that Paul McCartney or P. Diddy would want to hang out near Dulles," where AOL and other tech firms are located.

They found the abandoned building that had been home to Judd & Detweiler, the master printers who for decades produced National Geographic magazine. The corner of Florida and New York avenues was minutes from Interstate 95, and not far from downtown D.C. nightclubs and the Verizon Center, so entertainers could swing by after performances.

Panero liked the idea that a Metro stop was planned nearby. He loved the building's red-brick, retro look, which reminded him of the homes of other start-ups. And he took into account the fact that if the neighborhood improved, so would the value of XM's headquarters. (The building is fully paid for.)

Mayor Anthony A. Williams heard about XM and saw a chance to bring an entirely new industry to a blighted area. He offered a package of tax breaks to save XM millions of dollars and help seal the deal.

"I viewed it as . . . a kind of iconic, symbolic statement that convinces people that an area is turning around," Williams said. "It was a signature investment."

"They have really helped to transform that neighborhood," said Barbara B. Lang, president of the D.C. Chamber of Commerce.

Panero, who will not be part of the company if the merger goes through, said no decisions have been made regarding management and responsibilities after the companies combine, but he said he expected there would still be a strong presence in Washington.

"What has been said is we have to continue to run the company as separate companies until the merger is closed," Panero said. "When it closes, the plan is to take advantage of great talent that exists in both companies. Clearly, there will be redundancies. But these are growth companies."

British Growth Augurs Rate Rise

Britain's economy grew at its fastest pace in more than two years in the final quarter of 2006, reinforcing expectations that the Bank of England will need to raise interest rates again. Strong consumer spending helped the economy to grow by 0.8% quarter on quarter in October-December, data from the Office of National Statistics showed, marking the highest quarterly growth rate since April-June 2004. In year-on-year terms, GDP growth stood at 3%, its highest rate since the third quarter of 2004. Business investment expanded 11.1% in annual terms -- its highest growth since 1998.

China Polices Securities Market

China has set up a top-level task force to clamp down on illegal activities in the securities market, a government report said. The committee will formulate and interpret rules to crack down on illicit activities in the industry and help related agencies pursue suspected crimes, according to the report on the central government's Web site.

Investigator Sends Bonds Letter Urging Cooperation (SFC)

By Mark Fainaru-Wada And Lance Williams, Chronicle Staff Writers

San Francisco Chronicle, February 26, 2007

But player can't comply with Mitchell's request, lawyer says

Major League Baseball's top steroids investigator has urged Giants star Barry Bonds and other players tied to the BALCO drug scandal to submit to interviews and turn over their medical records, The Chronicle has learned.

But Bonds' lawyer said Sunday that the Giants star cannot cooperate with baseball's steroids investigation as long as he remains the focus of a possible perjury indictment.

In a Feb. 1 letter, George Mitchell, the former U.S. Senate majority leader who is threatening that Congress may intervene if his investigation of performance-enhancing drug use in baseball is thwarted by lack of cooperation, urged Bonds and the other players to cooperate for the sake of the game.

"Nothing is more important than the integrity of the game of baseball," he wrote.

Copies of Mitchell's letter, which was read to The Chronicle by a person with knowledge of the investigation, were sent to Bonds, Detroit Tigers outfielder Gary Sheffield and other players.

Bonds, Sheffield and six other present and former players testified in 2003 before the federal grand jury that investigated the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid ring. The players were implicated in the use of BALCO's banned drugs, according to evidence in possession of federal investigators, but none was accused of a crime.

Mitchell's letters were accompanied by medical waiver forms that, if signed, would allow baseball investigators access to a player's past, current and future medical records.

Contacted for comment, Michael Rains, Bonds' lawyer, said he had told Mitchell that Bonds wanted to help but was unavailable as long as he faces possible indictment.

"I said, 'I'm sorry, but I have to give him that advice,' " Rains said.

For almost two years, federal authorities have been investigating whether Bonds testified falsely when he told the BALCO grand jury that he had never knowingly used banned drugs. As recently as November, then-U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan refused to comment on the status of the probe, Rains said.

Sheffield, who denied knowingly using steroids when he testified, also appears to be off-limits to Mitchell. His lawyer, Paula Canny, said she advised Sheffield that Mitchell's requests for information violate terms of baseball's labor contract.

"There are things more important than baseball -- like the integrity of collective bargaining agreements," she said.

Canny said "dozens" of players -- including many not connected with BALCO -- received letters, and she said that the players union also has written to Mitchell about his request. She declined to characterize the union's letter, and the union declined immediate comment.

DOJ_NMG_0136124

Mitchell sent letters to the players two weeks after he warned baseball owners that the game "has a cloud over its head" because of the steroid scandal and faces a likely congressional investigation if its own probe of drugs in sports falls short.

Commissioner Bud Selig ordered the Mitchell investigation in March 2006, amid steroid concerns fueled by the BALCO scandal. But the probe stalled, in part because the players union advised players not to submit to questioning without a lawyer present, and in part because prosecutors in the BALCO case asked prospective witnesses not to talk to Mitchell and his legal team.

In his warning to owners, delivered Jan. 18 at a meeting in Phoenix, Mitchell cited another concern: He said some clubs were balking at providing his investigators with relevant documents.

Mitchell's letter to the players comes at a time when Bonds is set to resume his pursuit of Henry Aaron's career record for home runs -- and when a new federal prosecutor, acting U.S. Attorney Scott Schools, has taken charge of the Bonds perjury investigation.

In his grand jury testimony in 2003, Bonds denied knowingly using banned drugs. But federal investigators have significant evidence that Bonds had used steroids and other banned drugs for years, according to sources familiar with the BALCO case.

In 2005, a federal grand jury began investigating whether Bonds had lied under oath. Witnesses have included former Bonds girlfriend Kim Bell; former Giants trainer Stan Conte; Bonds orthopedist Dr. Arthur Ting; Harvey Shields, Bonds' stretching coach; Giants equipment manager Mike Murphy; and BALCO vice president James Valente, who pleaded guilty in the BALCO case.

Last summer, when the grand jury's term was about to expire, some prosecutors wanted to indict Bonds for perjury, according to two people with knowledge of the investigation who asked not to be quoted by name.

But Ryan, who had run the BALCO investigation since its beginning in 2002, wavered. At that point, according to the sources, officials from the Internal Revenue Service and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, agencies that had investigated BALCO, began lobbying the Justice Department in Washington in an unsuccessful attempt to push for an indictment.

Instead, the call was left to Ryan. He chose to transfer the perjury investigation to a new grand jury, while pressuring Bonds' former trainer, Greg Anderson, to testify. Anderson has been imprisoned for contempt of court since before Thanksgiving for refusing to cooperate.

If Schools, the new U.S. attorney, seeks an indictment of Bonds, the government's evidence of steroid use in baseball might become public in court proceedings -- and thus available to Mitchell. If the perjury investigation is dropped, Mitchell might get access to the prosecutor's witnesses and documents from the government itself.

Mitchell's letter was the second he has sent attempting to get information from players associated with BALCO. In April 2006, Mitchell asked players to provide him with an array of documents, including their drug test results and their phone and medical records dating back to 1998.

What Mitchell hasn't done, though, is request the kind of help the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency received from Congress in 2004. Then, fearful of drug cheats competing at the Summer Games in Athens, Congress subpoenaed BALCO documents from the Justice Department and gave them to USADA. The anti-doping agency used the documents to bring charges against four sprinters, including then-100-meter world record holder Tim Montgomery.

Rains, Bonds' lawyer, said he hopes the new U.S. attorney in San Francisco will bring a fresh eye to the BALCO case, now in its fourth year, and drop the investigation of Bonds. In the meantime, he said, he has filed Freedom of Information Act requests in an effort to learn how much money the federal government has spent investigating BALCO.

Five men pleaded guilty to drug charges in the case. BALCO founder Victor Conte received the stiffest sentence: four months in federal prison.

Charles Scheeler, a lawyer involved in the Mitchell investigation, didn't respond to a call requesting comment. Luke Macaulay, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco, declined comment.

Chronicle staff writer John Shea contributed to this report.

Ashtabula Druggy Goes To W. Va. Prison (ASB)

Ashtabula Star-Beacon, February 23, 2007

JEFFERSON - - Ashtabula County convicted drug dealer fugitive Thomas J. MacWilliams is headed to 12 years and seven months in federal prison after being sentenced Feb. 14 by U.S. District Court Judge Irene M. Keeley in Clarksburg, W.Va.

The 42-year-old MacWilliams fled Ashtabula County in 2005 after being convicted by Common Pleas Court Judge Gary Yost of drug-related conspiracy charges. Yost sentenced MacWilliams to four years in an Ohio prison, then released him for 30 days to get family affairs in order.

At the end of 30 days, MacWilliams failed to report to the Ashtabula County Sheriff's Department to begin his incarceration. He was reported to have fled to a remote section of West Virginia, according to investigators with Trumbull, Ashtabula, Geauga Law Enforcement Task Force (TAG).

A year-long search ended on May 7, 2006 when MacWilliams was apprehended by Harrison County drug task force officers in a remote area known as Hoot Owl Hollow in Burnsville, W.Va. TAG and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration officials had received numerous tips on MacWillaims whereabouts, according to TAG task force commander Sgt. Jeff Orr.

West Virginia authorities arrested the former New Lyme Township resident, who was using several trailers to grow marijuana and distribute it. He was arrested along with a female companion.

Additional drug charges were filed against MacWilliams by Gilmer County and Harrison County law enforcement officials. He pleaded guilty to the West Virginia charges of aiding and abetting by using the trailers for marijuana cultivation, possession and distribution between Dec. 2005 to May 7, 2006.

Prior to his sentencing, MacWilliams was held in custody at the Harrison County jail in Clarksburg. The defendant was labeled a career offender by Keeley, who made it binding after learning about his past criminal history.

The Ashtabula County drug-related convictions ended up with a court forfeiture order seizing MacWilliams' assets. Seized were 900 pounds of marijuana, $76,400, five vehicles, two Harley-Davidson motorcycles, a Honda four-wheel all-terrain vehicle and a car wash.

MacWilliams is expected to be brought back to Ashtabula County as soon as legally possible, Orr said Wednesday.

"If he would have just stayed here and done his four years in an Ohio prison instead of fleeing; now he faces 19 to 20 years in prison. The grand jury also indicted him on escape charges," Orr said.

MacWilliams' original prison sentence from Yost may be tacked on consecutively or back-to-back, according to Orr. Keeley, in her sentence, requires MacWillaims to face three years of federal supervised release plus recommended him for the prison bureau's 500-hour substance abuse treatment program.

Cali Drug Cartel's Betrayer Tells His Story (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

Miami — THE official end of the notorious Cali cocaine cartel came late last year here with little more commotion than the rap of a judge's gavel.

The Colombian drug lords Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, 63, and Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela, 67, entered guilty pleas and were ushered off to federal prison for the next 30 years — no Miami Vice-like dramatics, no bodies riddled with gunfire in the manner of Medellin rival Pablo Escobar.

But behind the bloodless fall of the ruthless Orejuela brothers and collapse of their $7-billion-a-year empire lies a little-known story of daring and betrayal.

Aiding U.S. drug agents unexpectedly and at great risk was a senior cartel official, the head of security and intelligence for the syndicate. For years he had protected the bosses, their wives and children. Then, he crossed them.

"It was very risky, but I was trapped in a nightmare, in a totally corrupt environment. I had to escape," he explained.

Federal prosecutor Edward R. Ryan called the defection a shock and "a very personal betrayal" to the Cali bosses, leaving the man marked for death. He is still "No. 1 to be killed," Ryan said.

The man has lost much of what he once took for granted: his home, his country, his name, even his past.

From somewhere deep inside the federal witness protection program that harbors him and his family, he has shared pieces of his story in sporadic telephone conversations with a reporter.

DOJ_NMG_0136126

"Obviously, I'm not looking for celebrity — it would jeopardize our safety," he told The Times. "But people should know what I know now. My story should start by saying, if you are invited into such an organization, stop — stop and run away.

"Don't think you can ever fully escape."

He used to be Jorge Salcedo.

THE wonkish, soft-spoken family man was an unlikely drug gang recruit. He held university degrees in mechanical engineering and industrial economics. He started his career designing forklifts and other machinery. Later he ran an oil recovery business.

His father was a retired Colombian army general and respected diplomatic figure. The son was an officer in the army reserves, but he regarded himself more as an engineer than a soldier. He became proficient in electronic surveillance, which increasingly drew him into counter-terrorism assignments.

His military service in the late 1980s coincided with one of Colombia's bloodiest periods.

Anti-government guerrilla groups unleashed waves of kidnappings that terrorized the nation. Some targeted the rich drug lords. At the same time, rival cocaine cartels were warring with one another, killing scores of police, judges, politicians and innocent bystanders.

Military leaders grew restless because of the security failings of an impotent and corrupt government and tried to fill the vacuum, sometimes taking military actions without approval from officials in Bogota, the capital.

Enter Salcedo. He was secretly dispatched to Europe by military leaders to assemble a team of mercenaries. In an unusual move largely financed by Medellin cartel bosses, he was to organize an off-the-books, paramilitary operation — an armed assault on a guerrilla mountain fortress called Casa Verde.

It was aborted at the last minute. However, word of Salcedo's role reached Cali, 185 miles southwest of Bogota. The drug bosses there, engaged at the time in a vicious feud with Escobar and the Medellin, summoned the 41-year-old engineer to visit.

"Some people in Cali want a word with you," Salcedo was told in a phone call in January 1989.

"I had to go. It was not an invitation I could refuse," he said. "In Colombia, even honest people have to deal with the cartels." The next morning, he caught the first Avianca flight to Cali.

THE compound of Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela filled a city block. In addition to living quarters, it contained a large swimming pool, a tennis court and half of a soccer field.

Salcedo was escorted to a wing of the residence that contained Miguel's offices — with marble floors, wood paneling, leather furniture, fine porcelain and four cartel dons who were waiting to see him.

Jose Santacruz Londono got right to the point. Pablo Escobar of Medellin was "a bandit … a criminal … a crazy guy" who was threatening to kill their wives and children. Miguel, the younger of the two Orejuela brothers, was even more direct: He wanted Escobar dead.

Escobar was the most powerful criminal in the world. The Cali brothers earlier had dispatched an unsuccessful hit squad to Medellin, 155 miles northwest of the capital. But it was the would-be assassins who ended up dead. All six of them. Another attempt with a massive car bomb succeeded only in injuring one of Escobar's children.

The Cali dons knew Salcedo had ties to mercenaries. They knew he helped plan the aborted raid on the guerrillas. They told him his skills were required to end Escobar's reign of terror and to help protect them and their families.

Thus was Salcedo drafted into the Cali cartel.

"I did not feel I was a criminal," Salcedo recalled. "I had been fighting against the guerrillas. Now I was against Pablo Escobar."

ALMOST immediately, Salcedo helped devise an assault on Escobar's Medellin compound.

Two heavily armed Hughes 500 helicopters, painted in the olive green of Colombia's national police, flew a 12-man team of Salcedo's mercenaries to a mountain staging area.

But descending through a cloud bank, one of the choppers hit a mountaintop. The pilot was killed. The attack had to be abandoned.

DOJ_NMG_0136127

A second assault was planned, this time from a base in Panama. The mostly British mercenaries were in hotels for nearly two months awaiting orders to attack. Salcedo said they got bored and rowdy.

"It was difficult to keep these wild people quiet," he said. "They fought, they drank, they wanted women every day — they were like mad dogs."

Finally the raucous strangers attracted so much attention, including television news coverage, that Salcedo was forced to scrap yet another mission.

Meanwhile, Salcedo beefed up security for the Orejuela brothers and their extended families — a mother, four sisters, in-laws, wives and children.

"The families were huge. We had about 150 persons dedicated to caring for the safety of these people," Salcedo recalled.

Local police helped. Some were on the cartel payroll. Some regularly shared information with Salcedo.

"Miguel and Gilberto were able to corrupt anyone," he said. Finally, Escobar went to prison, where he continued to run his cartel and menace rivals from his cell. Salcedo was ordered to arrange an aerial bomb attack on Escobar's wing of the prison.

"It was an absurd idea. I told them it was unlikely to succeed. But Miguel said, 'Do your job,' " Salcedo recalled.

He traveled to El Salvador and, through a military contact, purchased four 500-pound bombs for about half a million dollars.

Waiting at a rural airstrip for the dawn arrival of a cargo plane from Cali to retrieve the illicit munitions, Salcedo was distressed to see an executive jet swoop out of the clouds. Its limited cargo space wasn't designed for bombs. Only three fit, stacked in the passenger cabin.

Local authorities closed in. The leftover bomb was abandoned. Salcedo barely escaped El Salvador and arrest before the botched pickup was exposed.

The episode drew international attention, and another assault plan was junked.

There was no turning back for Salcedo. The Colombian government now knew he had worked for the Cali cartel. And the Medellin gangs knew he was plotting to kill Escobar.

But in Cali, Salcedo found personal safety as he settled in to managing security for the Orejuela family.

"I had nothing to do with drugs. I told myself I was not one of them," he said.

SALCEDO had arrived in Cali just in time for a business boom. The early 1990s were, he said, the golden years for the cartel.

Business improved even more after December 1993, when Escobar died in a blaze of gunfire. The Medellin boss had escaped from prison, and from continuing Cali assassination plots, in 1992 only to be tracked down by national police 15 months later. Police were guided to his hide-out by radiophone signals. He and his bodyguard were gunned down as they tried to flee across the rooftops.

The Orejuela brothers promptly absorbed much of the Medellin cartel and ultimately controlled 80% of the international cocaine market. At its peak, the family ran what one U.S. Justice Department official told Congress was "the most prolific and successful criminal enterprise in history."

Then came the crackdown.

In Miami, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents targeted the Cali cartel's distribution organizations. Smuggling routes from Florida to Texas were compromised and had to be replaced. Key operatives were arrested and had to be bribed, or killed, to keep silent. Shipments of dope and money were lost.

In Bogota, the Clinton administration pressed Colombian political leaders to arrest major traffickers.

"Miguel was getting paranoid," Salcedo said. "He saw traitors everywhere."

Desperate for protection from what they feared most — extradition to the United States — the cartel bosses poured millions of dollars into the bank accounts of Colombian politicians. The new constitution included a no-extradition provision for native Colombians.

As U.S. prosecutor Ryan later would note, then "the bodies began to show up."

THE far-flung cartel was directed by Cali-based Colombians, but its operatives included many non-

Colombians susceptible to extradition. The "extraditables" came to be seen as security risks.

DOJ_NMG_0136128

WITHIN a week of his first conversation with a U.S. agent, Salcedo faced his first life-threatening decision. He knew where Miguel would be in the morning. He had been summoned to the hide-out to give an impatient Miguel a detailed report.

"He wanted to know what I was doing" to complete the assassination of Pallomari. Instead of preparing his report, Salcedo called in federal police.

The raiding party that hit Miguel's door about dawn the next morning included two DEA agents and an elite search team under Gen. Jose Serrano, chief of the Colombian national police.

Inside the apartment they found … no one.

Many safe houses were known to conceal vaults built into the walls for magician-like escapes. The Bogota team listened, tapped on cement walls and floors, then pulled out power drills and bored into suspicious areas.

Across town, Salcedo's pager went off. Still no sign of Miguel, the agents told him. He sensed doubts about his information.

Salcedo insisted that the drug lord was there. He also directed the raiding party to a desk in one of the rooms. It had a thick top, he said, that concealed a secret compartment.

Searchers dismantled the desk. Its secret chamber gave up a trove of records that delighted Serrano — "30,000 checks, cartel payments to police, 150 politicians, reporters, everyone," Salcedo said.

The sensational evidence was rushed back to Bogota.

About that time, however, cartel-friendly police arrived at the search site. They noted the physical damage — broken desk and holes in the walls — and found that the search team lacked a proper warrant. Furthermore, the American drug agents were armed, a violation of Colombian law.

Under threat of arrest, the U.S. agents and Serrano's team abandoned their search for Miguel Orejuela.

Salcedo soon learned of "the horrible situation."

On a cartel radiophone he overheard a call between Miguel and his son, William. The drug boss had just been rescued from an escape vault with the help of a local police captain.

He had emerged bleeding, an angry, wounded bear, apparently injured by one of the power drills.

Listening in on the phone conversation as Miguel reported to his son the details of his ordeal, Salcedo's only thought:

"What a nightmare. I am dead."

SALCEDO was a prime suspect, one of only five to 10 people who knew where Miguel had been hiding.

The American DEA agents insisted on taking him into protective custody immediately. But Salcedo refused, knowing that more time was needed to evacuate his extended family from Colombia.

"I decided to play on the fact that I might not be discovered," Salcedo said. "I immediately started investigating the leak."

The ploy seemed to deflect suspicion. It bought time. Salcedo used it to help steer accountant Pallomari toward the DEA. He also helped agents raid a cartel bomb-making site and a weapons storage warehouse with hundreds of machine guns.

"The risk was so incredible," Agent Kacerosky said in testimony. "I had to advise him to be [more] careful."

Salcedo and his U.S. handlers arranged to meet in a rural area outside Cali.

"If I was seen talking to an American, I would be killed," he said. "So we always arranged our meetings in the woods. This time it was near a sugar cane plantation."

It was nearly dark. Salcedo in his silver Mazda sedan was joined on an isolated dirt road by two U.S. agents crammed into a small, rented car.

"It should have been the perfect lonely place," Salcedo said. But suddenly police surrounded them. By unnerving coincidence, they were looking for the killer of a taxi driver.

The police demanded identity papers and prepared to search their cars. Salcedo knew that if the DEA agents were identified, their case would be blown and his life would be in even more jeopardy.

He took the police aside and pulled out 500 pesos.

"What are you doing in the middle of a cane field?" one officer inquired. Salcedo said he responded:

"Don't ask — just take this and go."

When they pressed for information, Salcedo told them: "We are homosexuals. They are foreigners and will be very embarrassed by any questions."

DOJ_NMG_0136129

The policemen took the 500 pesos and drove off.

FROM mid-July into August 1995, Salcedo continued to play a dual role — the man in charge of security for Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, and his secret betrayer.

He stayed close to Miguel and his family, at every opportunity sharing car rides and meeting with them alone to let his vulnerability erode suspicions.

The family became most concerned about accountant Pallomari. In the wrong hands, his extensive records of bribes and business dealings posed a greater threat to operations than the inconvenience of the brothers spending a few years of lavish confinement in a Colombian jail. Salcedo feigned progress toward setting up an assassination.

A police raid was scheduled one night to arrest Pallomari at a hiding place. An incident also was arranged so he would inexplicably die in custody.

That night, Salcedo arrived just ahead of the police. He told Pallomari he was about to be arrested and would die in jail. Though Pallomari did not trust Cali's chief of security, the fearful accountant went along to another hide-out.

"How did you know where to find me?" Pallomari asked the next day.

"I said, 'Guillermo, I've been taking care of you a lot.' "

But Salcedo's ability to protect Pallomari and himself was nearly exhausted. Then he got another opportunity and called his DEA contacts in Bogota.

AT dawn on a Sunday in August, four weeks after the failed raid that left Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela wounded, another police strike team arrived outside an apartment building in Cali.

Accompanied by two U.S. agents, the 15-man team of Colombian national police poured silently into the building.

Miguel heard them too late. He was arrested without incident in his underwear, scurrying for a vault in the wall.

Almost immediately, people began to disappear — Salcedo and his family, Pallomari — but this time it was into the custody and protection of U.S. authorities.

In the days that followed, the entire Cali cartel infrastructure was exposed. Within a few months, about 130 people were indicted. It was, Agent Kacerosky later would observe tersely, "historical."

Salcedo pleaded guilty in Miami to a single count of racketeering and, at an unusual sentencing hearing, was universally praised by agents and prosecutors who recommended unprecedented leniency. U.S. District Judge William Hoeveler agreed, noting Salcedo's "service rendered to this country" and actions that "saved the lives of a number of people."

But it was not the end of the Cali cartel.

As Colombian citizens, the Orejuela brothers could not be extradited to the United States. Though that law was repealed after the politicians behind it were exposed for taking bribes from the cartels, the brothers remained in Bogota's La Picota prison, beyond the reach of U.S. authorities.

Federal drug agents would have to prove that the cartel leaders continued to operate their smuggling empire from prison, after the extradition ban was lifted.

They did just that. Since then, the entire Cali cartel hierarchy has been extradited, thanks to Salcedo. For his service, the relocated Colombian received rewards of about $1.7 million.

But more than a decade after betraying his bosses, Salcedo's life remains in jeopardy.

"He has done an inestimable service to the U.S. and Colombia," said his lawyer, Robert F. Dunlap of Miami.

Ryan, the federal prosecutor, in a recent interview called Salcedo one of the country's "least-known heroes," one of the people most responsible "for bringing down the most powerful criminals in the world."

Ryan still marvels at Salcedo's contribution, saying he and federal agents thought at the time that the effort had no more than "a 1% chance to succeed."

He recalled: "You can't imagine just how alone this guy was — talking on phones that he knew were bugged … knowing so well how easily he could be compromised. He must have brass balls this big."

Miguel Orejuela was extradited to Florida in 2005, a year after Gilberto. Today, the brothers are serving what probably will be life terms in U.S. federal prison.

About this story

Jorge Salcedo's contacts with The Times began with a handshake in Miami during a brief court appearance in October 1998. In the years since, he has made sporadic telephone calls to a Times reporter from undisclosed locations.

In telephone interviews ranging from a few minutes to more than an hour, he shared details of his role in the cartel and occasional frustrations with life in U.S. exile. Years passed between some of his calls.

The Times has no information about his whereabouts and no way to reach him. All contacts were by phone and were initiated by Salcedo.

This account is based on those interviews, corroborated by court records, sworn testimony and additional interviews with federal agents involved in the case.

Tommy Chong To Raise Money To Help 'Guru Of Ganja' Defend Himself At Federal Trial (AP)

AP, February 26, 2007

PIEDMONT, Calif. — Comedian Tommy Chong will help raise money to defend the self-proclaimed "Guru of Ganja," who is charged with growing hundreds of marijuana plants for a dispensary.

Chong, who starred with Cheech Marin in stoner movie classics "Up in Smoke" and "Nice Dreams," will appear at a $125-per-person event for Ed Rosenthal.

Rosenthal, 62, famed for his marijuana cultivation books and the "Ask Ed" column he wrote for High Times magazine, will host the event at his Piedmont home on March 4.

"The party will celebrate how far we've come in legalizing medical marijuana as well as provide me with the money I need to fund my current trial that is defending all of our rights," Rosenthal said.

Rosenthal, who's scheduled to appear in federal court March 19, estimates his trial and related expenses could cost more than $300,000.

Federal prosecutors accused Rosenthal of growing marijuana, laundering money and falsifying tax returns from October 2001 through February 2002.

In a post to his Web log, The Blog of Chong, on Saturday, Chong urged his readers to attend the benefit for Rosenthal and donate to his defense. "Ed is being dogged by the feds for his marijuana work with sick people," Chong wrote. "It is the feds who are sick."

Hells Angels Case Going To Trial (SEATIMES)

By David Bowermaster, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, February 26, 2007

Jury selection begins today in a massive federal racketeering case being brought against current and former members of the Washington Nomads chapter of the Hells Angels.

Prosecutors allege that the Nomads' president and three others engaged in a long list of crimes, from murder, kidnapping and witness tampering to extortion, robbery and interstate trafficking of stolen Harley Davidson motorcycles, according to a 19-count indictment filed in the case.

The government intends to call 125 to 150 witnesses and take 10 weeks to present its case in U.S. District Court in Seattle, according to a pre-trial brief filed last week.

It is the latest in a string of racketeering cases that the Justice Department has brought against motorcycle gangs around the country in recent years, including a sweeping case filed against 26 members of the Bandidos Motorcycle Club in U.S. District Court in Seattle in June 2005.

George Wegers, the national president of the Bandidos Motorcycle Club, last May pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit racketeering. Wegers received a 20-month prison sentence in October, which included credit for time served.

Last week, two Hells Angels motorcycle-club members were sentenced to 12 to 30 months in Nevada state prison for their roles in a bloody brawl in 2002 with rival biker-gang members at Harrah's Laughlin hotel-casino in southern Nevada that left two Hells Angels and a rival Mongol gang member dead.

The core charge in the upcoming Seattle trial, which is scheduled to begin next Monday, is that the Washington Nomads is a highly organized, criminal enterprise whose members are punishable under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO) Act, which was created to prosecute organized-crime syndicates such as the Mafia.

The lead defendant in the case is Richard "Smilin' Rick" Fabel, who served as the president of the Washington Nomads and, for a time, as West Coast president of the Hells Angels.

Other defendants in the case are Joshua Binder and Rodney Rollness, who were both full-time members of the Washington Nomads until 2003, and Ricky Jenks, who is still a member.

Prosecutors allege a laundry list of crimes perpetrated by the four defendants between 1996 and 2006. "As an enterprise, the Washington Nomads Chapter engaged in acts of violence, including extortion, robbery, kidnapping, murder, threats of violence and witness tampering; interstate trafficking in stolen motor vehicles; and [vehicle identification number] switching," according to charging papers.

Murder allegation

The most serious allegation is that Rollness and Binder murdered Michael "Santa" Walsh during a party at the home of Paul Foster in Arlington on July 21, 2001.

Foster has been charged as an accessory to murder. U.S. District Court Judge Robert Lasnik has ordered that Foster be tried separately, beginning in June.

The government said it intends to call confidential informants who have claimed Rollness told them he and Binder killed Walsh because Walsh was falsely presenting himself as a member of the Hells Angels.

They also killed Walsh, the government alleges, so Binder could get his "Filthy Few" patch, which is allegedly given only to Hells Angels members who have committed a murder on behalf of the club.

Prosecutors had contemplated seeking the death penalty against Rollness and Binder for Walsh's murder but decided against it in September, after consultation with Justice Department headquarters.

The charges include three allegations of witness tampering by Rollness. The most recent allegedly occurred between Feb. 14, 2006, and May 1, 2006 — while Rollness was in federal custody awaiting trial. While in prison, according to prosecutors, Rollness used "intimidation, threats and corrupt persuasion" to influence or prevent the testimony of an unnamed witness relating to Walsh's murder.

Undercover infiltrator

Several of the other charges relate to the theft and trafficking of motorcycles, particularly Harley Davidsons, which Hells Angels are required to ride, according to prosecutors.

Prosecutors plan to bring five motorcycles into the courtroom to show as evidence to the jury.

An unusual sidelight to the case could come Tuesday, when a hearing is scheduled to determine whether testimony by expert witness Jay Dobyns, an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, will be allowed. Dobyns, who went undercover to infiltrate a Hells Angels chapter in Arizona, is expected to testify about the internal workings of the Hells Angels and the club's processes, such as how it accepts new members and awards patches.

However, Dobyns in May filed a formal grievance with ATF alleging that the agency failed to protect him and ignored death threats against himself and his family, according to the Arizona Republic newspaper. Dobyns also said ATF spread false allegations that he was psychologically unfit for duty and a danger to himself and others.

Attorneys for Fabel requested, and received from the court, a copy of Dobyns' personnel file to evaluate his fitness as a witness.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigrants Who Wire Money Get Help From The Fed (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

Even as the federal government is starting to crack down on companies that hire illegal immigrants, it's been helping those same workers send money home, cheap.

Dubbed Directo a Mexico, the Federal Reserve-sponsored service allows customers without Social Security numbers to wire money through the Fed system to Mexico's central bank at little cost. In September, the Fed expanded the remittance program by allowing immigrants, legal or not, to open accounts at participating banks and credit unions in the U.S. or Mexico. About 27,000 transfers are made through the program each month.

The program has attracted the attention of conservative immigration activists and members of Congress, who say financial institutions shouldn't cater to illegal immigrants.

Rep. Brian P. Bilbray (R-Solana Beach), who chairs the congressional Immigration Reform Caucus, said Directo a Mexico and programs like it should be stopped and that banks that participate are "profiteering from illegal immigration."

Bilbray is also targeting Bank of America Corp., which this month announced plans to offer credit cards to immigrants without Social Security numbers, drawing complaints that the nation's largest retail bank was underwriting illegal immigration.

"It's illegal for a landlord to do it, it's illegal for an employer to do it and it should be illegal for financial institutions to do it," Bilbray said.

Bank of America has said that it complied fully with all banking and anti-terrorism laws governing customer identification, which permit the use of forms of ID other than Social Security numbers.

Bilbray said legislators are working on proposals that would prevent financial institutions such as the Fed and Bank of America from catering to illegal immigrants, and are calling on the Bush administration to address the issue.

Elizabeth McQuerry, an Atlanta-based assistant vice president for the Fed's retail payments office, said Directo a Mexico isn't breaking any laws. She said the program complies with the Patriot Act, the Bank Secrecy Act and other money laundering laws. Customers have to provide identification — a consular identification card or other picture ID — and banks regularly check the documents' authenticity, she said.

Fed staff developed the program with counterparts at Mexico's central bank after President Bush announced it with then-Mexican President Vicente Fox in 2003. About 150 banks and credit unions participate, including 20 in California, McQuerry said.

Directo a Mexico was intended for all Mexicans living in the U.S., but did not specifically exclude those here illegally. Only immigrants who are in the U.S. legally can get a Social Security number, but any Mexican national can get a consular ID, regardless of legal status.

Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), an advocate of increased border security who has talked in the past of taxing illegal immigrants' remittances, said that while the Fed program may not be breaking any financial laws, "There is a law against aiding and abetting illegal aliens in this country."

Conservative groups are also pressing the government to stop or modify Directo a Mexico. The Washington-based legal group Judicial Watch, which claims 400,000 members, obtained a copy of a Fed presentation about Directo a Mexico in December and posted it on its website to show that the government was not only offering a subsidized service to illegals, but actively marketing and promoting it.

"This program undermines our nation's immigration laws and is a potential national security nightmare," Judicial Watch President Tom Fitton said in a statement at the time. "In the least, the Federal Reserve must limit this program to legal aliens and U.S. citizens only."

Ira Mehlman, the Los Angeles-based spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, said Directo a Mexico not only flouts immigration law, it hurts U.S. workers by draining money from the national economy.

"This is money earned by people who have come here illegally, often earned at the expense of other Americans and then taken out of the country and not spent here," Mehlman said.

DOJ_NMG_0136133

His group, which claims 100,000 members, about 35,000 in California, believes the federal government should better regulate wire transfer companies rather than offer an alternative that "makes it easier and more attractive for people to come here and break the law."

Directo a Mexico supporters and economists dispute claims that it harms the U.S. economy, and say the program will actually help fight crime by encouraging people to use a legal, regulated money transfer service. They also say it may stem illegal immigration by making it easier and cheaper to wire money home, lessening the need for the sender's relatives to cross the border to earn a living.

Philip Martin, chair of the Comparative Immigration and Integration Program at UC Davis, said remittances sent to Mexico last year were just a fraction of the U.S. economy, $23 billion out of a gross domestic product of more than $13 trillion. And as businesses increasingly serve illegal immigrant customers, he said, it's in the country's best interest to monitor their activity through programs like the Fed's.

"If you don't allow people to use the banking system, the money will still go but it will build up a transfer infrastructure that terrorists can then use," Martin said.

Rep. Eliot L. Engel (D-N.Y.), who chairs the Western Hemisphere subcommittee of the House Committee on International Relations, plans to hold hearings about remittances, which he said need to be formally integrated into the U.S. banking system. "We should stop pretending that they're not there," he said.

Engel thinks the U.S. needs to standardize the remittance wire system, linking the Fed to foreign central banks so that people can transfer money, "without having to sneak around or do it on the sly."

"You cut down transaction costs, make it easier to do and it helps everybody," Engel said.

The Fed offers a competitive exchange rate and charges banks 67 cents for each wire transfer to Mexico. After banks add their own fees, it usually costs customers $2 to $5 per transfer, regardless of the amount sent.

Private wire services usually charge more, including surcharges for larger transfers and claiming the money in Mexico. The average cost of wiring $300 to Mexico from the U.S. was $10.40 last year, when 65.8 million of the transfers were made, according to a Bank of Mexico report.

McQuerry estimates Directo a Mexico saves its customers about $3.7 million annually.

Directo a Mexico proved popular at Mitchell Bank in Milwaukee, which remade itself as "Wisconsin's immigrant bank" during the past seven years to cater to an increasingly Mexican customer base. The bank offers the first two wire transfers free, then charges $2.50 for each additional wire, $4 for customers without accounts at the bank.

On average, customers make about 200 wire transfers totaling $200,000 each month, according to James Maloney, the bank's chairman. Maloney credits Directo a Mexico with attracting 10% to 15% more customers a month.

"We've really removed a lot of the banking barriers for the migrant community," he said.

New customers include Jose Chavez, 52, an accountant and real estate investor who immigrated to Milwaukee from Mexico illegally in 1983 and later became a citizen. Chavez opened an account at Mitchell Bank last year after he heard about Directo a Mexico, and used it to open one for his brother in his hometown in the state of Michoacan.

Every two weeks, Chavez wires $100 to his mother, saving about $8 a transfer, and he recommends the program to illegal immigrants. "They have a hard time establishing credit here, for obvious reasons," he said. "But the reality is they're here and they are not going anywhere"

Maloney has fielded criticism recently for serving illegal immigrants. But he defends Directo a Mexico, which he supplemented with mortgage loans that target immigrants.

"We find ourselves in a neighborhood that is heavily migrants. Our job is not to determine what other people's status is," Maloney said, any more than it's the responsibility of a grocery or department store. "These people live and work in our neighborhood. It's our job as a community bank to provide them services."

Mexican Wives Seek Ouster Of Husbands From U.S. (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136134

The women of Tecalpulco, Mexico, want the U.S. government to enforce its immigration laws because they want to force their husbands to come back home from working illegally in the United States.

They have created an English-language Web page where they identify themselves as the "wetback wives" and broadcast their pleas, both to their men and to the U.S. government.

"To the United States government -- close the border, send our men home to us, even if you must deport them (only treat them in a humane manner -- please do not hurt them)," it reads.

In poignant public messages to their husbands, the women talk about their children who feel abandoned, and worry that the men have forsaken their families for other women and for the American lifestyle.

"You said you were only going to Arizona to get money for our house, but now you have been away and did not come back when your sister got married," one woman writes to a man named Pedro. "Oh how I worry that you have another woman! Don't you love me? You told me you love me."

It's a stark reminder of an often forgotten voice in the U.S. immigration debate -- the wives, children, parents and villages left behind as millions of workers come to the U.S., many of them illegally. The plea also underscores the dual effects of migration on Mexico: Its economy needs American jobs as an outlet for workers, but determined, able-bodied workers get siphoned out of Mexico.

More than 10 million Mexican-born people, or nearly one out of every 10, was living in the United States in 2005. And as a percentage of the work force it's even higher: One in seven, or 14 percent, were here, according to the Migration Policy Institute. The institute said 77 percent of Mexican workers in the U.S. were younger than 45, and 70 percent were men.

Villages devoid of men between 20 and 50 are common in many parts of the country. The stories of single mothers struggling to raise their children are just as frequent.

The women of Tecalpulco have come up with one way to cope. They run an artists' cooperative to sell traditional-style jewelry, including through the Internet. The page where they make their personal pleas, www.artcamp.com.mx/venga/, is a part of their Web site.

One of the women writes to "Ruben" telling him their children haven't seen him in three years and ask where he is.

"I know we agreed you should try your fortune in the United States, but I didn't know that it would be so lonely and that you would be gone for such a long time, please return to us," she writes.

Mexican officials are aware of the social and economic consequences to their towns and villages. But businesses and government officials on both sides of the border also acknowledge a sort of grand bargain -- the U.S. gets cheap labor, while Mexico has an outlet for its unemployed, who in turn send cash back home.

Mexican President Felipe Calderon in December, while visiting Nogales on the U.S.-Mexico border, said his country needs more foreign investment to try to keep jobs at home.

"The generation of well-paid jobs is the only long lasting solution to the migration problem," he said, according to the Associated Press.

But for now, Mexico is also addicted to the influx of cash. In 2006, Mexican workers in the United States sent $23 billion back to their families in Mexico, an amount that rivals Mexico's foreign income from oil sales.

Steven Camarota, research director for the Center for Immigration Studies, which backs less immigration and a crackdown on illegal aliens, said the women's stories show that the huge migration flow is "very disruptive to the lives of those other countries."

He said it also proves that the men aren't fleeing poverty.

"These women would not be asking their husbands to come back if they themselves were starving," he said. "It's really more of people wanting more, a better life. It's perfectly understandable. But that's different than these people fleeing such desperation there's no way you could enforce the law."

Danville Dentist Sentenced To Prison In Tax Fraud Scheme (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0136135

AP, February 26, 2007

San Francisco (AP) -- A Danville dentist convicted of hiding $300,000 from the IRS in a secret offshore bank account has been sentenced to two years in prison, the Justice Department said.

Roy Albert Lewis was sentenced Friday in U.S. District Court for income tax evasion and conspiracy to defraud the government after being found guilty in August. Judge Susan Illston also ordered Lewis to participate in a mental health treatment program and perform 100 hours of community service.

Lewis' medical practice paid bogus expenses over a 10-year period to Denver-based Tower Executive Resources for items such as franchise, consulting, or management fees to generate huge tax deductions, according to the Justice Department.

Tower then allegedly funneled the money into the secret account, which Lewis controlled, authorities said.

In April 2005, two Tower promoters were convicted of conspiracy and assisting in the preparation of fraudulent tax returns after a trial in Denver.

Lewis' father, Leroy Albert Lewis, 72, an oral surgeon from Danville, is still awaiting trial on fraud and tax-evasion charges, according to prosecutors.

U.S. Softens Tax Increase For Some Expats (WSJ)

By Rob Wells And Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

A new Treasury Department notice affecting some Americans working abroad further chips away at a controversial tax increase enacted last May.

Accountants say it is too soon to gauge the precise impact on expatriates and employers, but business leaders say the move could provide significant relief in numerous cases.

The new Treasury notice "will ameliorate what had become a disincentive to put U.S. workers in jobs in some key locations around the world," says Kenneth Kies, managing director of Clark Consulting's Federal Policy Group in Washington.

The latest Treasury announcement, issued Friday, came after strong protests from business leaders about a Treasury Department notice in October. That notice offered some relief but didn't go nearly as far as business leaders had hoped. At issue are details of the May law, which raised taxes on many Americans working abroad, retroactive to the start of 2006.

Among those hit hard by the tax increase were upper-income Americans working in places with high housing costs and low taxes, such as Hong Kong and Singapore, and whose employers don't give them tax-protection packages. Along with the expats, many employers protested, noting the expense of providing such tax protection and arguing that the May law discouraged the hiring of Americans abroad.

Congressional staffers have estimated the tax increase will raise about $2.1 billion for the U.S. government over a decade.

Part of the complex May law limited the amount of housing costs some Americans working abroad may exclude or deduct on their U.S. income-tax returns. Critics of the Treasury's October notice said it didn't offer enough relief for Americans in some places, such as Moscow, and unjustifiably omitted important high-cost locations, such as Beijing and Shanghai.

Friday's revised notice, issued by Treasury and the Internal Revenue Service, increased the housing-expense limit in several places, including Moscow, Oslo and Hamilton, Bermuda. It included adjusted limits for 15 locations that weren't on the original list, including Beijing; Shanghai; Mumbai and New Delhi, India; Zurich; Taipei, Taiwan; and Jakarta, Indonesia. The new list also included Riyadh and Jidda in Saudi Arabia.

The tax impact of Friday's rules can vary widely from country to country.

The law signed by President Bush last May made major changes to the old law, under which Americans working abroad could exclude as much as $80,000 of their foreign-earned pay for 2006. Under the new law, that figure rose to $82,400 for 2006, but income above that now typically is subject to higher effective tax rates than before. The new law also greatly reduced the maximum amount of housing costs overseas workers could exclude or deduct.

Treasury and IRS officials say they are continuing to work on guidance for housing expenses for 2007.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House's Travel Rules Limited (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers have continued to take trips paid for by outside groups since the House voted last month to restrict who can pay for such travel.

House travel records show that 19 members since Jan. 5 have accepted airfare, meals and lodging from special interests, including groups that employ lobbyists. The records were compiled by the non-partisan PoliticalMoneyLine.

The trips demonstrate that lawmakers "are trying to see what they are going to get away with," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of the liberal-leaning watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

In its first official act as it took control Jan. 4, the Democratic majority in the House pushed through rules on the way lawmakers do business with lobbyists. The changes, which take effect Thursday, were a response to corruption scandals such as those that sent former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and ex-California congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham to prison.

The House also created exemptions to the rules, including allowing lawmakers to take overnight trips paid for by lobbyists and the companies that hire them and to accept travel expenses from organizations that don't hire lobbyists. Two-night trips also are allowed if members need extra time to get to and from an event. The Senate has approved similar exemptions that are not yet law.

Most of the travel reported by House members would be exempt from the rules because it was paid for by groups that don't hire lobbyists.

Five trips were sponsored by organizations that lobby Congress and would face greater scrutiny by the House ethics committee.

Rep. Cliff Stearns, R-Fla., and his wife, Joan, flew to Las Vegas at the expense of the Consumer Electronics Association, according to a disclosure report Stearns filed with the House. The technology industry group, which lobbies on issues such as trade, spent $1,970 on the Stearnses' trip. Stearns is the top Republican on a panel overseeing trade and consumer protection.

Stearns' trip on Jan. 6-9 would not be allowed under the new rules. Spokesman Paul Flusche said Stearns had been invited well before the House adopted the changes. Flusche said the trip was "an educational experience" that provides information so Stearns "can do his job better."

Michael Petricone, the association's lobbyist, defended the trip. "This is (lawmakers') best opportunity to have hands-on experience with these products that they are regulating," he said.

Petricone said a "handful" of other lawmakers attended the event. He declined to name them. Lawmakers have 30 days after a trip to file a report disclosing the sponsor, location and other details.

Brendan Daly, spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said the effective date of the travel rule was postponed to give the House ethics committee time to devise new guidelines.

Exemptions Still Allow Lawmakers Plenty Of Free Trips (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — One weekend in January, a dozen House members gathered at a luxury Miami hotel to learn more about health care issues.

The lawmakers assembled at the Mandarin Oriental, which boasts Biscayne Bay views and rooms starting at $469 a night. The trip, sponsored by the non-profit Alliance for Health Reform, is among the travel allowed under ethics rules that go into effect Thursday.

In passing the rules, intended to cut ties between lawmakers and lobbyists, top Democrats led by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi also agreed to exemptions that allow House members to continue taking trips to destinations such as Miami and San Juan, Puerto Rico.

DOJ_NMG_0136137

The Miami trip — along with a gathering in San Juan last week sponsored by the Aspen Institute, a non-profit think tank — is allowed under an exemption that permits organizations that don't employ lobbyists to pick up the tab. Another exemption allows trips paid for by lobbyists and their employers as along as the trips last no more than two nights.

Since the House rules leave campaign-finance laws untouched, lobbyists and members of Congress also can spend days together on golfing and ski trips paid for by a third party, generally a political fundraising committee established by a lawmaker. Lobbyists can then write checks in support of lawmakers' fundraising committees.

A lobbying and ethics bill recently passed by the Senate has similar exemptions but is not yet law.

"The question this raises is whether very much has changed," said Ellen Miller, executive director of the Sunlight Foundation, a government watchdog group. "There are still ways for people who carry water for special interests to pay for travel."

Lawmakers long have traveled on the tab of special interests, including organizations that seek to influence legislation. PoliticalMoneyLine, a group that tracks congressional travel, has counted more than 7,500 such trips worth more than $21.5 million since 2000.

The new rules, however, still allow groups with ties to lobbyists to pay for trips by members of Congress that last for up to two nights. The travel must be approved by the House ethics committee and is restricted to activities such as a giving a speech or attending a forum.

Sponsors of such trips also will have to declare in writing that lobbyists won't accompany House members on the trip or play a big role in planning the event.

Rep. Collin Peterson, D-Minn., chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, took an overnight trip last month paid for by the American Farm Bureau, according to a report Peterson filed with the House. The bureau paid the $1,800 tab for him to speak at its annual meeting.

"There's nothing unethical about the trip," said Mary Kay Thatcher, the bureau's public policy director. "It's not like we took him to Hawaii and kept him there for five days."

Peterson did not respond to interview requests.

John Graham, who heads the American Society of Association Executives, takes credit for pushing the exemption for short trips. His 22,000-member group represents the CEOs of professional associations, from doctors to roofers.

Graham said his group began lobbying Pelosi's staff about this provision before the November election that gave Democrats control of the House. Graham said his group also pressed its case with House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer of Maryland and Majority Whip James Clyburn of South Carolina.

Graham said he argued that a ban on travel would keep lawmakers from attending legitimate gatherings of professional groups such as those he represents, while still allowing lobbyists to participate in campaign-fundraising trips.

"As long as you were going to give a check to a member in the form of a fundraiser you could take them anywhere," he said. "That image is horrible."

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly said several groups lobbied for the short trip exemption. Daly said the rules represent real change. "Not all travel is, by definition, wrong," he said. "The idea was to curb the abuses. We have done that."

Craig Holman, of the liberal-leaning watchdog group Public Citizen, said the rules are a "vast improvement" and called Pelosi's compromises "reasonable."

Under the rules, the trip to Miami passes muster because the health alliance doesn't hire lobbyists or use lobbyist money to pay for the conference. The Commonwealth Fund, a New York-based foundation, helped pay the bills.

Ed Howard, executive vice president of the Alliance for Health Reform, said the event was no vacation for House members. "We kept them working," he said.

George Burke, a spokesman for Rep. Carolyn McCarthy, D-N.Y., one of the House members on the trip, agreed: "It's not one of these trips where they go and lounge on the beach for three days."

More trips acceptable under the House exemptions occurred during the week-long Presidents Day recess, which ends today.

DOJ_NMG_0136138

The Aspen Institute scheduled its four-day trip to San Juan last week for members of Congress to learn more about the No Child Left Behind education law. Former Iowa senator Dick Clark, who runs Aspen's congressional program, said 16 or 17 lawmakers were scheduled for the trip. He declined to name them.

Congress To Consider How Unions Organize (LAT)

By Joe Mathews

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

Choose your weapon: cards or ballots?

It has become the central question in union organizing fights across the country: Will the employer recognize a union after a majority of its workers sign union cards? Or will the employer insist that its workers cast secret ballots in federally supervised elections?

These questions — of paper and power — move from the workplace to Congress this week, when the House is scheduled to cast the first vote in what could be a years-long legislative battle between the country's largest labor unions and most powerful business lobbies.

The stakes: deciding the manner in which Americans join unions.

The proposed Employee Free Choice Act would take from employers the right to decide whether to accept the signing of cards — generally called "card check" — or demand an election. Instead, a workplace could unionize if labor persuaded a majority of employees to sign cards — without an election of all employees.

"We're not free to organize the way we want to organize," said Glendale Hilton bartender Angela Reid, who has been active in union organizing at the hotel.

"We don't want to do an election. We want to vote the way we want to — give our cards back to our organizers and vote that way."

Reversed roles

For both sides, the battle represents something of a role reversal and offers a window on the important but odd details of labor law.

Unions and their political allies, which for 70 years championed the secret ballot for unionizing workers, are all but abandoning the election process, arguing that aggressive anti-union tactics by businesses make such elections too difficult and costly.

And business leaders, generally hostile to any government intervention in their companies, are preparing to spend millions to defend federal supervision of elections in which workers choose whether to unionize.

Without a vote, said Joe Herman, a lawyer who has long represented employers, "employees would lose their free choice on whether or not to become unionized."

"It's incredible verbal jujitsu to call this Employee Free Choice," Herman said. "It's Orwellian."

The House is expected to approve the legislation as soon as Thursday, but Senate prospects are less certain.

Even if the bill passes Congress, President Bush has pledged to veto it.

Labor leaders expect defeat this year but say theirs is a years-long strategy, designed to educate the public on the problems of secret ballots.

'That's the crunch'

Unions say that without a change in how workers join unions, the percentage of union-represented workers — fewer than 10% in the private sector — will continue its decline.

Through natural attrition and changes in the economy, labor loses about 500,000 members a year, said labor historian David Brody, a professor emeritus at UC Davis. Under secret ballots, the union movement produces fewer than 100,000 new members a year.

"They need a new process," Brody said. "That's the crunch right there."

Secret ballots were part of the National Labor Relations Act, passed in 1935. Advocates saw elections as a way to give workers a choice between "company unions," created by management, and more independent and adversarial unions.

DOJ_NMG_0136139

The signing of union cards also has long been an integral part of how people join unions. Under the current law, unions organize by having workers sign cards. Some employers agree that if the cards are independently checked by a third party — a card check — they will automatically recognize the union without a secret ballot.

But under the law, employers can and often do insist on a secret ballot, which must be supervised by the federal National Labor Relations Board. If a majority votes to join the union, collective bargaining is supposed to begin.

Unions win three out of every five such elections, according to the board. But dozens of studies by labor, academic researchers and human rights groups have found that the rules for such elections favor employers.

Most companies faced with organizing campaigns hire consultants or lawyers who specialize in "union avoidance." By one estimate, the business of battling union organizing is a $4-billion industry.

Unions allege systematic attempts by companies to fire, discipline or intimidate workers who support a union. The balance of labor complaints about the election process focus on delays. Even when unions win, some companies delay contract talks or refuse to bargain collectively.

In response, many unions have tried to avoid elections. Before submitting signed union cards, they build campaigns to push employers to sign "card-check neutrality" deals to recognize the union without an election.

Such campaigns have been successful in Los Angeles. Security officers in office buildings around Los Angeles County are being organized under a neutrality agreement between Service Employees International Union, building owners and security contractors.

The most prominent ongoing labor dispute in Southern California — over a unionization drive at hotels near Los Angeles International Airport — is about a card check. The union seeking to organize, Unite Here, is demanding that hotels agree to a card check. The hotels want their workers to have a secret ballot.

Asked about the effect on hotel workers, Maria Elena Durazo, head of the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, said, "I'm confident that if the Employee Free Choice were law, workers on Century Boulevard would now have better wages, family health insurance and a pension through a union contract."

Making their case

The nation's leading business lobbies and trade associations counter that problems with the system are relatively rare. More than 90% of secret ballots take place within 57 days.

Businesses have hired top political consultants for a campaign that portrays unions as hostile to democracy.

Congressional Republicans say that under a card check, some workers could see their workplace unionized without having a say.

They also suggest that their Democratic colleagues, some of whom previously supported secret ballots, have been intimidated by labor political power into supporting the Employee Free Choice measure.

Opponents of the legislation have circulated letters in which bill supporters — writing in the past in other contexts — have demanded secret ballot elections.

"I wish members of Congress could vote secret ballot when it comes to union issues," said Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), "because a whole lot of intimidation goes on."

Panels Seek Bigger Budgets For 110th (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton And John Mcardle

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

House committees are proving to be a little more ambitious, at least financially, than their Senate counterparts, according to budget requests submitted to the chambers' respective administrative panels. With most committees having turned in their requests, House panels are seeking an overall budget boost of 10.7 percent, nearly double the average Senate request of about 5 percent over funding provided during the 109th Congress.

So far, the leaders of 16 House committees had introduced funding resolutions, which cover the panels from January 2007 to January 2009 and include funding requirements for 2007 and 2008. (In most panel requests, funds are split evenly for each year.)

The ethics committee is seeking the biggest increase, a 42.6 percent boost in funds to $6.1 million from $4.3 million two years ago.

But that's still the lowest request any committee has submitted so far.

The panel that has requested the most money? That honor goes to Oversight and Government Reform, which is seeking an 11.6 percent increase, to $22.9 million from $20.5 million. Chairman Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) has made it clear in recent weeks he intends to increase the level of oversight done by the committee.

Per tradition, the Appropriations Committee writes and approves its own budget. Energy and Commerce, Intelligence, Rules, and House Administration had yet to introduce their budget resolutions as of last week.

A new panel that is expected to study climate change is still being formed and also has not introduced a funding resolution.

Spokesmen for the Energy, House Administration and Rules committees said their funding resolutions should be forthcoming.

House Administration is in charge of approving committee funds and normally holds hearings on requests. The committee has not yet scheduled a hearing on the matter, spokeswoman Janice Crump confirmed Friday.

In the past, the funding resolutions are viewed as "wish lists" for the committees, and the final budgets often are pared down. In 2005, the House panels asked for a 17 percent increase in funding but ended up with 10.1 percent.

The only panel not seeking an increase this session is the House Budget Committee, which is requesting about $12 million. But others asked for fairly significant funding boosts.

Armed Services is seeking $15.5 million, a 20.6 percent increase from the previous session's $12.8 million. The Homeland Security Committee, meanwhile, requested $16.5 million, a 17.9 percent boost from $14 million two years ago.

But a Homeland Security aide said those numbers are a bit misleading, as the committee is asking for about a 3 percent increase in 2007 from 2006, to $8.1 million from $7.9 million.

That is because in 2005, when the 109th session committee budgets were approved, Homeland Security had just become a permanent panel and required a bit more funding.

On the Senate side, the Rules and Administration Committee will meet Wednesday to hold a markup for the 110th Congress omnibus committee funding resolution, which provides funds for 18 of the chamber's 20 committees. (The Appropriations and Ethics committee budgets are not included in the bill.)

Most Senate committee budget requests this year kept to guidelines established in January that allowed additional money only for administrative expenses.

Over the course of the 110th Congress, the additional money works out to about a 5 percent increase over the funding provided during the 109th. That increase is primarily to fund cost-of-living adjustments for staffers, provided that such COLAs are approved each fiscal year.

But three Senate committee requests came in above guideline levels. The Foreign Relations Committee is requesting an increase that works out to about 11.8 percent over what it was provided during the 109th Congress; Intelligence, 9.2 percent; Finance, 11.3 percent.

Leaders for each of those committees went before the Rules panel prior to the Presidents Day recess to make their cases.

Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) and ranking member Dick Lugar (R-Ind.) noted in a joint letter to Rules that they were seeking additional money this year because the size and workload of their committee has expanded and because during the 109th Congress the Rules panel had granted the committee additional money from a special reserve held for such uses. This Congress, Foreign Relations is hoping to have that additional funding be permanently added to its budget so as not to have to dip into the special reserve again.

The Intelligence Committee sought to justify its funding request by pointing out that the COLA provided for high-level staff salaries is not adequate to compete in the marketplace when it comes to attracting, retaining and compensating qualified individuals. The Intelligence panel also is seeking additional funding to replace all of the laptop and workstation devices on the committee's unclassified network.

Finance is seeking its additional money to fund its subcommittees, which is something the committee did not do until it was mandated by Conference rules during the 109th Congress.

House Ethics Seeks 43% Boost (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

The House ethics committee has requested a $6.1 million operating budget for the 110th Congress, nearly a 43 percent increase from the previous Congress. If approved by the House Administration Committee, which has jurisdiction over all House committee budgets, the investigative panel will have doubled its funding since the 108th Congress, when it had a $3 million budget.

The request marks a dramatic increase in committee spending in recent years. Throughout most of the 1990s, the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct funding consistently hovered in the mid-$2 million range. In the 109th Congress, then-Chairman Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and then-ranking member Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.) asked for and received an operational budget of $4.2 million, a 40 percent increase.

At the time, Hastings outlined his intentions to use the funds to hire additional investigative staff, increase ethics education efforts, revamp the panel's Web site to make it more user-friendly and to reissue committee guidelines available to Members, staff and the public.

Those additional funds, however, largely went unused after Hastings and Mollohan deadlocked on a number of issues that left the panel inactive for several months during the 109th Congress, and Hastings was unsuccessful in achieving a number of those objectives.

Chairwoman Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio) has indicated she would like to hire additional investigative staff. The panel also is taking on increased responsibility to vet and approve privately funded travel requests by Members and staff in the wake of new travel guidelines unveiled Feb. 20.

According to LegiStorm.com, a tracking service for Congressional staff salaries, the ethics panel had 12 staffers on the payroll in late 2006, including eight staff counsels. In early February, Jones hired one additional counsel, Dawn Kelly Mobley.

The panel on Feb. 16 requested a $3 million budget to be allocated in 2007, and $3.1 million for 2008. While the funding request, if approved, will double the budget in a little over three years, the ethics committee still has the smallest operational budget of all House committees.

Few Congressional Web Sites Make The Grade (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

The Senate is more Web savvy than the House, and Republicans are superior to Democrats when it comes to maintaining their Congressional sites — but, overall, the legislative branch is performing poorly, according to a report scheduled to be released today by the Congressional Management Foundation.

Working with experts from Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government, the University of California at Riverside and Ohio State University, the CMF studied 615 Congressional Web sites from April to August 2006. Only 85 sites — 14 percent — received an "A" compared with nearly 40 percent that received a "D" or "F" ranking.

The results show little improvement from 2003, the last time the foundation handed out similar awards, said Tim Hysom, the group's assistant director for communication and technology services.

"We're a little disappointed in what we found," Hysom said. "We would have hoped that in the meantime we would have seen Congressional Web sites escalate in the way that private industry, and even other government Web sites, have."

The CMF, a nonprofit, nonpartisan group that analyzes ways Congressional offices can be more efficient, has handed out the awards three times — 2002, 2003 and the current study, which looks at Member, committee and leadership Web sites in the 109th Congress. (Thus, many of the recipients have since left office, and freshman Members of the 110th were not included in the study.)

Past Gold Mouse winners fared particularly well this time around, as more than half of this year's best have won an award before.

DOJ_NMG_0136142

The study ranks Web sites in five key areas: audience, content, usability, interactivity and innovation, which the CMF labels as the building blocks in Web site creation. Above all, offices that knew who their constituents are fared the best, Hysom said.

"They've clearly identified their audiences and who is visiting their Web sites," he said.

Researchers had thought geographic statistics would play into the results (some districts are more tech-savvy than others, for example) but that didn't turn out to be the case, Hysom said.

"It didn't matter whether your district was rural or urban, or the education level," Hysom added.

The awards are broken done into three categories: gold, silver and bronze. Gold winners received an "A+" mark, while silver received an "A" and bronze an "A-." Only 18 gold awards were handed out, compared with 27 silver and 40 bronze marks.

There are some interesting statistical findings in the report.

Researchers found a correlation between Web site grades and performance in the 2006 elections. Members who received less than 50 percent of the vote in the election had the highest percent of Web sites with an "F" rating. Oddly, those who received more than 55 percent of the vote had the highest percentage of "D" ratings.

Senate sites earned 8 percent more "A's" and "B's" than House sites. But the Senate also had more "F's" than the House — 18 percent compared with 12 percent. And while Member Web sites in the Senate fared better, House committees had higher marks.

As for the breakdown by party, Republicans fared far better than their Democratic colleagues. GOPers had 136 "A" or "B" rankings, compared with just 95 for Democrats. Republicans also had 6 percent more "C's" and 10 percent fewer "D's" and "F's" than the Democrats. The gap between the parties particularly is pronounced in the Senate, as Republicans earned 10 percent more "A's" and 15 percent more "B's." Republican committee sites also scored better.

But in the House, the proportions were fairly even, and while Republicans earned more awards overall, Democrats earned more gold awards — 11 compared with seven for the GOP.

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) is one of three Members to win a Gold Mouse Award all three times it has been given out, along with Rep. Mike Honda (D-Calif.) and Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.).

Honda — who represents a district in California's tech-savvy Silicon Valley — offers a variety of extensive services for his constituents on his site, according to the report. In addition to regularly updating the site, he provides a number of extras, from podcasts to e-mail updates to a Google search.

"My entire staff contributes to provide constituents timely information on my legislative efforts, constituent services, as well as a list of district nonprofit and government resources," Honda said. "Because my district is so diverse, we provide information in several languages, including a Spanish newsletter. As the constituents of California's 15th Congressional district continue to lead America with their high-tech innovations, I will continue working to reflect that innovative spirit in my work in Congress."

Leahy excels on the Web because he clearly knows his audience, according to the report. He posts a range of targeted information and tries to reach constituents in various ways, from fancy methods such as online chats, podcasts, video and audio clips to maintaining a simple layout, the report reads.

"Al Gore may have been aiming for an Oscar this weekend, but I'll settle for a Gold Mouse," said Leahy, the second Senator to start a Web site and the first to blog.

It is interesting to note that Leahy is the only Senator who received a gold award (out of three) who is still serving in the chamber.

Republican Sens. Bill Frist (Tenn.) retired at the end of the 109th Congress, and Rick Santorum (Pa.) was not re-elected.

"Because of the timing of the release, a number of our winners are no longer serving in their respective chambers," Hysom said.

On the House side, 10 of the 11 gold winners remain in office. Rep. Charlie Norwood (R-Ga.), honored with a gold award for the first time, died two weeks ago following a battle with lung cancer.

Rep. Xavier Becerra (D-Calif.) said the awards are important because "constituents deserve both a personal and virtual connection with their elected representatives."

"I consider my Web site an extension of my office, where constituents have access not only to the information they need, but a direct line to my staff and to me," Becerra said.

DOJ_NMG_0136143

Fellow recipient Rep. Brian Baird (D-Wash.) also said he was honored.

"With more and more people connected to the Internet, I recognized early on that my site needed to provide my constituents with information that would be easy to find, relevant and pertinent," he said.

In coming months, CMF researchers plan to begin a study of Web sites in the 110th Congress. The organization is hopeful that this year's study — along with an influx of possibly more tech-savvy freshmen — will push Congressional offices to up-the-ante on the Web, Hysom said.

Local Success, Federal Failure (USNEWS)

By Elizabeth Weiss Green

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

Since moving from Massachusetts to California, David Gerhard and his wife have made an effort to stay in touch with friends back East. They talk about their homes, their jobs, and another subject: fifth grade. Does your kid have to memorize times tables? Does he have to memorize all the states? What about long division? "We keep a monitor on it," Gerhard says. "Not hard data but to get a feel." Their constant concern: Will their children leave California schools as well educated as their kids' friends in Massachusetts?

The 2002 No Child Left Behind Act was supposed to help families like Gerhard's answer that question with a definitive "Yes." The federal law requires all states to draft standards-minimum expectations for each grade level-and to annually assess how well those standards are being met. But critics of the law argue that all the tests that have followed have not clarified matters at all. Every state administers a different test tied to different standards, and few of the state standards seem to match national ideas about what kids should know.

One size. So why not teach all kids the same things? Or try to make standards uniform? That's what Gerhard and, more important, a growing number of policymakers want to know. With hearings on No Child Left Behind starting in March, two top Senate Democrats have introduced legislation that would require the federal government to define the standards against which all states would be measured. Groups from the conservative Thomas B. Fordham Institute to the National Education Association, a teachers union, support the idea.

"Isn't it crazy that your child is learning different material and being held to a different standard than, say, your sister's children in another state?" asks Mike Petrilli, Fordham's vice president.

An existing test that should set this all straight-the National Assessment of Educational Progress or the so-called nation's report card-only muddles matters more. NAEP, created in 1964 to provide a snapshot of national academic performance, tests just a sample of students on a sample of questions; as a result, it cannot grade individual students or individual schools.

It can, however, cast doubt on other grades, often contradicting states' rosy reports. In 2003, states like Tennessee, Texas, and Mississippi reported that over 80 percent of their fourth graders were "proficient" or better in reading, yet fewer than 30 percent of their students scored proficient on the NAEP reading test. Thirty-two other states posted gaps of more than 30 percentage points. The latest data-presented last week-are just as dismal. One study, based on 2005 high school transcripts, showed impressive gains in state-reported grade-point averages and course loads. Another, based on 12th-grade NAEP scores in the same year, showed depressing stagnancy in actual test performance; less than one quarter of high school seniors scored proficient in math, and only 35 percent scored proficient in reading-down from 40 percent in 1992.

Critics say No Child Left Behind is the source of the problem. To avoid labeling hundreds of schools "failing," they say states have simply lowered the definition of proficient, or the "cut score," to ensure more schools make the grade. Indeed, a 2004 Missouri law mandated lower cut scores, and Arizona has lowered some of its scores, too.

Of course, grades are less important than the content they measure. But critics say the content is also too weak. A 2006 Fordham report grading the quality of the state standards awarded only three states A's; 26 got D's or F's. A major problem highlighted by Fordham: The "experts" drafted to write the standards were not highly educated in their disciplines.

Qualified standards writers can be hard to find-especially for a state on a tight deadline and trim budget. North Dakota had just 10 permanent staffers on standards and testing; on assessments, Montana's education agency had one. "She's the whole department," says Linda McCulloch, the state superintendent.

By contrast, the National Assessment Governing Board, which oversees NAEP, regularly revises standards with the help of dozens of experts. "As a [state] commissioner, you're really pretty much restricted to off-the-shelf tests," says Charles Smith, the former Tennessee education commissioner and now NAGB's executive director. There are not many states ... [that] could attract the kind of experts that we're able to attract." If the federal government were in charge, reformers say, states could design better tests and create more rigorous standards, with no additional funding.

This is not the first time national standards have been proposed. President Bill Clinton tried twice-first to draft standards and later to introduce a voluntary national test-but the ideas failed as opponents warned the test would force schools to teach a liberal national agenda condoning homosexuality and encouraging feminism and as states and municipalities resisted the loss of local control.

The double failure made a deep impression on Michael Cohen, a Clinton adviser. "What is conventionally thought of as national standards-that is, the federal government leads, it picks somebody to write them, and it puts it out there for states to use-I'm increasingly unconvinced that that's the way to get there," he says.

Bottom up. Cohen now believes the states must take the initiative. He is president of Achieve, a nonprofit that helps states improve their standards through a process far more intensive than simply accepting a list from the government. Instead, the states hold summits and solicit outside assistance; the proposed standards are then reviewed by an independent panel. Although each state conducts its own review, they tend to reach similar goals. "The real world is the same wherever you are," Cohen says. "So the states, by virtue of trying to create real-world anchors, are discovering their standards ought to be quite similar to each other."

Letting states write their own plans could produce even better results. Cheri Pierson Yecke, Florida's chancellor of K-12 schools, points to a new reading program that some California schools tested in the 1990s. The resulting lower test scores alarmed policymakers, and the program was scrapped. Because the program wasn't a national one, only some students had to suffer its poor results. "That's the beauty of local control," Yecke explains. "[It] gives us 50 different laboratories, so we'll know what we need to discard and what we need to embrace."

National standards would not necessarily disrupt those laboratories. Neither plan before Congress-one from Sen. Christopher Dodd and the other from Sen. Edward Kennedy-would force the states to adopt the standards the federal government would be required to write. But, if history is any guide, backlashes could result from whatever those standards turn out to be.

Magna Charters (WSJ)

By Nelson Smith

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

As he prepared to announce the Aspen Commission's recent recommendations for revamping the No Child Left Behind Act (NCLB), co-chair Tommy Thompson made a telling remark: "We have been much more successful at identifying struggling schools than we have been in actually turning them around." Regrettably, as with other mainstream groups that have weighed in on the NCLB, the commission's report focuses almost exclusively on fixing ailing schools rather than starting healthy new ones. Both tracks are needed.

The NCLB has laid bare the troubling gaps in student achievement among racial and socioeconomic groups, and it has spurred some improvement, particularly in the early grades. Yet its prescriptions for reform have provoked meager change in schools and systems that produce chronically weak results.

The law lets parents move kids to a higher performing public school -- but in many cities there simply aren't any better choices available. Using federal dollars for "supplemental services" can help -- but tutoring often takes place after students have spent the school day in learning-deprived classrooms.

The act's coup de grâce, after years of failure, is to require "restructuring" a dysfunctional school from scratch, through state takeover, contracting-out, or re-opening as a public charter school. But its impact has been stifled by legislative language allowing "any other" step as well. Districts and states have opted to switch principals, give pep talks and hire "turnaround specialists" instead of coming to terms with intractable failure.

Indeed, according to a recent analysis by SRI International for the U.S. Department of Education, only one of 12 states with Title I schools identified for restructuring as of 2004 had reopened a school as a public charter; one turned over operations to the state; two states replaced school staff and eight took no action.

Ironically, the best illustration of the NCLB's mission may be outside this whole "turnaround" apparatus, in the open sector of public education called charter schooling, where parents, teachers and entrepreneurs are creating new schools that are publicly accountable but independent of bureaucratic rules. Reporter Paul Tough recently wrote about three charter-school networks (Achievement First, the Knowledge Is Power Program (KIPP), and Uncommon Schools) for the New York Times magazine. Students attending these institutions made large learning gains despite years of educational neglect elsewhere.

Rather than cobbling together remediation strategies, these schools create an unyielding culture of high expectations, offer significantly longer learning time than traditional public schools, and organize everything (including personnel decisions) around evidence of student achievement. While these are superstars, dozens of independent studies show that public charter schools around the country are closing achievement gaps at a faster pace than their district counterparts.

Despite low participation rates for "official" NCLB-driven choice (less than 1% of those eligible to transfer, according to federal figures), more than a million families, disproportionately poor and minority, have sought out public charter schools on their own. Charters now educate 26% of all public school kids in Washington, D.C.; 28% in Dayton; and 18% in Detroit (and climbing since that city's recent teacher strike). According to our research, charters now account for more than 13% of public school enrollment in 19 jurisdictions.

By all means, the next No Child Left Behind Act should continue pushing to improve existing schools. But the reauthorized NCLB should also be an engine for creating new, high-quality schools in communities where they're most needed. Here's how:

Quality first. The federal Charter Schools Program, authorized in Title V of the NCLB, provides critically important seed funding for startups. It has been an important source of support, especially for small, community-based charters. Created with bipartisan support when only seven states had charter laws (there are 40 today), the program is due for an overhaul, placing more emphasis on funding the strongest startups and replicating top-quality charters.

Grants should be targeted toward places with high numbers of schools "in need of improvement." And states should be expected to promote and monitor quality like the best venture capitalists -- or lose the right to administer the grant program altogether.

The charter program has been flat-lined for four appropriations cycles; it's time to align funding levels with need. Related programs that support charter facilities should be reauthorized and put on a sound financial footing as well, since charter schools do not qualify for state capital programs and only 11 states offer any kind of compensation for facilities needs.

Bust caps. More money will be pointless unless artificial limits on charter growth are lifted in the 26 states that now have them. In some cases these "caps" directly pre-empt the intent of the NCLB. It's actually illegal to create a new charter school in New York State right now -- meaning that a mother desperate to pull her child out of a failing school in the South Bronx may simply have to wait until Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver has a change of heart about the state's limit of 100 public charter schools.

U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings recently proposed reauthorization language permitting local officials to reopen a failing school as a charter even if it would exceed a state charter cap. The secretary's idea is on-target, but Congress should go her one better, permitting cap-free chartering wherever students lack suitable public schools. And the local school board should not be the only game in town. In states where universities and state boards can approve charter schools, they too should be able to override restrictive caps.

Add teeth. Persistently failing schools need fundamental change, not cosmetic touch-ups. Re-opening as a charter, with a proven academic model, new team and clear accountability for performance, can provide a fresh start. But to work, such "re-opened" charters must have independent governance with full autonomy over budgets, personnel and working conditions. That independence must be spelled out in the federal law, or else we risk creating a raft of so-called "charters" still tethered to the same central offices that let students down in the first place.

DOJ_NMG_0136146

In its first five years, the NCLB has affirmed a national commitment to educational opportunity for all. In the next five years, it should do more to galvanize real change by ratcheting up its support of public charter schools. A vibrant new-schools sector is the best way to challenge the status quo and offer real promise of achievement for every American public-school student.

Welfare State Growing Despite Overhauls (AP)

By Stephen Ohlemacher, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 26, 2007

The welfare state is bigger than ever despite a decade of policies designed to wean poor people from public aid.

The number of families receiving cash benefits from welfare has plummeted since the government imposed time limits on the payments a decade ago. But other programs for the poor, including Medicaid, food stamps and disability benefits, are bursting with new enrollees.

The result, according to an Associated Press analysis: Nearly one in six people rely on some form of public assistance, a larger share than at any time since the government started measuring two decades ago.

Critics of the welfare overhaul say the numbers offer fresh evidence that few former recipients have become self-sufficient, even though millions have moved from welfare to work. They say the vast majority have been forced into low-paying jobs without benefits and few opportunities to advance.

"If the goal of welfare reform was to get people off the welfare rolls, bravo," said Vivyan Adair, a former welfare recipient who is now an assistant professor of women's studies at Hamilton College in upstate New York. "If the goal was to reduce poverty and give people economic and job stability, it was not a success."

Proponents of the changes in welfare say programs that once discouraged work now offer support to people in low-paying jobs. They point to expanded eligibility rules for food stamps and Medicaid, the health insurance program for the poor, that enable people to keep getting benefits even after they start working.

"I don't have any problems with those programs growing, and indeed, they were intended to grow," said Ron Haskins, a former adviser to President Bush on welfare policy.

"We've taken the step of getting way more people into the labor force and they have taken a huge step toward self-sufficiency. What is the other choice?" he asked.

In the early 1990s, critics contended the welfare system encouraged unemployment and promoted single-parent families. Welfare recipients, mostly single mothers, could lose benefits if they earned too much money or if they lived with the father of their children.

Major changes in welfare were enacted in 1996, requiring most recipients to work but allowing them to continue some benefits after they started jobs. The law imposed a five-year limit on cash payments for most people in the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program, or TANF. Some states have shorter time limits.

Nia Foster fits the pattern of dependence on government programs. She stopped getting cash welfare payments in the late 1990s and has moved from one clerical job to another. None provided medical benefits.

The 32-year-old mother of two from Cincinnati said she supports her family with help from food stamps and Medicaid.

Foster said she did not get any job training when she left welfare. She earned her high-school equivalency last year at a community college.

"If you want to get educated or want to succeed, the welfare office don't care," Foster said. "I don't think they really care what you do once the benefits are gone."

Foster now works in a tax office, a seasonal job that will end after April 15. She hopes to enroll at the University of Cincinnati this spring and would like to study accounting. She is waiting to find out if she qualifies for enough financial aid to cover tuition.

"I like data processing, something where it's a bunch of invoices and you have to key them in," Foster said. "I want to be an accountant so bad."

Shannon Stanfield took a different, less-traveled path from welfare, thanks to a generous program that offered her a chance to get a college education.

DOJ_NMG_0136147

Stanfield, 36, was cleaning houses to support her two young children four years ago when she learned about a program for welfare recipients at nearby Hamilton College, a private liberal arts school in Clinton, N.Y.

"At the time I was living in a pretty run-down apartment," said Stanfield, who was getting welfare payments, Medicaid and food stamps. "It wasn't healthy."

The program, called the Access Project, accepts about 25 welfare-eligible parents a year. Hamilton waives tuition for first-year students and the program supplements financial aid in later years. Students get a host of social and career services, including help finding internships and jobs and financial assistance in times of crisis.

About 140 former welfare recipients have completed the program and none still relies on government programs for the poor, said Adair, the Hamilton professor who started the Access Project in 2001.

Stanfield, who still gets Medicaid and food stamps, plans to graduate in May with a bachelor's degree in theater. She wants to be a teacher.

"I slowly built up my confidence through education," Stanfield said. "I can't honestly tell you how much it has changed my life."

Programs such as the Access Project are not cheap, which is one reason they are rare. Tuition and fees run about $35,000 a year at Hamilton, and the program's annual budget is between $250,000 and $500,000, Adair said.

In 2005, about 5.1 million people received monthly welfare payments from TANF and similar state programs, a 60 percent drop from a decade before.

But other government programs grew, offsetting the declines.

About 44 million people — nearly one in six in the country — relied on government services for the poor in 2003, according to the most recent statistics compiled by the Census Bureau. That compares with about 39 million in 1996.

Also, the number of people getting government aid continues to increase, according to more recent enrollment figures from individual programs.

Medicaid rolls alone topped 45 million people in 2005, pushed up in part by rising health care costs and fewer employers offering benefits. Nearly 26 million people a month received food stamps that year.

Cash welfare recipients, by comparison, peaked at 14.2 million people in 1994.

There is much debate over whether those leaving welfare for work should be offered more opportunities for training and education, so they do not have to settle for low-paying jobs that keep them dependent on government programs.

"We said get a job, any job," said Rep. Jim McDermott, chairman of the House subcommittee that oversees welfare issues. "And now we expect them to be making it on these minimum-wage jobs."

McDermott, D-Wash., said stricter work requirements enacted last year, when Congress renewed the welfare overhaul law, will make it even more difficult for welfare recipients to get sufficient training to land good-paying jobs.

But people who support the welfare changes say former recipients often fare better economically if they start working, even in low-paying jobs, before entering education programs.

"What many people on TANF need first is the confidence that they can succeed in the workplace and to develop the habits of work," said Wade Horn, the Bush administration's point man on welfare overhaul.

"Also, many TANF recipients didn't have a lot of success in the classroom," Horn said. "If you want to improve the confidence of a TANF recipient, putting them in the classroom, where they failed in the past, that is not likely to increase their confidence."

Horn noted that employment among poor single mothers is up and child poverty rates are down since the welfare changes in 1996, though the numbers have worsened since the start of the decade.

Horn, however, said he would like to see local welfare agencies provide more education and training to people who have already moved from welfare to work.

"I think more attention has to be paid to helping those families move up the income scale, increasing their independence of other government welfare programs," Horn said.

"The true goal of welfare to work programs should be self-sufficiency."

GOP Is Abandoning Bush? Not Quite (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto
USA Today, February 26, 2007

The Washington punditocracy has proclaimed far and wide that Republicans, disenchanted with the war in Iraq, are abandoning President Bush in droves, leaving him the lamest of lame ducks. However, the latest USA TODAY/Gallup Poll suggests Bush might not be as wounded as he appears — at least not among his party faithful.

The Feb. 9-11 poll puts Bush's job approval at 37%, but among people who identify themselves as Republican or leaning Republican, his approval rating is 76%.

Thus, despite bad news from Baghdad and carefully crafted hand-wringing by high-profile GOP war critics in Congress such as Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, three of four Republicans in the country are hanging in there with the president.

The poll also shows that rank-and-file Republicans have higher regard for the president than they do Republicans in Congress. They gave GOP lawmakers a 63% job-approval rating, 13 points below Bush's. And 72% of Republicans do not think Bush made a mistake sending U.S. troops to Iraq.

So if congressional Republicans figure the key to re-election in 2008 is taking a hard line against Bush on Iraq, they could be dead wrong. They might lure some independents, but they risk alienating their GOP base. To win, you need solid support from your base plus independents, not independents alone.

Conventional wisdom also says the presidential ambitions of Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., could be derailed by his strong support for the war. This poll, however, shows that his stance could be a plus among the base.

What does this high approval among Republicans mean for Bush? It means that as long as his party support remains that strong, he won't fall below 30% approval, a depth that would virtually extinguish his political power. The lowest Bush has fallen is 31%, still enough to make him a significant, although wounded, force in legislative battles with the Democratic-controlled Congress.

The latest congressional skirmish over Iraq underscores the point. In the House's non-binding vote to oppose the president's deployment of more troops to Baghdad, 17 Republicans voted with 229 Democrats to pass the measure. Four GOP representatives didn't vote. Lost was the fact that 180 Republicans stuck with Bush. By that count, Bush gets a 92% loyalty standing among House Republicans who voted. Hardly a GOP exodus.

In the Senate, Democrats fell four votes short of the 60 needed to force a vote on an identical Iraq resolution. Why? Not enough Republicans would go along. Indeed, seven GOP senators broke with the president, and nine didn't vote, yet 33 held firm. Among GOP senators who voted, that's an 83% Republican loyalty rating for Bush.

Though the president may have lost the country on the issues of the day, rumors of his demise among Republicans voters and lawmakers are greatly exaggerated.

Chaplain Shortage Severe For Army (WT)

By Natasha Altamirano
The Washington Times, February 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136149

The hardest part of Army Chaplain Lt. Col. Ran Dolinger's job is the long hours, which is partly why the Army Chaplain Corps now has about 520 vacancies, its most severe shortage in history.

"I go everywhere my troops go," said Col. Dolinger, who during his 21 years of service has been sent to Bosnia and Korea and whose most recent deployment to Iraq was from November to December last year.

The 48-year-old who also serves as pastor at the Fort Belvoir chapel and as spokesman for the U.S. Army's Office of the Chief of Chaplains in Arlington, calls his line of work "a blessed misery."

"When I see the atrocities of man toward man, it shows me the need for God," he said.

The Army Reserve and the Army National Guard have about 440 openings, while the Army has 80 vacancies. Col. Dolinger said it is more difficult to recruit chaplains into the reserves than into active duty.

"A lot of churches don't want their senior [chief executive officer] to be gone," he said. "They say one weekend a month, well, ministers are usually pretty busy then -- that's prime time. You can guarantee if a person comes into the reserves, in time they're going to be deployed."

The Army Chaplain Corps, which includes the Army, the Army Reserve and the Army National Guard, has about 2,600 chaplains and the most vacancies among the branches of the U.S. military, Col. Dolinger said.

The Navy Chaplain Corps, which has about 1,000 active-duty and reserve chaplains and serves the Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard and Merchant Marines, has 29 vacancies, a Navy spokesman said.

Information about the Air Force Chaplain Service was not available.

The Army Chaplain Corps always has assigned fewer positions than what the Department of Defense has authorized, but the current shortage is the most severe, said Chaplain Lt. Col. Ken Lawson of the U.S. Army Chaplain School at Fort Jackson, S.C.

Since the Revolutionary War, the number of chaplains has increased during times of conflict and decreased during times of peace until the numbers stabilized after the Vietnam War, Col. Lawson said.

The Army went from having hundreds of chaplains during the Revolutionary War to one between the war's end and the War of 1812, he said.

The Chief of Chaplains has the authority to transfer a chaplain from a unit stationed at home to one that is being deployed, said Chaplain Lt. Col. Ken Beale, who's in charge of chaplain recruitment for the Army and Army Reserve.

"We're grateful that our Chief of Chaplains is not going to allow our men and women of uniform to be in harm's way without the presence of a chaplain, but that means that our active-duty chaplains and existing reserve chaplains are being rotated 'into theater' more than might be desired," Col. Beale said, using a common term for deployment.

Chaplain candidates must meet the same physical requirements as other troops and must be endorsed by a recognized denomination or faith-based group.

They must be 21 to 42 years old and have a master's or seminary degree. Many seminarians, whether preparing for civilian ministry or the chaplaincy, are second-career students, which limits the pool of potential chaplains.

Despite the three-year shortage, the Army and the Army Reserve has celebrated two consecutive years of record-breaking chaplain recruitment, closing the gap between authorized and assigned positions, Col. Beale said.

The Army and the Army Reserve recruited an all-time high of 231 chaplains in fiscal 2005, and 291 recruits in fiscal 2006, he said.

"To have done that in the midst of the [Iraq] war -- a protracted war with no end in sight -- is rather remarkable," Col. Beale said. "I praise God that the Lord is calling these men and women to this form of ministry."

He credits the recent recruiting successes to post-September 11 patriotism.

To attract chaplains, the Army Reserve is offering $10,000 signing bonuses for first-time officers. The Army National Guard has similar incentives, such as student loan repayment and college scholarships.

The Army doesn't offer sign-up incentives since there isn't much of a shortage of active-duty chaplains.

Chaplain candidate Chris Dolinger, Col. Dolinger's nephew, felt called to the military as he watched news reports when the U.S. first went to war with Iraq in 2003. The 24-year-old was an undergraduate at Bethel College, an evangelical Christian school in Indiana.

DOJ_NMG_0136150

"That's when I first felt like I could really go and make a difference," said Chris Dolinger, who is pursuing a master's degree from Liberty University in Lynchburg, Va. "I see a need in the Army especially for help and guidance and counseling. I'm hoping to offer that as an Army chaplain."

FCC May Try To Scrub Kids' TV (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Federal regulators appear to be turning more attention to a perennial concern: making sure television is safer for kids.

Last week, Spanish-language broadcaster Univision Communications Inc. agreed in principle to pay an unusually steep $24 million fine for violating the Children's Television Act, which requires broadcasters to show three hours of educational programming a week, Federal Communications Commission officials said. In exchange, the FCC will approve Univision's sale to a consortium of private-equity groups for $12.3 billion. Univision declined to comment on the proposed consent decree.

It's the largest fine assessed by the FCC against a company, far exceeding the $9 million fine slapped on Qwest Communications in 2004 for violating FCC rules and the $3.6 million indecency fine proposed against CBS and its affiliates last year for an episode of the crime drama "Without a Trace."

Broadcasters have long considered Republican FCC Chairman Kevin Martin an ally. Since becoming an FCC commissioner in 2001 he's been an advocate for some of their biggest priorities, including a requirement that cable companies carry more local channels once the U.S. shifts to digital-only broadcasts in 2009. The National Association of Broadcasters hope he'll torpedo a proposed merger of terrestrial radio's rivals XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc.

But broadcasters are also increasingly finding themselves on the wrong side of Mr. Martin's FCC. Last year, the networks and affiliates took the unusual step of challenging several proposed indecency fines in federal court. More recently, the FCC has drafted a report suggesting Congress can expand the agency's reach to regulate violence on TV. Now, the FCC's unusually large fine against Univision appears to be part of a larger effort by the agency to make sure broadcasters are offering kid-friendly programming.

The $24-million fine was negotiated by Mr. Martin's staff, not the five-member FCC board. Several senior FCC officials, including at least one FCC commissioner, said they learned of the fine by reading the New York Times on Saturday.

Despite some discomfort about the unusually high amount of the fine, the full FCC board is likely to vote for it. It would be politically difficult for FCC members to vote against enforcing children's programming standards and the company has apparently agreed to pay the fine to clear the way for its sale.

Mr. Martin said the severity of the violation and the long time period in which children watching Univision, the largest Spanish-language broadcaster in the U.S., had no appropriate shows led him to propose the historic fine.

Providence Equity Partners Inc., one of the firms buying Univision, employs Michael Powell, a Republican and Mr. Martin's predecessor as FCC chairman, as a senior adviser. The two had a rocky relationship, prompting speculation it played a role in the stringent fine. "It wasn't a factor at all," Mr. Martin said. He said he didn't know Mr. Powell was involved in the deal.

"Across the board we're trying to protect consumers," said Mr. Martin, who pointed out the Univision fine follows previous efforts to ensure 911 service is available from all phones and newly proposed rules to protect the privacy of cellphone users. "I don't think I'm trying to send any particular message. The commission takes all of its rules seriously," he said.

But the fine also may go a long way toward placating Latino groups who've complained the FCC has ignored violations on Spanish-language stations, and some conservative Christians who've grumbled that Mr. Martin hasn't done enough to clean up the airwaves. "It boggles the mind that Univision would even attempt to present a soap opera as educational programming for children," said Janice Shaw Crouse, a former speechwriter for President George H.W. Bush, referring to company claims that figured in the fine. She currently is a senior fellow for the Concerned Women for America, a think tank devoted to bringing "Biblical principles into all levels of public policy," according to its Web site.

The new politics of Capitol Hill may also play a role. With Democrats controlling Congress, Mr. Martin is expected to begin making regular trips to Capitol Hill to explain his agency's actions. A greater emphasis by the FCC on trying to regulate violent television shows could help Mr. Martin with some leading Democrats, such as West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller, an outspoken critic about the issue. The FCC's crackdown on Univision has already been applauded by Massachusetts Rep. Edward Markey, a Democrat who's often been critical of Mr. Martin. Mr. Markey helped write the federal requirements on children's television broadcasts years ago.

Univision was accused by watchdog groups of violating children's broadcast standards on 24 stations between 2004 and 2006 by claiming that "Complices al Rescate," a soap opera about 11-year-old identical twin girls, was educational. Several groups complained it wasn't.

Children's television advocates expressed shock at the size of the $24 million fine, since several complaints about inappropriate children's shows -- including the Univision soap opera -- had sat without action for upward of two years. The United Church of Christ, representing 1.3 million members and very active on educational broadcasting issues, became so frustrated it sent a letter to the FCC last September to complain. "We hope very much this is a sign that children's television will now be taken seriously by the agency," said Cheryl Leanza, a Church spokeswoman.

According to people familiar with the FCC consent decree, the company will offer a voluntary one-time payment of $24 million, but won't admit wrong-doing. Additionally, Univision will establish an advisory committee and appoint a compliance officer to ensure the network is meeting the FCC's children's programming requirements.

Policy Makers At Fed Rethink Inflation's Roots (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

For decades, a simple rule has governed how the Federal Reserve views the nation's economy: When unemployment falls too low, inflation goes up, and vice versa.

But Fed officials have rethought that notion. They believe it takes a far bigger change in unemployment to affect inflation today than it did 25 years ago. Now, when inflation fluctuates, they are far more likely to blame temporary factors, such as changes in oil prices or rents, than a change in the jobless rate.

One explanation for why inflation is influenced less by changes in unemployment is that the American public has come to expect inflation to remain stable. When inflation moves up or down, it is less likely to get stuck at the new level because companies and workers don't factor the change into their expectations -- or their behavior. Another explanation is that the Fed is better at adjusting interest rates in anticipation of swings in unemployment before those swings can affect inflation.

This new view of the economy, formed in recent years, helps explain why the Fed stopped raising interest rates last summer while core inflation, which excludes food and energy prices, was rising. And it helps explain why the Fed is reluctant to cut rates now even though it sees inflation edging lower over the next two years.

The new view "has profound implications," says former Fed economist Brian Sack, now at Macroeconomic Advisers, a St. Louis-based forecasting firm. That doesn't mean unemployment can be ignored. But it does mean that in the short run, a period of high or low joblessness would be less likely to alter the Fed's view of inflation and trigger an immediate change in interest rates. A shift in public expectations of inflation, however, would carry more weight in the Fed's calculations.

In the late 1950s, economists discovered a tendency for inflation to rise when unemployment was low and to fall when unemployment was high. At lower unemployment rates, they concluded, companies paid more to attract scarce workers and recouped the higher wage costs by raising prices. This relationship was shown on a chart called the Phillips Curve, after Alban William Phillips, one of the first economists to identify it.

In the 1960s, American presidents and Fed officials sought to exploit the Phillips Curve by letting inflation edge higher in exchange for lower unemployment. But in the late 1960s economists Milton Friedman, who died last year, and Edmund Phelps, both of whom would later become Nobel laureates, independently deduced that the reduction in unemployment would be temporary.

Once workers began to expect higher inflation, they would want higher wages. In the long run, the economists argued, unemployment would gravitate to some "natural" level no matter what inflation did.

Although economists concluded there wasn't a long-run tradeoff between inflation and unemployment, they still believed there could be a short-run tradeoff. From 1979 to 2003, Fed Chairman Paul Volcker and his successor, Alan Greenspan, exploited this idea, periodically using interest rates to push unemployment higher to achieve lasting reductions in inflation.

But even as they were doing so, the short-run impact of unemployment on inflation began to diminish. Though the trend has been under way for 25 years, only recently has intensive research by Fed economists and others incorporated it into mainstream thinking. The new thinking on inflation will be the subject of a March 9 conference in Washington that brings together Wall Street Fed watchers, academics and Fed officials.

"Among the feet-on-the-ground Fed inflation forecasters, who do this for a living, there's been a lot of concern for the last 10 years about whether there's...less of a relationship between output and future inflation," says Harvard University economist James Stock. "The accumulation of evidence occurs at a snail's pace. The evidence now is a lot stronger."

Mr. Stock and fellow economist Mark Watson at Princeton University presented evidence to a Fed conference in late 2005 that inflation's long-term trend has varied little since 1984, and that most fluctuations were the result of temporary disturbances, such as a change in energy prices.

Indeed, when core inflation rose last year, the Fed blamed higher rents and oil prices, rather than an overheating economy. It appears to have been right: As energy prices have come down and rent increases moderated, so has core inflation.

Core inflation, now running at a 2.2% rate by the Fed's preferred measure, remains higher than the 2% ceiling most Fed officials are comfortable with. But Janet Yellen, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, noted earlier this year that over the past decade, when inflation has drifted away from the 1.75% to 2% range, it has later reverted to it. For this reason it "may move down from its elevated level faster than many forecasters expect."

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke echoed that sentiment earlier this month, saying the public's expectations will determine whether temporary factors like changes in rents and oil prices "leave a lasting imprint" on inflation: "It is encouraging that inflation expectations appear to have remained contained," he said.

Mr. Phelps says the new thinking on the Phillips Curve doesn't change the implications of his Nobel-winning work. If the Fed never responded to higher inflation, consumers and businesses eventually would begin to expect higher inflation, and "then the game is up."

Fed officials agree. While a given drop in unemployment is less likely to spark inflation, the potential is still there. The Fed's staff estimates it takes up to twice as much additional unemployment to achieve a percentage drop in inflation as it did before 1984. "Imbalances between demand and potential supply [may] be slow to show through convincingly to inflation, but when they do, they may be costly to correct," Fed Vice Chairman Donald Kohn said in late 2005.

That's one reason the Fed, though it expects core inflation to ease this year, isn't relaxing. With unemployment currently 4.6%, at or below the Fed's view of its natural rate, inflation may edge up after the temporary impacts of energy and rent subside. That could require the Fed to raise interest rates enough to push unemployment up sharply and bring inflation down.

U.S. Gasoline Prices Jump Nearly 13 Cents (HC/AP)

Houston Chronicle, February 26, 2007

CAMARILLO, Calif. — Gasoline prices soared nearly 13 cents a gallon on average nationwide in the past two weeks as the price of crude oil rose.

The national average for self-serve regular was $2.35 per gallon, up 12.8 cents since Feb. 9, industry analyst Trilby Lundberg said Sunday.

The average for midgrade was $2.46 per gallon, and premium was $2.56, according to Lundberg's latest survey of 7,000 gas stations across the country.

Oil prices reached a new high for the year Friday. Light, sweet crude for April delivery added 19 cents to settle on the New York Mercantile Exchange at $61.14, its highest closing price since Dec. 22.

DOJ_NMG_0136153

The cheapest gas in the country was found in Salt Lake City, where a gallon of self-serve regular was $2.12. The highest average price in the nation for self-serve regular was in San Francisco at $2.84.

Sporkin's New Post: Working For Himself (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

For the first time in a legal career that spans nearly half a century, Stanley Sporkin is striking out on his own.

In the 1960s and '70s, Sporkin was one of the first enforcement watchdogs at the Securities and Exchange Commission. Next he became the top lawyer at the CIA. President Ronald Reagan several years later named him to a high-profile federal judgeship in the District.

Until his retirement in 2000, Sporkin cultivated a reputation for being an outspoken, results-oriented judge. From the bench he famously threw out an early antitrust settlement that the Justice Department struck with Microsoft and rejected on procedural grounds the Senate's bid to impeach U.S. District Judge Alcee L. Hastings (currently a member of the House of Representatives).

Now, at 75, Sporkin is trying something new.

He's hung out his own shingle as a lawyer and consultant, signing on as a part-time ombudsman for troubled petroleum giant BP and filling out his time by working as an arbitrator and mediator at Gavel Consulting Group. He says his favorite part of the job involves advising companies on how to keep in line with securities laws.

"What I enjoy is being able to consult with people," he said. "We've become such cookie cutters that we've lost common sense."

Sporkin continues to work out of the I Street NW office of Weil, Gotshal & Manges, the law firm where he was a partner before resigning last year because of client conflicts with his BP assignment.

Unlike some fledgling solo practitioners, he's got more than enough work. "The last thing I need to do is advertise," he said.

Governors Seek More Money For Children's Insurance (WP/AP)

By Robert Tanner

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

Governors from both parties appealed yesterday for the Bush administration and Congress to provide more money for a health-care program that insures millions of children.

At stake is coverage for 6 million people, overwhelmingly children, as well as the hopes of many governors in tackling the challenge of uninsured working families.

"We can come to a consensus that children should be the first priority," Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) said.

State leaders met privately to discuss the State Children's Health Insurance Program at the annual winter meeting of the National Governors Association.

"This is one area where I think people stand entirely together," said New Jersey Gov. Jon S. Corzine (D).

Georgia and New Jersey are among 14 states expected to run out of money for the program before the next budget year begins in October, In Georgia, a shortfall could happen as soon as March.

The governors want two things: enough money -- estimated at $745 million -- to keep the program float through October, and changes to President Bush's budget. Analysts say the president's spending plan would shortchange the program even if the number of people served does not grow.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said he met privately with the governors but offered little hope that the administration will accept their demands.

Last night, Bush welcomed the governors to a formal dinner at the White House. "I believe governors add a lot to the work of our nation," he said. "I believe if we work together we can do a lot of good things."

The insurance program, approved in 1997, covers uninsured children whose families earn too much to qualify for Medicaid. More than a dozen states have expanded the program, which also insures about 639,000 adults.

Many governors said administration attempts to curb the program would undermine state efforts to offer universal health-care plans.

DOJ_NMG_0136154

Leavitt said yesterday that there is enough money among states to cover short-term shortfalls in the program, if states with surpluses share with those with deficits -- an idea that has little support among governors. And Bush wants the program to remain focused on poor children, not all children and not adults, Leavitt said.

Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) said that during their private lunch, many governors were "visibly frustrated" by the administration's approach.

Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano (D), who heads the association, said the issue will come up today when governors meet with members of Bush's Cabinet.

Amid the talk about dollars and percentages, the real cost is being ignored, some governors said.

"I think more about what it means to be a parent, a parent who can't go to sleep at night without worrying that 'if my kid gets ill tomorrow or gets in an accident, he won't have adequate coverage,' " Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) said. "I can't imagine more anxiety."

After Sorry 14-year Hiatus, Health-care Debate Revives (USAT)

USA Today, February 26, 2007

Hopes were high 14 years ago when Bill and Hillary Clinton proposed an ambitious plan to provide health insurance for all Americans. Democrats and Republicans alike cheered when the president threatened to veto anything less than universal coverage.

That promising moment didn't last long. After initially winning support from medical, business and labor groups, the Clintons' top-down plan collapsed under the weight of its own complexity. Attacks on "Hillary Care" helped Republicans win control ofCongress in 1994.

Ever since, health-care reform has been considered too costly, in dollars and political capital, for most politicians to touch. But the beleaguered system's problems — one in seven people without insurance, rising premiums and lower reimbursements for those who have insurance, endless payment hassles — haven't gone away. Attempts at fixing them have been incremental and timid at best.

That could be about to change. Several groups that usually are at odds on health care now agree on the need for broad reform. These strange bedfellows are still a long way from agreeing on a plan, but the fact that they now see a common need signals a shift in the political dynamic.

So, too, does the power of the economic forces driving them. It seems everyone, from presidential candidates to hospitals, insurers, think tanks and governors, has a comprehensive health plan.

Among the new alliances:

•America's Health Insurance Plans, a lobbying group for insurers joined last month with Families USA, a liberal advocacy group, on a plan to extend health coverage to all children and the uninsured. Insurance companies, fearful of losing profits, were harsh critics of the Clinton plan.

•The CEO of Wal-Mart and the president of the 1.8 million-member Service Employees International Union have forged an alliance to push for universal coverage. Union president Andy Stern, a supporter of the Clinton plan, now says insurance has grown so costly that unions can no longer demand Cadillac plans.

•Stern and Wal-Mart are also part of a broader alliance called Better Health Care together. It includes leaders of AT&T, Intel, Kelly Services and the Communications Workers of America. They're urging reform and exploring whether tying insurance to employment, which started in the 1940s, still makes sense.

•In Washington, a bipartisan group of legislators has pledged to work with President Bush on achieving universal coverage. "The status quo is unacceptable," Bush said last week, citing 47 million Americans who have no insurance, and escalating health costs that will account for 20% of all spending in the United States by 2015.

The president might have added that the status quo is also unsustainable. It is melting away under pressure from rising global competition and spiraling costs.

General Motors estimates that health care adds $1,500 to the price of a car — a cost foreign rivals don't have to pay because their employees' health care is funded though government. At home, meanwhile, health-care inflation is not just crimping profits; it's eating money that otherwise could go for raises or other employee benefits. Health-care premiums have risen by 87% in just six years.

That's a potent incentive for employers to shed the burden. How will all this ferment play out? It brings to mind the Buffalo Springfield song from four decades ago: "There's something happening here. What it is ain't exactly clear."

What's clearer is the choice that's coming: Change the USA's unique employer-based health-care system or junk it?

A shift from the private sector to government is already well underway. By 2015, according to Medicare projections, more than half the money spent on health care will come from government plans: Medicare, Medicaid, the military or other programs.

But most reform ideas would keep and augment employer-based health care.

Massachusetts, for instance, has embarked on a bold experiment to provide universal coverage by requiring all residents to buy policies, and to provide subsidies to the poor. Employers who don't offer plans are taxed to cover their employees. California is weighing a similar plan, and a dozen other states are trying on innovative projects to expand coverage.

The newly allied private-sector reformers, meanwhile, are being purposely vague. They note that the Clinton plan was so detailed that it gave special interests a fat target to shoot at. They want to build support for change before trotting out specifics that might divide the parties.

That's smart. But a choice eventually will have to be made, and the truth is that for all the suspicion and demonization that's sure to greet any serious plan, both the right and the left have ideas that would be better than the present mess.

The important point is that for the first time since the early 1990s, the stars appear to be aligning for a major effort to reshape health care in America. It's about time.

In Crowded Presidential Race, It All Comes Down To Money (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — A daunting mix of celebrity candidates, rich candidates and early nomination contests is prompting long-shot presidential hopefuls to give up months and even years before the 2008 election.

The latest is former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack. "At the end of the day, it's not about hard work or good ideas, it's about money," Vilsack said Friday. Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh and former Virginia governor Mark Warner, Democrats well into fundraising and other preparations, earlier had decided against running.

"The way the system is erected now, where money begets organization and TV is everything, long shots have no shot barring a cataclysm befalling the front-runners," says Jon Ralston, a Nevada politics expert.

And this year, measured by polls, name recognition and money, each party has three front-runners. "It's tough to be fourth or fifth," says political scientist Dante Scala of Saint Anselm College in Manchester, N.H. "If Hillary falters, Obama's there. If Obama falters, Edwards is there. That's a lot to overcome."

Scala was running through the Democrats' top tier: New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, a former first lady; Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, a charismatic newcomer; and former North Carolina senator John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee.

The GOP has a similar trio: former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani, known for his post-9/11 performance; Arizona Sen. John McCain, who won a national following in his 2000 presidential run; and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, well situated due to personal wealth and corporate connections.

This is an unusual year. In 1988, the crowded Democratic field was known as the Seven Dwarfs. In 1992, Mario Cuomo left the field to several relatively obscure senators and governors — one named Bill Clinton. The GOP race in 2000 was dominated by one front-runner, George W. Bush, and one alternative, McCain.

The top-heavy fields this year have made it harder for lesser-known candidates to capture money and attention just when they need both more than ever. Democrats have squeezed four caucuses and primaries into January 2008 (Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina), one more than usual. And several large, expensive states — California, Florida and New Jersey among them — may move to Feb. 5.

DOJ_NMG_0136156

Former New York governor George Pataki and former Senate majority leader Bill Frist are among Republicans who opted out. George Allen, who had contemplated a run, was not re-elected as Virginia senator. The three Democratic dropouts had no personal setbacks and helped many Democrats win last year. Vilsack impressed some Nevadans at a forum just two days before he withdrew.

Gordon Fischer, a former Iowa Democratic Party chairman and Vilsack backer, says Vilsack could have stayed in the race longer if he were wealthy. "It doesn't speak particularly well about our country's political system," he says. Former president Jimmy Carter says, "You can't dream of getting the nomination" now unless you raise $100 million in advance.

"That's a gross distortion … of propriety in an election process," Carter said Sunday on ABC's This Week.

Before Any Votes, A 'Money Primary' (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, February 26, 2007

It was "money, and only money," that led former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack to drop out of the 2008 presidential race last Friday. What the Democrat meant, of course, was a lack of money. Not hard work or desire.

Politicians often speak of fundraising with disdain, but in fact, the money that donors are willing to shell out to candidates represents an important signal of a candidate's viability. Even if much of the public is not fully engaged in the intense nomination races under way in both parties, wealthy donors are. And they're voting with their checkbooks.

It's all part of what's come to be known as the "invisible primary" – the early jockeying for money, top campaign staff, and high-profile endorsements that winnow the presidential field long before any caucuses or primaries are held. A fourth piece, media buzz, magnifies the effect of the other three.

"Organization, fundraising, and endorsements are all various forms of currency, or various bets on the probability that a candidate will finish first or in the [top three]" in the early nominating contests, says Cal Jillson, a political scientist at Southern Methodist University in Dallas. "No one wants to endorse a candidate they know will have to drop out early or won't be able to raise money or convince a top-drawer management team to take on their campaign."

Mr. Vilsack knew going in that he faced an uphill climb. Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois were likely to run, and a third likely candidate, former vice presidential nominee John Edwards, had already built up a strong organization in Iowa, which will hold the first nominating contest next January. All three ended up declaring, and currently occupy the top three spots in most polls of Democratic primary voters.

For Vilsack, one big trouble sign came in polls of his home state, where he typically polled fourth among Democratic presidential wannabes. Though he was a popular two-term governor, with a centrist approach, he never was able to carve out a national image among his own people, and, lacking the charisma of an Obama or an Edwards, could not attract much attention (or money or media or endorsements) outside Iowa. In the Iowa caucuses, he had to finish well if not first to keep going. But as the hometown candidate, the moment he did well, the import of the Iowa caucuses would have been discounted. So in effect, he was in a no-win situation.

One beneficiary of Vilsack's decision could be Gov. Bill Richardson (D) of New Mexico, the only other candidate with executive experience in the race. Governor Richardson also brings Washington experience – as a former congressman and Energy secretary – as well as foreign policy credentials, as a former UN ambassador and still part-time globetrotter and hostage negotiator, to the table.

But Richardson is another candidate who could face viability problems soon if he does not show some chops in the fundraising department. As the sitting governor of a state far from the key money centers, Los Angeles and New York, it will be hard for him to raise the kind of serious money he needs. Still, he's already well ahead of where Vilsack was when he pulled out. Last week, Richardson raised $2 million in a single fundraiser. Vilsack had raised just $1.1 million in the last seven weeks of 2006, and had spent most of it by the end of the year.

In this presidential cycle, money is more important than ever – especially since some top candidates have signaled they will forgo the public financing system and raise as much as they can on their own. Campaign-finance experts say that, to remain viable, a candidate needs to raise upwards of $20 million by June. Some top-tier candidates, like Clinton, can expect to do far better than that.

The Richardson and Obama candidacies have opened up mini invisible primaries within the larger one, one in the Hispanic community and the other among African-Americans. The challenge for both men is to compete against the Clinton machine, which has strong connections to both communities owing to the presidency of Clinton's husband, Bill Clinton, and his continuing popularity among both groups. (Richardson is Hispanic and Obama is black.)

The campaign of Hillary Clinton, which has worked all along to create an air of inevitability around her candidacy, has reached out to key players in both worlds and locked in talent and donors. For both Richardson and Obama, the ethnic/racial dimension has presented a challenge: Neither says he is running as the "Hispanic candidate" or the "African-American candidate," but those are natural ties that can produce important endorsements and donations.

And even as the overall Democratic field has shrunk, it may not be done growing either. Speculation persists that former Vice President Al Gore may yet jump into the race – one of the few people who could still do that and mount a viable candidacy, given his national fame and fundraising ability.

In a Pew Research Center poll released last Friday, most Democratic voters (77 percent) reported that they have not given the presidential campaign much thought and were not prepared to state which candidate they would support. Among those who were willing to name a candidate, Clinton came in first with 11 percent, Obama got 7 percent, Edwards got 1 percent, Gore got 1 percent, and 4 percent went to others.

Given that the invisible primary is taking place largely unnoticed by most Americans may strike some as undemocratic. In effect, the choices that voters will face early next year in the nominating contests are being shaped right now, before most people are paying attention. But the system has run this way for a long time. It was the influential GOP donors and governors who hand-picked then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush to run for president back in 1999. Ronald Reagan was tapped to run for president in similar fashion.

Still, the early importance of big money in the 2008 presidential cycle is unprecedented. "This may well be a very important year in that process, in the sense of more and more money being required to run," says Mr. Jillson.

GOP Early Front-runner More Often Gets Job (AP)

By Will Lester

AP, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON – Hillary Rodham Clinton is the clear favorite in early polls for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination. So, what does that mean? Not a lot, if history is any guide.

Republican hopeful Rudy Giuliani, however, is sitting pretty.

For at least three decades, Republicans have been far better than Democrats in early polls at getting behind the candidates who end up winning the party's presidential nomination.

Note that Edmund Muskie in 1972, George Wallace in 1976, Ted Kennedy in 1980, Gary Hart in 1988, Mario Cuomo in 1992 and Joe Lieberman in 2004 were early front-runners among Democrats. None won the nomination.

Looking back

Gallup polling over the past three decades shows Republican front-runners usually win their party's nomination, but Democrats do not. Some elections:

1972-Democrats

February 1971: Edmund Muskie, 26 percent; Edward Kennedy, 25; Hubert Humphrey, 21; John Lindsay and George McGovern, each at 5.

McGovern won the nomination and lost the general election to President Nixon.

1976-Democrats

February 1975: George Wallace, 22 percent; Humphrey, 16; Henry Jackson, 13; McGovern, 10; Muskie, 9. Jimmy Carter was at 1 percent with 10 candidates in front of him. Carter won the general election, defeating President Ford.

1976-Republicans

DOJ_NMG_0136158

March 1975: Gerald Ford 34, Ronald Reagan 22, Barry Goldwater 17.

1980-Democrats

February 1979: Kennedy, 60 percent; Carter, 28.

Carter lost the general election to Reagan.

1980-Republicans

February 1979: Reagan, 31 percent; Ford, 26; John Connally, 12.

1984-Democrats

April 1983: Walter Mondale, 29 percent; John Glenn, 23; Gary Hart, 4.

Mondale won the nomination and lost the general election to Reagan.

1988-Democrats

January 1987: Hart, 30 percent; Lee Iacocca, 14; Jesse Jackson, 13. Michael Dukakis was at 1 percent with seven people in front of him.

Dukakis won the nomination and lost the general election to Vice President George H.W. Bush.

1988-Republicans

January 1987: Bush, 33 percent; Bob Dole 16, Howard Baker and Pat Robertson, each at 6.

1992-Democrats

February 1991: Mario Cuomo, 18 percent; Jackson, 12; McGovern, 9; Richard Gephardt, 8. Bill Clinton was at 2 percent with 10 people in front of him.

Clinton won the nomination and beat Bush in the general election.

1996-Republicans

February 1995: Dole, 38 percent; Dan Quayle, 17; Newt Gingrich and Phil Gramm, each at 7.

Dole won the nomination and lost to Clinton in the general election.

2000-Democrats

January 1999: Al Gore, 47 percent; Gephardt, 13; Bill Bradley, 12; Jackson, 11.

2000-Republicans

January 1999: George W. Bush, 42; Elizabeth Dole, 22; John McCain; 8; Quayle, 6.

Bush beat Gore in the general election.

2004-Democrats

January 2003: Joe Lieberman, 17 percent; John Kerry, 16; John Edwards and Gephardt, each at 13.

Kerry won the nomination and lost to Bush in the general election.

2008-Democrats

Mid-February 2007: Hillary Rodham Clinton, 41 percent; Barack Obama, 21; Gore, 14; Edwards, 13. Other candidates' support was less than 5 percent.

2008-Republicans

Mid-February 2007: Rudy Giuliani, 40 percent; McCain, 24; Gingrich, 9; Mitt Romney, 5. Other candidates' support was less than 5 percent.

Republicans have picked the early front-runner in seven of the past 10 elections, according to Gallup polling. In the other three elections, Republican incumbents cruised to re-election.

Democrats nominated a former vice president, Walter Mondale, in 1984, and a sitting vice president, Al Gore, in 2000. For those elections, the early polls were more predictable at picking the front-runner.

Why has the GOP been better at predicting winners?

"There is this sense among Republicans - a belief that it's a certain person's time to run for president," said Thomas Mann, a political analyst at the Brookings Institution. The GOP track record is probably due more to chance and the Republicans' success at winning the White House since 1968, he said.

In 2008, neither party has a former vice president or president competing for the nomination for the first time in almost 80 years.

DOJ_NMG_0136159

Giuliani, a former New York City mayor, is a favorite in early polls. Many people feel his personal history and moderate positions on social issues may cost him support among some conservatives.

Arizona Sen. John McCain is running even or second to Giuliani, with former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney running a distant third.

Among Democrats, New York Sen. Clinton looks strong at this point, with Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards giving her the stiffest competition.

Despite their occasional difficulties in picking eventual winners, early polls can provide important clues about the campaign.

Among the more interesting findings from recent national polls:

Democrats are more likely than Republicans to be paying close attention to the presidential race, by 31 percent to 20 percent, according to a poll taken in February by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press.

Romney may find his Mormon faith an obstacle with many voters. One-quarter of people questioned say they would not vote for a Mormon candidate, compared with 8 percent who say they would not vote for a woman and 3 percent for a black candidate, according to a Newsweek poll in December.

Clinton is viewed unfavorably by at least 40 percent of people, many of them Republicans who will be difficult for her to win over, various polls have found.

Four in 10 Democratic voters say they have not heard enough about Obama to have an opinion yet. Only 3 percent say that about Clinton, according to a CBS News poll in mid-January.

Most Republicans and those who lean Republican are unaware of Giuliani's support for civil unions for same-sex couples and abortion rights, according to a Gallup poll in mid-January.

Public support for Clinton and McCain is probably based on a fairly firm base of knowledge about them, said public opinion analyst Charles Franklin. Knowledge of Giuliani is probably based mostly on his response as New York's mayor to the Sept. 11 attacks.

The old complaint about early polls as measures of name recognition is probably less true today because of the intensity of coverage by 24-hour cable news, GOP pollster David Winston said.

Most poll analysts agree the polls six months from now will be far more meaningful.

"For the most part, the political polls don't mean much now," said Scott Keeter, of the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press. "But political junkies have an endless appetite for them. People are looking for some kind of evidence of how things are going to turn out."

Substance Over Image (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

Six years ago a man unsuited both by intellect and by temperament for high office somehow ended up running the country.

How did that happen? First, he got the Republican nomination by locking up the big money early.

Then, he got within chad-and-butterfly range of the White House because the public, enthusiastically encouraged by many in the news media, treated the presidential election like a high school popularity contest. The successful candidate received kid-gloves treatment — and a free pass on the fuzzy math of his policy proposals — because he seemed like a fun guy to hang out with, while the unsuccessful candidate was subjected to sniggering mockery over his clothing and his mannerisms.

Today, with thousands of Americans and tens of thousands of Iraqis dead thanks to presidential folly, with Al Qaeda resurgent and Afghanistan on the brink, you'd think we would have learned a lesson. But the early signs aren't encouraging.

"Presidential elections are high school writ large, of course," declared Newsweek's Howard Fineman last month. Oh, my goodness. But in fairness to Mr. Fineman, he was talking about the almost content-free rivalry between Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama — a rivalry that, at this point, is mainly a struggle over who's the bigger celebrity and gets to lock up the big donors.

Enough already. Let's make this election about the issues. Let's demand that presidential candidates explain what they propose doing about the real problems facing the nation, and judge them by how they respond.

I know the counterargument: you can't tell in advance what challenges a president may face, so you should vote for the person, not the policy details. But how do you judge the person? Public images can be deeply misleading: remember when Dick Cheney had gravitas? The best way to judge politicians is by how they respond to hard policy questions.

So here are some questions for the Democratic hopefuls. (I'll talk about the Republicans another time.)

First, what do they propose doing about the health care crisis? All the leading Democratic candidates say they're for universal care, but only John Edwards has come out with a specific proposal. The others have offered only vague generalities — wonderfully uplifting generalities, in Mr. Obama's case — with no real substance.

Second, what do they propose doing about the budget deficit? There's a serious debate within the Democratic Party between deficit hawks, who point out how well the economy did in the Clinton years, and those who, having watched Republicans squander Bill Clinton's hard-won surplus on tax cuts for the wealthy and a feckless war, would give other things — such as universal health care — higher priority than deficit reduction.

Mr. Edwards has come down on the anti-hawk side. But which side are Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama on? I have no idea.

Third, what will candidates do about taxes? Many of the Bush tax cuts are scheduled to expire at the end of 2010. Should they be extended, in whole or in part? And what do candidates propose doing about the alternative minimum tax, which will hit tens of millions of middle-class Americans unless something is done?

Fourth, how do the candidates propose getting America's position in the world out of the hole the Bush administration has dug? All the Democrats seem to be more or less in favor of withdrawing from Iraq. But what do they think we should do about Al Qaeda's sanctuary in Pakistan? And what will they do if the lame-duck administration starts bombing Iran?

The point of these questions isn't to pose an ideological litmus test. The point is, instead, to gauge candidates' judgment, seriousness and courage. How they answer is as important as what they answer.

I should also say that although today's column focuses on the Democrats, Republican candidates shouldn't be let off the hook. In particular, someone needs to make Rudy Giuliani, who seems to have become the Republican front-runner, stop running exclusively on what he did on 9/11.

Over the last six years we've witnessed the damage done by a president nominated because he had the big bucks behind him, and elected (sort of) because he came across well on camera. We need to pick the next president on the basis of substance, not image.

Surveying '08 Field, Governors Urge Moderation (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25 — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton is the front-runner and will probably win the Democratic presidential nomination. Rudolph W. Giuliani could do well in Mississippi. And the length of the presidential campaign is insane.

Those were the views expressed Sunday by some of the foremost experts on American politics: governors gathered here for the winter meeting of the National Governors Association.

A few governors have endorsed presidential candidates, but many said they were reserving judgment.

Democratic governors pleaded with their presidential candidates to ignore the fringes of the party and focus instead on the "middle 20 percent" of the electorate with a pragmatic, problem-solving agenda.

"Democrats certainly could not win in Tennessee with just a hard-nosed Nancy Pelosi-style Democratic agenda," said Gov. Phil Bredesen of Tennessee. Mr. Bredesen, a Democrat re-elected in a landslide last year, was referring to the House speaker.

Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, toasted the political prowess of Mrs. Clinton.

"Republicans would make a bad mistake to underestimate Hillary Clinton," Mr. Barbour said. "She will be a formidable opponent if she is the Democratic nominee. And I think she probably will be. The Democrats have a true front-runner this time, and she is quite likely to win the nomination."

Mrs. Clinton would probably not carry Mississippi in a general election, Mr. Barbour said, but "John Kerry got 40 percent of the vote there in 2004, and Senator Clinton would be a stronger candidate than he was."

DOJ_NMG_0136161

By contrast, Mr. Barbour said, on the Republican side, "we don't have a front-runner." Indeed, he said, the campaign for the Republican presidential nomination is "the most open race since I got involved in politics in 1968." As a result, he said, "an unusually large number of governors are keeping their powder dry."

Could a New Yorker like Mr. Giuliani excite voters in Mississippi?

"It depends on who his opponent is," Governor Barbour said. "Life is a series of choices. If he is running against Hillary Clinton, I believe he will carry Mississippi."

Gov. M. Jodi Rell of Connecticut, a Republican, said that she, like many voters, had not yet focused on the presidential race. Even as candidates woo the conservative base of the Republican Party, Mrs. Rell said she hoped the nominee would be "a moderate — not particularly far right or far left."

Gov. Edward G. Rendell of Pennsylvania, a Democrat, said "it's way too soon to tell" who will win his party's presidential nomination.

Mr. Rendell has a big appetite for politics. He was general chairman of the Democratic National Committee in the 2000 election. But he is disgusted with the early start to the 2008 race.

"I think it's insane," Mr. Rendell said in an interview. "The media has created a two-year presidential election cycle that's very destructive to American politics. And the political system is complicit. We front-load our primaries so much that four or five states decide who the nominees are going to be. It's over by February. And then we have a God-awful yearlong presidential campaign, general election campaign, which is too long and lends itself to all these negative attacks."

"If we were to design a system for electing a president, I don't think we could do worse," Mr. Rendell said. "It's terrible."

Mr. Rendell is hoping the Republicans choose Senator Sam Brownback, the conservative of Kansas, as their presidential nominee. "Give us Senator Brownback, and we'll be all right," Mr. Rendell said. "It doesn't matter who we nominate."

Gov. John Baldacci of Maine, a Democrat, said Mrs. Clinton, Senator Barack Obama and John Edwards were all potentially strong candidates. But Mr. Baldacci said: "I have not spoken to any of them. None of them have called me. None of them have reached out to me."

At the winter meeting of the National Governors Association eight years ago, Republican governors rallied around George W. Bush and virtually crowned him as their party's presidential nominee. But no such groundswell has occurred this year.

One governor who has embraced a candidate is Tim Pawlenty of Minnesota, a co-chairman of Senator John McCain's presidential exploratory committee. "Senator McCain is a once-in-a-generation leader, one of the strongest, most courageous and fearless public servants I have ever met," Mr. Pawlenty said.

Gov. Bill Ritter Jr. of Colorado, a Democrat, said the party's presidential candidates should study his election and the success of other moderate Democrats like Gov. Kathleen Sebelius of Kansas.

"We have learned a way of speaking to the middle with a pragmatic, problem-solving agenda," Mr. Ritter said. "We have something to teach the rest of the country."

Ms. Sebelius said, "We have figured out a way to convince voters in our states to cross party lines."

Govs. Perry, Rendell: No VP Interest (WP/AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Governor or vice president?

That's an easy choice, say two state leaders who have been talked about for a possible spot on the 2008 ticket.

"I got the best job in the world. Ask President Bush," GOP Gov. Rick Perry of Texas said Sunday, dismissing speculation he might be interested in serving as a running mate to the eventual nominee.

Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell, a Democrat, also denied any interest in the No. 2 spot. "I like to be my own boss," Rendell said.

The two were in the capital for a National Governors Association meeting.

Texas is among several states considering moving its primary election up to have more of an influential role in the nominating process. Perry said that idea is gaining momentum back home.

DOJ_NMG_0136162

"It's an interesting concept, and I certainly want to see the legislation, but it's something that I think the Legislature is full well behind," Perry said.

In 2004, Texas primary voters found themselves casting only symbolic votes in early March. Legislation would move the primary to February 2008. Several other big states, including California and Florida, also are considering a similar shift.

Rendell said the current presidential nominating system makes little sense because it does not give large, populous states enough influence.

"Pennsylvania, which is one of the two or three most important states in the general election, we have no input at all into who the nominee is. Our primary is in late April. It's a mess," he said.

The governors appeared on "Fox News Sunday."

Is Hillary Afraid Of Being Embarrassed By Bill? (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

Last December, a NEWSWEEK reporter tentatively broached a delicate subject with a longstanding adviser to Hillary Clinton: was there a concern in the Hillary camp that her husband might somehow embarrass her in the campaign ahead? The reaction was swift and fierce. "If that's what you want to talk about, I'm hanging up right now," said the adviser, who did not wish to be identified even entertaining such a question.

But it is the elephant in the room. Senator Clinton's presidential campaign can ill afford another scandal swirling around her husband, whose second term in the White House was badly disrupted by the Monica Lewinsky affair. Perhaps the Clintonites are understandably worried that the Republican right will try to create a scandal where there is none or dredge up old history. They doubtless anticipate an assault from Clinton's old foes, but they may have been caught unawares by the attack from one of Bill's old friends. In an interview with New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd, Hollywood mogul David Geffen tore into the Clintons' integrity and Hillary's electability. "Everybody in politics lies," said Geffen, "but [the Clintons] do it with such ease, it's troubling." Geffen raised the most eyebrows when he referred to the former president as "a reckless guy" who "gave his enemies a lot of ammunition to hurt him and distract the country." Geffen was not just speaking in the past tense. "I don't think anybody believes that in the last six years, all of a sudden Bill Clinton has become a different person," Geffen told Dowd.

The reaction to Geffen's remarks from the Clinton campaign was immediate and outraged. The night before Dowd's column appeared, Geffen had co-hosted a fund-raiser for Sen. Barack Obama, a Clinton rival for the Democratic nomination. At 9:46 a.m., the Clinton campaign issued a statement calling on Obama to cut his ties to Geffen and give back the $1.3 million raised by Geffen's star-studded party. (Jennifer Aniston, Morgan Freeman and Ben Stiller were all there. George Clooney, off shooting a movie, contributed the maximum when Obama first announced and tells NEWSWEEK that Obama is "as good as Bobby [Kennedy] late in his career and Jack from early on.") The press release described Geffen as Obama's "finance chair" and accused him of "viciously and personally attacking Senator Clinton and her husband."

Geffen is not Obama's finance chair; the two are not even close friends. The shot at Obama may have been meant as a kind of welcome-to-the-NFL forearm shiver, intended to rattle the upstart candidate the Chicago press mockingly calls "Obambi." (Obama's aides hit back hard, saying that the Clintons had no problem with Geffen when they were raising $18 million from him. But Obama himself played it cool: "It's not clear to me why I'd be apologizing for someone else's remark," he said while campaigning in Iowa. In any case, he was not giving back the money.)

The Clinton camp has always believed in rapid response—in returning fire before a news cycle can pass. Last week, the Clintonites were serving notice—not for the first time—that anyone who brings up Bill and Hillary's past marital problems will be branded a character assassin. "It's the 'Godfather' theory of politics," says a Democratic strategist who asked not to be identified discussing the Clinton campaign's tactics. "If people stray, you send them a message. That's how you keep them in line."

Democratic activist Arianna Huffington, who attended the Obama event but says she is uncommitted, tells NEWSWEEK, "I think [Geffen's remarks] definitely benefited Obama because it brings into the open conversations many people have been having about the Clintons." Clinton's allies suggested that Geffen was motivated by bile. Once a close F.O.B. (Friend of Bill), he had stayed in the Lincoln Bedroom (twice). But when he asked for a presidential pardon for imprisoned American Indian activist Leonard Peltier, Clinton turned him down.

Dowd tells NEWSWEEK that Geffen did not seem out to get the Clintons. She says she asked for the interview because she had recalled hearing Geffen doubt Senator Clinton's presidential prospects during an audience Q&A at the 92nd Street Y in New York City in February 2005. "She can't win, and she's an incredibly polarizing figure," he had said of Hillary at the time. Dowd says Geffen was initially reluctant to be interviewed for her column. During their hourlong interview at his Beverly Hills mansion, his tone was "reflective," she says. (When Dowd asked him about the Peltier pardon, he said he never really expected one, though he was angry when fugitive financier Marc Rich was pardoned by Clinton.)

Dowd says she was the one who brought up questions about Bill Clinton's past as a campaign issue. Geffen acknowledged that some big donors and celebrity Clinton supporters were fretting, as Dowd put it, "that Bill will 'pull the focus' and shelve his wife's campaign." In the column, Dowd paraphrased Geffen as saying that "if Republicans are digging up dirt, they'll wait until Hillary's the nominee to use it."

Geffen may be right about the GOP dirt diggers. Republican conservative activist Grover Norquist, who loathes the Clintons, coyly tells NEWSWEEK, "Hillary is my first choice to be the Democrat nominee." A New York Times story last week suggested that the so-called vast right-wing conspiracy has gone soft. The article quoted Chris Ruddy, a mouthpiece for the conservative conspiracy theorist Richard Mellon Scaife, as saying that the Clinton administration "wasn't so bad." But the right-wingers may just be lying low. David Bossie, the former congressional investigator familiar to journalists for helping them track down Clinton sex scandals, is working with Clinton strategist turned apostate Dick Morris on an anti-Hillary documentary. R. Emmett Tyrrell Jr., the editor of The American Spectator, which first printed salacious details from Arkansas state troopers about Clinton's sex life, is publishing a book titled "The Clinton Crack-up: The Boy President's Life After the White House."

The mainstream press has largely steered clear of stories about the Clintons' marriage. A widely noted article last May in The New York Times reported that the Clintons are often apart. "Nights out find him zipping around Los Angeles with his bachelor buddy, Ronald W. Burkle, or hitting parties and fund-raisers in Manhattan; she is yoked to work in Washington or New York ... " No longer Geffen's pal (or recipient of his largesse), Bill Clinton has been spending more time with Burkle, a supermarket tycoon who is giving a big fund-raiser for Hillary Clinton in March. The buzz in Hollywood is that Geffen is jealous of Burkle. But Geffen denies it, and denies any animus against the Clintons. "I think Bill Clinton is a great guy," he tells NEWSWEEK. "I support them both. I just don't think she can be elected president."

The Democrats' Gamble (USNEWS)

By Jim Lo Scalzo

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

The state of Nevada displayed its newfound political muscle last week, with the appearance of eight Democratic presidential hopefuls (Sen. Barack Obama was the sole exception) at a forum in Carson City. With Nevada's caucus scheduled-for now, anyway-just after the Iowa caucus and just ahead of the New Hampshire primary, this quirky state seems poised to be a crucial Democratic battlefield for the '08 elections.

Seeking a much-needed foothold in the West, the Democratic National Committee, with a little lobbying from Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, reshuffled the calendar in Nevada's favor. Citing the state's ethnic diversity (nearly a quarter of Nevada's residents are Hispanic), concentration of organized labor (about 14 percent of the workforce), and economic growth (consistently one of the nation's strongest performers), Democratic leaders believe the state offers an alternative to Iowa and New Hampshire's mostly white, rural populations.

Yet the move has infuriated New Hampshire's secretary of state, William Gardner, who considers his state's voting position sacrosanct and who is now threatening to reschedule his state's primary before the first of the year, if necessary. Not to be left behind, almost a dozen other states are angling to move up as well.

Aside from Nevada's potential political value, it's an unusual locale to say the least, featuring legal gambling and prostitution, a booming big city and desolate hinterlands. Nevada is a state of surrogate realities. In Las Vegas, for example, where the gaming industry can take credit for employing much of the growing Hispanic population, these new Nevadans work largely unseen, obscured by facades of New York and Paris and Venice. Beyond Las Vegas's all-night glow, in the dusty nether reaches that are the rest of the state, the populace is little more apparent.

If it's possible for a landscape to say something about its people, then Nevada says hardscrabble. And hardly visible. Some towns exist barely above desertion, a mere collection of parked cars and corrugated metal. Others really are ghost towns-abandoned relics of long-ago gold mines. Dominating the Nevada landscape are not humans but highways, the loneliest in the lower 48, draped like filaments across great swaths of sand and rock. Just when that nothingness seems absolute, there appears a trace of habitation: a makeshift grave, a bullet-riddled car, or, near the ghost town of Rhyolite, a life-size plaster sculpture of the Last Supper.

In this peculiar place, the Democratic candidates are already converging, as are the press, the political consultants, the policy wonks. And they'll be around awhile. More presidential debates are scheduled: Reno in August, Las Vegas in November. Should the DNC's gamble prove sagacious, the people of Nevada will help deliver the party a sustainable nominee and perhaps even turn their state from red to blue. Should it prove ill-conceived, the DNC won't be the first bettor to watch his hopes evaporate in Nevada's dry desert wind.

Hidden Power On The Hill (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

By about 1:30 p.m. one recent day, Rep. Jim Clyburn was hunched in the back seat of an SUV parked outside the Capitol and talking on a BlackBerry about the impact of the president's budget on rural districts. He had already done a radio interview about Iraq and the 2008 presidential race, led a meeting with 100 or so Democratic members or their staff, spoken against the president's Iraq plan, given a press conference on Hurricane Katrina, and delivered a speech to the National Association of Manufacturers. He took a quick break in his office for salted cashews and diet soda. It's been busy "every day since being in the majority," he said. And then it was off to a PBS interview.

A headline grabber? Not exactly. Busy? Absolutely. Clyburn is at the center of the Democrats' most pressing concerns on Capitol Hill. As the majority whip, the No. 3 Democratic position in the House of Representatives, he's in charge of keeping the party together on votes and reaching out to the Democrats' famously broad set of interest groups. And for presidential candidates, his endorsement could swing the South Carolina primary. For the next year or two, Jim Clyburn is going to be a very popular-and powerful-man.

Lessons. A 15-year veteran of the House and the highest-ranking African-American in Congress (the first black congressman from his state since 1897), Clyburn, 66, talks in the deep baritone of a minister's son. He traces his political success to lessons learned in a fundamentalist home in Sumter, S.C. His father went to divinity school but made only $10 a week from the Church of God and instead supported his family as a contractor; his mother graduated from college when he was 13 and then just hung the diploma in her beauty shop.

He was always interested in politics. In a speech prior to his election as whip, Clyburn recalled how at age 12 he mentioned his plans-to go to college and work in Washington, D.C.-in his mother's store. One client told him not to bother, since he was black. His mother thought otherwise. "You just hold fast," she said. And he did. As a student at South Carolina State College in 1960, he organized the state's first sit-in at an Orangeburg drugstore with six friends; later, he would join a civil rights group led by future Rep. John Lewis, now Clyburn's right-hand man. Clyburn was a community organizer, a teacher, an employment counselor, and a failed candidate for state representative before beginning a 20-year career in state government, most prominently as human affairs commissioner. Much of the work boiled down to managing competing interests and racial groups. "That's my long suit," he says. "I've been managing people since I was 24 years old."

Clyburn believes his current job is best handled without constantly putting his face before the cameras, though he'll sit for interviews when asked. Yes, he admits, he's been on MSNBC's Hardball With Chris Matthews, but he prefers "playing hardball with baseballs." And when he latches onto an issue, he'll make his voice heard. Right now, his passions are turning the rural areas around South Carolina's Interstate 95 corridor into a center for biofuels and improving the state's health and education programs. He's also focused on smoothing assistance for Katrina victims, and he strongly supports sending earmark dollars-federal money for specific projects-back to the district.

Since winning election in 1992 in a district designed to have a black majority-it was the only district in the state President Bush did not carry in 2000 or 2004-Clyburn has shot up the Democratic ranks. He was unanimously elected chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus and took charge of the party's faith working group in the House. He was also elected chairman of the Democratic caucus. Just before Election Day in November, Clyburn began campaigning for the whip post. "I don't know if I saw myself as successful or not," he demurs, "but I darn sure was pursuing it." North Carolina Rep. G.K. Butterfield, a frequent dinner companion, decamped to South Carolina for days to telephone members and try to win their support for Clyburn, starting a month before the Democrats had even won the House. Clyburn was somewhat reluctant at first, Butterfield says. "He thought it'd be in poor taste before the election." In the end, though, it all worked out.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer are the public faces of the House Democrats, but it's Clyburn who handles the nuts and bolts of holding the party together on votes. So far that hasn't been too difficult, considering that the Democrats' 100-hours legislative push was an assortment of popular, poll-tested issues.

Challenges. But now, as Congress takes up legislation on climate change, immigration, healthcare, and the budget, things could get tougher. "We can't afford to lose 15 members"-Democrats have that many more than the obligatory 218 votes for a majority-"on any one vote," he says. But some believe if anyone can hold Democrats together, it's Clyburn. Butterfield, for one, praises Clyburn's style of chatting one on one with colleagues rather than holding large events. Clyburn, who has a moderate-to-liberal voting record, also regularly tries to reach out to business interests and more conservative Democrats. (He's writing a book tentatively titled I Too Am a Southerner in part about working as a black with white politicians.) He's planning on running his whip operation differently from those in the past: He wants to have members on the same page before a bill actually comes up for a vote instead of trying to then get them onboard when a vote is imminent. Clyburn has seven major coalitions to manage, from the liberal black caucus to the moderate Blue Dogs. "I think a lot of my job will be to get our members to understand that we can't bite off more than we can chew," he says.

Clyburn will also be at the heart of the Democratic presidential fight. His endorsement carries a lot of weight in South Carolina. "Clyburn does not have a machine," says Jack Bass, professor at the College of Charleston, but he does have the "Jim Clyburn Network"-a group of civic and religious organizations with regional influence. Yet his endorsement hasn't been a silver bullet. In 2004, he initially backed former Rep. Dick Gephardt, who dropped out before the South Carolina primary, and then backed Sen. John Kerry, who was soundly beaten there by Sen. John Edwards.

Still, Clyburn's receiving a constant flow of presidential suitors. He says he is staying out of the endorsement sweepstakes-"at least at this point, anyway"-but admits that "I'm crazy about Bill Richardson," the New Mexico governor. "I have a closer personal relationship with [him] than any other of the candidates." Still, he won't commit. "I'm not going to tell you. I'm not going to tell my wife." Jim Clyburn is still, after all, managing people.

The Dems Get Religion (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

John Kerry struggled to overcome his secular image in 2004, but the current crop of Democratic presidential front-runners is determined not to repeat his mistakes.

DOJ_NMG_0136166

One of New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's first campaign hires was a top evangelical staffer on Capitol Hill. U.S. News has learned that an aide in Illinois Sen. Barack Obama's office tasked with religious outreach is joining his presidential campaign this week. And former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards is framing poverty relief as a moral issue that's helping to drive his campaign. "Two thousand eight could be the first time since Jimmy Carter that the presidential candidate who's really good on faith issues is the Democrat," says Eric Sapp, a Democratic consultant. So the Democratic primaries could see serious competition among candidates for the faith vote.

Clinton, a scourge of the religious right, was raised in a conservative Methodist home. "Over the years, Senator Clinton has expressed her faith often in speeches and books, and I've always been impressed with its authenticity," says Burns Strider, the Capitol Hill staffer who became Clinton's new faith outreach director. But Clinton is sure to encounter skeptics. When she donned a crucifix while campaigning for re-election last year, some pundits called it a ploy to moderate her image. "I got deluged with calls from New York reporters who had this view of her as a nonreligious person," says John Green at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life. "But ... she's a very serious social-justice Methodist."

Faith. Strider says the campaign will focus on liberal "social justice" Democrats but on socially conservative Democrats, too. Clinton raised eyebrows in 2005 by calling for fewer abortions before an audience of family planning providers. "For a long time, Democrats forfeited part of the electorate by choosing not to have a conversation about faith," says Strider.

Obama attracted attention last year when he addressed evangelicals on fighting AIDS at Purpose Driven Life author Rick Warren's Saddleback Church in Southern California. This week, Obama's Senate religious outreach coordinator, Josh DuBois-active in the conservative Assemblies of God church-will join the campaign. Obama often discusses his relationship with his Chicago pastor and his work with black churches as a community organizer. "I ... worked closely with my fellow members of the religious community long before this campaign began," Obama says. Obama aides say religious leaders will play a role in policy, as they did when Obama cosponsored legislation last year to protect charitable donations from bankruptcy proceedings.

Edwards has not hired religious outreach staff but has built bridges to the progressive faith community through projects like promoting state amendments to raise the minimum wage. His campaign launched One Corps, a volunteer program that combines political organizing with service projects like building houses for the poor; aides describe it as translating faith to action. "He practices his religion personally in a more profound way than any political leader I've associated with," says Edwards's campaign manager, David Bonior.

But Edwards upset religious Democrats in February by declining to fire two Internet bloggers who were attacked by a Roman Catholic group for making offensive comments toward Catholics before joining the campaign. The bloggers left the campaign anyway. "We should have had a better vetting process," says Bonior. It's the kind of mistake that Democrats are trying to avoid this time around.

The PowerPoint as Running Mate

Mitt Romney, the former Bay State guv now running third in the GOP presidential sweepstakes, doesn't use a BlackBerry or even carry a cellphone. But that's not to say he's not a techie geek. In fact, he's proving to be just the kind of wonk that would make Microsoft's Bill Gates giddy at an issues lunch. Here's the deal: Romney is the first-ever presidential candidate to haul out a PowerPoint presentation at campaign events. He did it recently while addressing the Detroit Economic Club, and the audience went nuts for it. "It was amazing," an auto exec tells us. "I mean he didn't just make claims. He had the graphs to back him up!"

The idea was the candidate's and was a textbook presentation outlined in classic fashion: It opened with the "Intro," wrapped up under the title "Close," and finished with an "End" on Page 21. In between were graphs that Romney tried to soften with descriptions of lines like "squiggle." PowerPoints, says spokesman Kevin Madden, "speak to the competency that [Romney] exudes and the authoritative nature of his understanding of the issues." Plus, he says, the boss just digs them-and is a great presenter. "He's the PowerPoint president. Very few people could pull this off and not look wonkish." And the Mitt-tech doesn't end there: He's started Mitt TV and raises cash on ComMitt, a computer fundraising program.

Could Al Gore Bankroll His Bid?

If you're wondering why, despite his denials, Al Gore remains the most talked about nonpresidential candidate, it's this: His friends think he's done so well in the private world that he could bankroll the start of his own 2008 bid. "If Al Gore wants to run, he will come with all the means necessary," says longtime ally Donna Brazile. "Al Gore is someone who can pull it off at half time,"she said. But he's got competing interests for his wallet: Friends say he also wants to expand his global climate change campaign.

This Candidate Is Used to Running

It doesn't look as if we'll be seeing Sen. Barack Obama, among the leanest Democrats running for the presidency, hanging out at McDonald's. That's because he's big on exercise and healthy eating. "He exercises every day," says an insider. Obama's a runner and a regular on the treadmill. The youthful lawmaker even ran for an hour before announcing his candidacy back in Illinois. Among his snacks: trail mix.

Once Again in the Line of Fire

Can a prosecutor go on to become president? Well, that's what fans of TV prosecutor Arthur Branch, aka former Sen. Fred Thompson,hope. We hear that his buddies are strongly urging him to jump into the already packed GOP race. "The draft- Fred movement grows," says one ally, citing several blogs pushing Thompson, who has been feeding his fans with occasional commentary-laced fill-in work for radio's Paul Harvey.

A New Rambo, but the Same Ending

Suicide attacks dominate the headlines, but here's one that didn't happen. A U.S. Army officer in Afghanistan reports that last month a suicide bomber drove an explosive-laden Toyota Corolla up to an Army base in Kabul, where an Afghan nicknamed "Rambo" was guarding the gate. Rambo wears an Army-style uniform but isn't allowed to pack heat, so he uses a big red pipe, which he sometimes slams on car hoods to slow them down. Anyway, as the suicide bomber approached, he got hung up in the gate. Rambo reached into the window and yanked the bomber out before he could detonate the explosives. Rambo's reward: Troops passed a hat and handed him a wad of cash.

United by Lipstick to Fight Violence

Avon is joining Mary Kay February 27 to demand Congress fund the Violence Against Women Act. And note to lawmakers not into this program: Running when you see one of Mary Kay's pink brigade won't work. Avon's got some 5 million worldwide agents who dress just like you.

A Scandal for the Silver Screen

From our Buzz Etc. files: There's talk that outted CIA operative Valerie Plame's story may hit the silver screen. It all started when she was spotted lunching with actress Morgan Fairchild and hubby Joe Wilson. CIA types say her book has been iced in the clearance process, so the quickest way to seize on the scandal is to make a movie. Separately, there's speculation that Bush Commerce chief Carlos Gutierrez is being wooed by Latin America's TV giant Univison.

A Nasty Habit, All Snuffed Out

He was among Congress's heaviest smokers, but now former Majority Leader Dick Armey has given up his Carlton menthol 100s. "I was just thinking about my wife one day," he tells us, "and I realized that of all the things I could do on this Earth that would make her happy is to quit smoking." Just like that, he did. "If a guy knows that, then it seems to me a guy has got to quit." Certainly, his wife, Susan, had told him many times before to snuff out the nasty habit. "I heard it a lot, of course," he says, but it didn't sink in until about two months ago. "We don't want to shock and startle your women readers, but even though I heard it over the years, I guess I'm living proof that on some occasions, some husbands sometimes actually hear what their wives say." Still, he did question his move. "I spent the next four weeks of my life trying to figure out if her happiness really meant that much to me." It went so well that he's not sympathetic to others like Sen. Barack Obama, who chews Nicorette to get over the habit. "If he's chewing this stuff, he's not stopped smoking," says Armey, who revealed a broader skepticism of crutches used by those with bad habits. "I'm laughing now, but if we ever indict a Mormon in Congress, what is the guy going to do, because he can't check into an alcohol rehab facility. ... I don't know what a politician that's indicted does if he can't check into rehab and say, 'The whiskey did it.'"

Alter: The Apology Primary Is On (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

Hillary Clinton is right to resist efforts to make her cry uncle and apologize for her 2002 vote in favor of the Iraq-war resolution; that would look weak. Her mistake was in not anticipating this problem with the liberal base of her party last summer and cauterizing the wound in advance, before it festered. Instead, she offered lame rationalizations. She should have taken a leaf from John McCain and her husband, each skilled in the subtle politics of contrition. This skill will be essential to the success of the next president.

In recent years, the word apology has reverted in politics to its original meaning in Greek, which is "defense." (Plato's "Apologia" is an account of Socrates' unsuccessful defense of himself in his trial.) Exhibit A is McCain, whose career-enhancing apologies are legion. A partial list includes apologizing for making a "confession" tape during his captivity by the North Vietnamese; for committing adultery during his first marriage; for his role in the Keating Five savings-and-loan scandal; for a nasty joke about Chelsea Clinton; for comparing Newt Gingrich's popularity to Jeffrey Dahmer's, and, during the 2000 campaign, for calling Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell "agents of intolerance." Whew!

But McCain's reputation for using contrition to charm his way out of trouble might be catching up with him. When ABC News asked Vice President Cheney last week about McCain's comments that Donald Rumsfeld was "perhaps the worst secretary of Defense ever," Cheney replied archly: "John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld." He didn't.

But if he were truly a straight talker McCain would express regret for his consistently insincere praise of President Bush. For six years, Rumsfeld and Bush were joined at the hip. One can't be bad and the other good. It may be that McCain is on the verge of losing the Apology Primary to John Edwards, whose showy contrition for his vote in favor of the war resolution is what has put Hillary on the hot seat.

Bill Clinton approved of his wife's approach, perhaps because he, too, largely refrained from personal apologies until forced to by the Lewinsky scandal ("I have sinned"). But he built good will worldwide in part by repeatedly admitting historical error on the part of the United States, from U.S. support for the "dirty war" in Guatemala to the Tuskegee syphilis studies on blacks to the overthrow of the Hawaiian Queen Liliuokalani. Most significantly, he went to Africa in 1998 and said the United States had been wrong to engage in the slave trade and that his administration had erred by failing to intervene more forcefully to prevent Rwandan genocide.

This marked a big change from George H.W. Bush, who said in 1988, "I will never apologize for the United States. I don't care what the facts are," after a U.S. ship mistakenly shot down an Iranian airliner, killing 290 civilians. Bush's son has stuck to his father's view. He famously couldn't recall any mistakes he'd made as president and left apologies for the torture at Abu Ghraib to Rumsfeld and other underlings until King Abdullah of Jordan insisted he make amends personally. As the list of appallingly bad decisions by his administration lengthens, Bush often opts for the passive voice President Reagan favored during the Iran-contra scandal: "Mistakes were made."

Does Hillary Clinton have the same instinct to maintain a façade of presidential infallibility? She's known to apologize quickly in private after ruffling feathers. But with her polls showing that she receives high marks for strength and toughness, she is loathe to do anything in public that might be seen as wimpy or fulfilling unflattering stereotypes of women. Hillary finally admitted in December that if she'd known then what she knows now, she would have voted differently on the war resolution. To a normal person, that would mean she was wrong in 2002 to have entrusted Bush with a blank check. Instead, she chose to play the kind of semantic games that always spell trouble for the Clintons.

By doubling down—insisting that it's wrong to admit she was wrong—Hillary may have set a bad precedent in the humility department. Should she win, she'll need every tool at her disposal to convince the world that a new day has dawned, with the "humble foreign policy" promised by none other than George W. Bush in 2000. That's the only way we can recover our global leadership and mobilize allies to confront emerging threats. It's too late to apologize for this one, but the next time things go wrong, she could do worse than meld the McCain and Clinton styles of saying sorry into a persuasive defense of her own.

Hillary-Obama Feud Imperils Party For '08 (WT)

By Donald Lambro, THE WASHINGTON TIMES

The Washington Times, February 26, 2007

Democratic strategists say the bitter fight between Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama could undermine their party's bid to win back the White House if it continues.

"I think the Democrats in general, particularly party activists and leaders, do not want to see a knife fight between these two which results in blood all over the Democrats. We want a strong nominee coming out of this primary process, not one that is beaten and bloodied," said Bud Jackson, a Democratic media adviser.

That view summed up what many Democrats were thinking last week when the front-runners were trading political blows through their spokesmen after movie mogul David Geffen, a former Clinton ally who is now backing Mr. Obama, called Mrs. Clinton a disingenuous, "incredibly polarizing figure" who isn't electable and appeared to allude to her husband's past infidelity.

It was the first skirmish of the presidential election cycle, which triggered a storm of media attention on the nightly news and on the front pages of the nation's newspapers and which campaign pollsters say has already had a negative effect on both of the candidates.

"This story has legs. The opening kickoff has been made. Clinton's the kicker and Obama's the receiver, who kicked back. What's clear is that it's going to be nasty from here on, which doesn't help the Democrats," said independent pollster John Zogby.

"At this stage, anything that threatens party unity or alienates Democrats or annoys swing voters can hurt. So in the case of Hillary, anything that reminds swing voters of the darker side of the Clintons hurts. And anything that suggests that Obama is not 'Clean Gene,' meaning 'I'm not going to run on the "audacity of hope," but I'm going to kick you if you kick me,' can hurt," Mr. Zogby said.

By late last week, the Clinton-Obama fight was still reverberating in the press, which up until now has had thin gruel to write about in the Democrats' campaign. The New York Times said in a front-page article Friday that the New York senator's effort to identify Mr. Obama with Mr. Geffen's attack "was widely viewed among Democrats as carrying some cost to Mrs. Clinton."

Her campaign's broadside against her chief rival for the nomination was "a sharp reminder of Clinton family history that has led some Democrats to believe Mrs. Clinton cannot win a general election," the Times said.

Whoever won the first round in their nominating fight, many Democrats were clearly uncomfortable with the intensity of their exchange.

"The Democrats have momentum going their way, an unpopular president waging a misguided war, and now they're pointing fingers at each other," said Chris Redfern, the Ohio Democratic chairman. "At the end of the day, no one's paying any attention to this, but they need to clean it up, make nice with each other and get to work."

Other Democrats, though, saw this as nothing more than the usual political rough-and-tumble of a presidential campaign and thought the story was being overplayed.

"I think we are going to have a spirited debate [over who the party should nominate], and that is going to be uplifting and at times rough. This is the nature of politics," said Simon Rosenberg, president of the New Democrat Network.

Despite his concern about how voters perceived the latest fight between the two party leaders, even Mr. Jackson, the media adviser, called it "a minor speed bump" on the road to next January's primaries and caucuses. "I think Obama overreacted a little bit, but this is inside baseball. It only becomes an issue if we see a pattern develop," he said.

One rival for the Democratic nomination suggested yesterday that reporters were making too much of the Obama-Clinton dust-up.

"Oh, I think it's a bunch of silliness," former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

"I was in New Hampshire yesterday. I met probably over a thousand New Hampshire primary voters in the course of having a bunch of house parties. And you'd be shocked to hear the only people who asked me about this were reporters," Mr. Edwards said. "I didn't have a single New Hampshire voter ask me about this."

John Edwards Says Democratic Donor Spat Is Silly (MBSN)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON - "Silliness."

That's what Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards had to say about the publicity surrounding the donor spat between two of his chief rivals, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

The Obama and Clinton campaigns issued dueling press releases about a top Hollywood donor who once supported Bill Clinton but is now backing Obama.

Hillary Clinton's campaign demanded Obama return producer David Geffen's money after Geffen criticized both Clintons. Obama declined, and his spokesman criticized Clinton for accepting support from a South Carolina lawmaker who said Obama could not win because he is black.

"Oh, I think it's a bunch of silliness," Edwards said Sunday on CBS "Face the Nation."

He said the topic was not on the minds of voters during a stop Saturday in New Hampshire.

"I met probably over a thousand New Hampshire primary voters in the course of having a bunch of house parties. And you'd be shocked to hear the only people who asked me about this were reporters.

"I didn't have a single New Hampshire voter ask me about this. What they're asking about is what are we going to do about Iraq? What are we going to do about Iran? What are we going to do about health care? The things you'd expect them to be concerned about," Edwards said.

Reactions To Obama, Clinton Excite S.C. Democrats (POL)

By Lee Bandy

Politico.com, February 26, 2007

Democratic presidential hopefuls Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama drew huge crowds on recent campaign swings through South Carolina.

Together, they made a statement: The Democratic Party is back.

“I’ve never seen anything like it,” remarked Democratic consultant Bob Wislinski on leaving the Columbia Metropolitan Convention Center where Obama, a U.S. senator from Illinois, just had addressed a raucous rally of 2,800.

“I’m hopeful,” Wislinski said of his party’s future.

Clinton, a U.S. senator from New York, spoke to more than 3,500 at a town meeting at Allen University.

South Carolina is a key battleground state in the primary process, coming just a week after New Hampshire’s first-in-the-nation primary.

The S.C. Democratic primary is set for Jan. 29, 2008. The Republican contest tentatively is scheduled for Feb. 2, 2008.

With both parties holding early primaries, South Carolina will get a lot of attention from Republican and Democratic candidates. There’s been a steady stream since the first of the year.

A sizable number of South Carolinians have been showing up at the rallies of Democratic candidates, catching party establishment types off guard.

But it is foolhardy for candidates and their followers to suggest victory is in the air.

The size of the turnout is no indication of what’s going to happen on Election Day, says Clemson University political scientist Bruce Ransom.

Many in attendance at the candidate rallies are curiosity seekers, like John Clark, a State House employee.

He came to see Obama, a “celebrity, a rock star,” he said. But he was a long ways off from picking a horse to ride.

After all, what’s the rush?

Columbia attorney and former state Rep. I.S. Leevy Johnson cautions black voters to proceed slowly in picking a 2008 candidate for president.

Gather background information on the candidates. Listen to their stands on key issues. Check out their personal lives.

Right now, the momentum is with Obama and Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0136171

"I'm excited," said state Rep. Gilda Cobb-Hunter. "Obama is stirring excitement among voters in a manner I have not seen before. That's good for the Democratic Party.

"I want to win in '08 and will support the candidate who demonstrates electability and whose message I can resonate with."

Unlike some past years, Cobb-Hunter, D-Orangeburg, has no intention of staying on the political sidelines this primary cycle.

"I believe this election is for the Democrats to lose," Cobb-Hunter said. "I can't afford to sit this one out."

Candidate No. 4, Please

Meanwhile, some Republicans are concerned that U.S. Sen. John McCain of Arizona appears to have lost interest in the race.

"The excitement in 2008 is on the side of the Democrats. No doubt about it," says Francis Marion University political scientist Neal Thigpen , a GOP activist.

On the Republican side of the primary ledger, McCain is locked in a tight race and appears to be losing ground. Those who've seen him recently say he looks a bit shopworn.

"My impression is that the Republicans are demoralized," Thigpen said. "They are not wild about any of their top three candidates."

Someone Give Geffen A Day Job (NYT)

By David Carr

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

Last Friday, two days before the conclusion of the most closely contested Oscar race in recent memory, a dozen people from various parts of the entertainment industry sat down to lunch at the home of Arianna Huffington in Brentwood.

Would the Oscar go to "The Departed" or "Babel," Martin Scorsese or Clint Eastwood?

The topic barely came up.

Instead, the conversation was all about the media mogul David Geffen's drive-by maiming of the Clintons earlier in the week in remarks he made to Maureen Dowd of The New York Times. For over an hour, the people at the table debated his decision to take on Hillary Clinton, who is pursuing the Democratic nomination for president.

Mr. Geffen, 64, would no doubt have been pleased. A billionaire with manifest interests, he has a lot of time on his hands now that DreamWorks, the mini-major studio he formed with Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg, has been bought and folded into Paramount. With a net worth that has been estimated at $4.5 billion and no more worlds to conquer, Mr. Geffen finds himself — well, inserts himself — in the middle of conversations over the future of Paramount, The Los Angeles Times and now the republic itself.

On Tuesday night, Senator Barack Obama, Mrs. Clinton's closest rival for the nomination, topped off a day of old-time politicking here by speaking at a $2,300-a-plate fund-raiser at the Beverly Hilton, dappled with celebrities like Eddie Murphy, Jennifer Aniston and Morgan Freeman. That was followed by a more intimate affair at Mr. Geffen's Beverly Hills home. Within hours of the event, BlackBerrys started lighting up all over town with Ms. Dowd's column, in which she chatted with Mr. Geffen about the Clintons.

"Everybody in politics lies, but they do it with such ease, it's troubling," he told Ms. Dowd. (Of course, many of Mr. Geffen's former business partners say that he has had his own idiosyncratic relationship with the truth.) Calling the former president a "reckless guy" deftly put the issue of Bill Clinton's behavior in the present tense. And at a moment when some of the smart money was poised to line up behind Mrs. Clinton's candidacy, Mr. Geffen was signaling that backing her may not be so smart after all.

You have to hand it to him: here it was, Oscar weekend, and at least nobody was talking about the failure of "Dreamgirls," Mr. Geffen's pet project, to get a best picture nomination.

"David Geffen gave voice to the collective unconscious of many people here," said Ms. Huffington, whose opposition to the Iraq war and Mrs. Clinton's candidacy has been on display on the Huffington Post Web site for some time. "The story would have been dead in a day if he was just speaking for himself, but these things are on everybody's mind."

DOJ_NMG_0136172

Still, while Mr. Geffen hardly needs the money, you can understand why a lot of people here wish he still had a day job. (Mr. Geffen declined to elaborate on his remarks to Ms. Dowd.)

"I don't think that all of this is productive," said Warren Beatty, reached on his cellphone. "I think the media is looking for a big political story, and I think it is much more important to talk about the issues."

The mixture of revulsion and fascination with this episode mirrors Mr. Geffen's career. He combines a gift for market timing — this is the guy who brought you the Eagles in the '70s, Guns N' Roses in the '80s and Nirvana in the '90s — with a guerrilla's touch for instigation.

Even though DreamWorks was acquired by Paramount for $1.6 billion a year ago, many people have seen his hand in the subsequent moves at the studio. The decision to bring in Stacey Snider, a Geffen familiar, to run the DreamWorks division could be perceived as a threat to Brad Grey, the head of Paramount. And according to The Los Angeles Times, after Tom Freston was ousted as the head of Viacom, Mr. Geffen called Viacom's chairman, Sumner M. Redstone, and suggested that he hire Mr. Katzenberg, the head of DreamWorks Animation, and buy that as well.

"He is a star in a way that none of the other people in Hollywood with money are stars," said James Toback, a film director who once tried to cast Mr. Geffen in a movie.

And then there is Mr. Geffen's offer to buy The Los Angeles Times for $2 billion. While everyone can give Mr. Geffen credit for his deep understanding of how the news media can be manipulated, few would think of that skill set as congruent with owning a newspaper. (And indeed, his effort hasn't panned out.) But given what he accomplished with a few sharply conceived quotes to a well-read columnist, it is not hard, and not pretty, to imagine what he could do if he were in charge of one of the country's most important daily newspapers.

And perhaps that's the lesson the Democrats (and everyone else) should take from the past week. Business types love to get involved in politics, of course, but their tactics tend more toward the kind of knee-capping they remember so fondly from their boardroom days.

No one is expecting Mr. Geffen to spend his days golfing, but there is a danger that if the coming election becomes his full-time hobby, his precision ruthlessness will distort the public process. After all, this is not a movie sale, a busted deal or a Don Henley album; this is about the duly elected leader of the United States.

Mr. Geffen and Ron Burkle, another Los Angeles billionaire who is a staunch ally of the Clintons, have already fought for custody of The Los Angeles Times. No one wants to see the presidency treated as a cat toy between rich men who don't like to lose.

"I think that America was better served when the candidates were chosen in smoke-filled rooms," Mr. Geffen told Ms. Dowd.

There will be no smoke — we're talking about California, after all — but if kings are to be made or undone, you can bet that Mr. Geffen is standing at the ready.

Mud, Dust, Whatever (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

If Bill and Hillary Clinton were the stars of a reality TV show, it would be a weekly series called "The Connivers." The Clintons, the most powerful of power couples, are always scheming at something, and they're good at it.

Their latest project is to contrive ways to knock Barack Obama off his white horse and muddy him up a little. A lot, actually.

Most of the analyses after last week's dust-up over David Geffen's comments to Maureen Dowd have focused on whether the Clintons succeeded in tarnishing the junior senator from Illinois. What I found interesting was that no one questioned whether the Clintons would be willing to get down in the muck and start flinging it around. That was a given.

When Senator Obama talks about bringing a new kind of politics to the national scene, he's talking about something that would differ radically from the relentlessly vicious, sleazy, mendacious politics that have plagued the country throughout the Bush-Clinton years. Whether he can pull that off is an open question. But there's no doubt the Clintons want to stop him from succeeding.

Senator Obama has come riding out of the wilderness (all right, Chicago) to stand between the Clintons and their dream of returning to the White House and resuming what they will always see as the glory years of the 1990s.

He hurts Senator Clinton in myriad ways. In all the uproar over Mr. Geffen's comments, hardly anyone has said they were wildly off the mark. There would be no Obama phenomenon if an awful lot of people weren't fed up with just the sort of mean-spirited, take-no-prisoners politics that the Clintons and the Bush crowd represent. Senator Obama — at least for the time being — is an extremely attractive alternative.

Right behind that as a factor is the distinct possibility that Mr. Obama will ride off with the black vote, without which the Clintons are doomed. Those who joked that Bill Clinton was the first black president are now confronted with someone who might be the real deal.

Senator Obama is also much freer to take fresh stands on the issues. His camp has been delighted, for example, to watch Senator Clinton twist herself into a pretzel on Iraq. From day care to health care to trade and beyond, Mr. Obama is free to offer something new. He's not tied to the Clinton experience, the Clintonian way of viewing the world.

And, finally, this campaign is not the be-all and end-all for Senator Obama. More easily than the Clintons, he can afford to make mistakes. He does not have to win this election. He can fight another day. In the absence of any catastrophic misstep, he could be selected as a vice-presidential candidate this time around. (It's not too hard to imagine a John Edwards-Barack Obama pairing.) He can run again for president four years from now, or eight years from now.

His future, as Yogi might have said, is all in front of him.

The Clintons were fresh once. I remember the exhilarating bus tour they took with Al and Tipper Gore right after Bill Clinton won the Democratic presidential nomination in the summer of 1992. There was a spontaneous quality to that tour and a sense that these four young leaders represented a new dawn of American politics.

Almost 15 years later, Hillary Clinton has to fight the perception that she is chasing yesterday's dawn. She has the benefit of universal name recognition, uniformly high poll numbers and trainloads of campaign cash. But she still gives the impression that she's riding the political high wire with the mixed blessing of Bill Clinton planted firmly on her shoulders.

It's ironic that the first woman with a real shot at the presidency comes off not as a compelling underdog but as the powerful front-runner at the controls of a ruthless political machine.

We'll have to wait and see whether Senator Obama is really offering a new, more hopeful brand of national politics. But here's a bit of unsolicited advice for a candidate making his first foray into the crucible of presidential politics:

Don't listen to those who tell you not to fight back against the Clintons. You will not become president if you allow yourself to become their punching bag. Keep in mind the Swift-boating of John Kerry. Raising politics to a higher level does not mean leaving oneself defenseless.

Hillary Clinton Courts Black Voters (NSDY)

By Reid J. Epstein, Reid.epstein@newsday.com

Long Island Newsday, February 26, 2007

At African-American cultural celebration in NY, senator talks about local issues and helps honor community activists

It wasn't officially a campaign event, and she didn't mention the presidency, but Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton spent yesterday working to position herself as the candidate for African-Americans.

Coming after a week in which her campaign traded barbs with Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, Clinton's Democratic primary opponent, she presided over an African-American heritage celebration hosted by District Council 37, New York City's largest public employee union.

At the union's lower Manhattan headquarters, Clinton spoke mostly about local issues not likely to earn her attention in early presidential battleground states like Iowa and New Hampshire.

The former first lady, who wore a black suit with a pink shirt, praised the York College basketball team for winning the CUNY conference basketball championship, touted the preservation of the downtown African burial ground and promised to work to keep residents of Brooklyn's massive Starrett City housing development, which is in the process of being sold, from being priced out of their homes.

DOJ_NMG_0136174

"Starrett," she said, "we've got to save the housing there."

Even though Clinton focused on local issues -- she also pushed universal health care coverage -- the event's honorees didn't hesitate to expound on her presidential prospects.

"Our president often considers, it appears, Africa a country and not a continent," said Elsie Crum McCabe, the president of the Museum for African Art in Long Island City. "Our next president won't do that."

The remark was clearly made with Clinton in mind though it could apply also to Obama, whose father was born in Kenya. The presidential contender is well-respected by many blacks for his work as a community organizer in Chicago.

Ernest Davis, the mayor of Mount Vernon in Westchester County, said New York state's black community will work hard to help candidate Clinton.

"If she is to succeed, we can't just stand on the sidelines," Davis said while accepting an award during the event. "We're going to do everything in our power to make sure that she is successful."

Other honorees spoke of Clinton as a trail blazer for women. Sheena Wright, the president and chief executive of the Harlem-based Abyssinian Development Corp., a nonprofit investment organization, said the free world would be fortunate to have Clinton as its leader.

"As she makes her way to the White House again," Wright said to raucous applause while accepting an award at the event, "not only does the United States of America need her leadership ... but the world needs her to sit in that seat."

Other honorees yesterday were Divine Bradley, 24, a hip-hop artist who started an after-school program near his home in Canarsie, Brooklyn; Marcia Keizs, the president of York College in Jamaica; and Lillian Roberts, DC37's executive director.

Yesterday marked the seventh year of the event, which Clinton began upon her election to the Senate.

Clinton finished her day at a discussion of Sen. Charles Schumer's book, "Positively American: Winning Back the Middle-Class Majority One Family at a Time," at the 92nd Street Y on the Upper East Side. She is scheduled to spend today traveling upstate to discuss economic issues.

Rice: Obama's Run Shows Black Progress (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON - Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice finds Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama appealing and says it won't be much longer before race isn't a barrier to becoming president.

Obama is a top-tier contender among Democrats and his wide support early in the 2008 race "just shows that we've come a very long way," Rice said Sunday. She and the Illinois senator are black.

"I do think we've come a long way in overcoming stereotypes, role stereotypes about African-Americans. I will say race is still a factor. When a person walks into a room, I still think people still see race," Rice said.

"But it's less and less of a barrier to believing that that person can be your doctor or your lawyer or a professor in your university or the CEO of a company. And it will not be long, I think, before it's no longer a barrier to being president of the United States," Rice said.

Rice, a Republican, has said repeatedly she will not run for president despite high popularity ratings and measurable support in opinion polls.

She noted that if she were to continue as secretary of state through the end of President Bush's term in January 2009, "we will not have had a white male secretary of state for 12 years - a white woman, black man and a black woman. That says something about how far our country has come, even though we can't deceive ourselves. Race is still a factor in this country."

Her most recent predecessors at the State Department were Colin Powell and Madeleine Albright. Powell was secretary of state from 2001 to 2005; Albright from 1997 to 2001.

Rice discussed race in the United States when asked about Obama's candidacy. Obama, a first-term senator, is considered among the early front-runners for the Democratic nomination with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards.

Rice noted that Obama is a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, where the secretary often testifies.

DOJ_NMG_0136175

"I think he's very appealing and a great person. He's on my committee. And we've always had good exchanges. I think he's an extraordinary person," she said.

Rice declined to say whether she thought he had enough experience, especially in foreign policy, to be president.

"Oh, I'm not going to make that choice. The American people are going to make that choice," she said.

Rice was interviewed on "Fox News Sunday."

How Much Will The '08 Race Turn On Race? (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

During the past three weeks, three different African-American political insiders have commented to me that I have mistakenly failed to discuss "race" when talking about Sen. Barack Obama's prospects for 2008.

They all thought that the Illinois Democrat's race is an impossible burden for him and makes him unelectable in the general election even if he were to win the Democratic nomination.

It's true, I think, that many of us who write about politics — and as a group we are overwhelmingly white — have concluded that former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's (R) religion is a greater impediment to his presidential hopes than is Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's (D-N.Y.) gender or Obama's race.

That's been my assumption for months, in part because national public opinion surveys have shown that more Americans say they wouldn't vote for a Mormon than for a woman or an African-American, and in part because the nature of the presidential nominating process elevates the importance of certain states and of certain demographic groups in those key states.

After all, if evangelical Christians prove to be unwilling to support a Mormon, it's hard to see how Romney can do well in Iowa or South Carolina, two key early tests for the GOP nomination. And if he flops there, he probably can't be nominated, let alone elected president.

But some in the black community remain deeply skeptical about Obama's electability. Their view is simple: Whether those being surveyed about their willingness to vote for an African-American are deceiving themselves or intentionally misleading pollsters, a lot of white voters won't vote for a black nominee.

There is, of course, something to this view. Political observers long ago concluded that African-American candidates often underperform among undecided voters, and polling in past races has exaggerated the strength of some black candidates.

But after re-examining my assumptions, talking to some thoughtful political veterans and considering the data, I remain convinced that Obama's race is not an insurmountable problem for him.

First, let's stipulate that there are still some people in this country who won't vote for an African-American for any office. Second, let's agree that there are plenty of states that a Democrat, white or black, is not going to carry in the 2008 presidential race. And third, let's also note that race tends to be more of an issue in states with large black populations, and that happens to be in Southern states that no Democrat will win.

The question then is whether Obama can carry enough white voters in enough Democratic or politically competitive states to win 270 electoral votes. I think it's possible. He wouldn't need to carry South Carolina or Oklahoma or even Louisiana. He might need some combination of Iowa, Nevada, New Mexico, Colorado and/or Ohio — all states that Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) lost in 2004 — but he wouldn't need to carry a Deep South state or a bastion of Republicanism.

Ten African-Americans in the House, all Democrats, currently represent majority white districts, including two each in Florida, Georgia and Missouri. In addition, Julia Carson of Indiana, Keith Ellison of Minnesota, Mel Watt of North Carolina and Gwen Moore of Wisconsin all represent majority white districts. Ellison's district is only 10 percent black, while Carson's is 26 percent and Moore's is 28 percent.

Colorado has had two African-American lieutenant governors over the past 40 years, and in the late 1990s it had two black statewide officials at the same time (both Republicans).

African-American Thurbert Baker (D) has been elected and re-elected as Georgia's attorney general, and Michael Thurmond has been elected twice as the state's commissioner of labor. Baker ran far ahead of then-Sen. Max Cleland (D) and then-Gov. Roy Barnes (D) when each was going down to defeat in 2002. Republicans nominated African-Americans for governor last year in Ohio and Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts elected an African-American to the state's top job.

For the moment, I have more concerns about Obama's ability to win black support for the Democratic nomination than I do about his ability to get elected if nominated, especially since Clinton and former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) have appeal in that community.

"Older African-Americans are more pessimistic about what the prospects are for black candidates," said David Bositis, a senior political analyst with the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, and one of the most thoughtful and well-informed students of black political behavior and public opinion. That means they are likely to doubt Obama's electability in 2008.

But what happens if Obama starts winning primaries? "If Obama comes out of Iowa and New Hampshire looking like a winner, there will be a substantial move of support to him in the African-American community," Bositis predicted.

We all know that the Illinois Senator has considerable personal appeal, and white voters are likely to react far more favorably to him than to African-American political figures such as the Revs. Jesse Jackson or Al Sharpton. I believe he is electable under the right circumstances, which makes him no different than any other politician. That means he will win or lose because of his record, his campaign and his performance as a candidate.

As Candidate, Obama Carves Antiwar Stance (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25 — Senator Barack Obama is running for president as one of the few candidates who opposed the Iraq war from the beginning, a simple position unburdened by expressions of regret or decisions over whether to apologize for initially supporting the invasion.

Iraq remains a defining topic in the opening stages of the 2008 presidential race, but it may prove easier for Mr. Obama, Democrat of Illinois, to revisit the past than to distinguish his views in the future. The current Iraq proposals of Mr. Obama; Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York; and former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina share more similarities than differences, including a gradual withdrawal of troops.

Though Mr. Obama is framing his candidacy to appeal to Democrats who have long opposed the war, until recently he was not among his party's most outspoken voices against it. He campaigned strongly against the war in his bid for the Senate in 2004, but when he arrived in Washington he waited 11 months to deliver a major speech on Iraq.

And only after Mr. Obama opened a presidential exploratory committee did he introduce legislation to withdraw American combat brigades from Iraq by March 31, 2008.

In an interview last week, Mr. Obama said he intended to continue using the authorization of the war to distinguish himself from fellow Democratic presidential candidates. In addition to Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Edwards, Senators Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware voted to authorize the invasion.

"The authorization vote is relevant only because it gives an insight into how people think about these problems and suggests the sort of judgment they apply in evaluating a policy decision," Mr. Obama said. "There are people who sincerely believe that this was the best course of action, but in some cases politics entered into the calculation. In retrospect, a lot of people feel like they didn't ask hard enough questions."

Mr. Obama was not always so critical of the Congressional vote, taken on Oct. 11, 2002. In several interviews before the Democratic National Convention in 2004, where his national political ascent began, he said he did not place blame on Democrats who had voted to authorize the war, conceding he had not been privy to the same intelligence information.

Now, he appears intent on drawing the contrast between his early opposition to the war and the Senate votes to authorize it by Mr. Edwards, who has since repudiated his vote and apologized for it, and Mrs. Clinton, who has not apologized but has said she would not have supported the resolution had she known then what she knows now.

These days Mr. Obama dismisses the suggestion that it was easier for him to speak against the war because he was not serving in the Senate and therefore not obligated to vote on the matter. He recalled worrying, at the time, that he might lose his Senate primary election because of his decision to oppose the Iraq invasion.

"It certainly didn't look like a cost-free decision when Saddam Hussein's statue was being pulled down in Baghdad," Mr. Obama said in an interview. "I was in a hotel room in the middle of my Senate campaign, watching that happen, and President Bush's job approval rating was at 60 percent. Those who voted for the authorization felt pretty good."

In a Senate debate on Iraq last June, Mr. Obama voted to oppose an amendment seeking to set a specific timetable for withdrawing American troops. His current position on a withdrawal mirrors the conclusions of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which recommended a specific time frame for troops to leave.

Now the politics of the war seem to be working in his favor among Democratic primary voters.

As Mr. Obama has introduced himself in the opening weeks of his candidacy, few subjects have garnered more applause than his criticism of the war. He does not refer to the conflict as Mr. Bush's war, which antiwar candidates in the Democratic Party did in the 2004 election, but rather is seeking to expand the circle of responsibility to those who supported the invasion.

"We continue to be in a war that should never have been authorized," Mr. Obama told an audience in Iowa last week, making a not-so-subtle reference to Mrs. Clinton and other Democratic rivals. Two days later, at a Texas rally, he said, "I am proud of the fact that way back in 2002, I said that this war was a mistake."

As if on cue, the crowds of Democrats cheered with gusto.

Nolden Gentry, a lawyer in Des Moines who has been in audiences to see Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama in the past month, said Mr. Obama's position on Iraq was one of many factors setting his candidacy apart in the eyes of Democrats. "He's more pure on the war," Mr. Gentry said, walking from a town meeting where he and 2,200 others had seen Mr. Obama.

Sterletha Grover, an account representative for a computer company who saw Mr. Obama speak to about 20,000 people on Friday in Austin, Tex., said she liked his view on Iraq. "We shouldn't have gone there in the beginning," she said.

Mr. Obama highlights his points of distinction on the war in meetings with party officials and influential donors as well. During his trip to Des Moines last week, he met behind closed doors with members of the Iowa House of Representatives and the State Senate. In both sessions, participants said, he raised the issue of Iraq himself.

Still, his proposals for Iraq do not go as far as those of others in the Democratic field, particularly that of Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, who voted against the Iraq authorization and has recommended cutting military spending to end the war. Mr. Edwards, too, has called on Congress to pass substantive legislation that would, among other measures, block financing for a buildup of troops. Mr. Obama has not suggested such proposals.

Among the differences in the plans offered by Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton is that she does not propose setting a deadline for American troops to be withdrawn. The titles of their plans, though, are similar. Hers is called the Iraq Troop Reduction and Protection Act of 2007, and his is the Iraq War De-escalation Act of 2007.

In the interview last week, Mr. Obama said that he had not wavered on Iraq since the onset of the war and that he disagreed with critics who said he had become more vocal since becoming a candidate. He said he did not deliver speeches on the topic when he first arrived in the Senate because he was taking a low-key approach in his first year in office.

"As a freshman, our objective was not to try to get in the front all the time," Mr. Obama said. "But the truth is that in that first year, we had just seen an Iraqi election, and my feeling was that while I was not optimistic, it was appropriate to try to give the nascent government a chance."

At the time, Mr. Obama was also not planning to run for president. He opened his presidential exploratory committee on Jan. 16. The next day, Mrs. Clinton presented her Iraq plan on Capitol Hill.

As he stepped into an elevator that day, reporters asked whether he would be presenting a specific Iraq proposal. "That will be coming soon," he replied. Aides went to work, formulating legislation consistent with his views from more than four years earlier. And 13 days later, on Jan. 30, his plan was introduced.

Obama Makes First Campaign Stop In Kentucky (LEXHL)

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), February 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136178

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - Democratic presidential hopeful U.S. Sen. Barack Obama spoke Sunday night to a crowd of at least 3,000 supporters who waited nearly two hours for him to arrive for his first campaign stop in Kentucky.

Obama apologized for the delay, saying snow in Chicago kept him from arriving sooner.

"We had a blizzard up in Chicago," Obama said. "It was snowing and sleeting and blizzarding."

"There was no way I was not going to make 3,000 people coming out," he said to audience members who paid $25 a ticket for the event. A higher dollar fund-raising event was scheduled later at the nearby Henry Clay Hotel.

Obama talked about concerns that he is too inexperienced to be president.

"Some people might ask, 'How can this guy been president? He's only been in Washington for two years.' Let me tell you, I've been in Washington long enough to see that things need to be changed," he said.

Obama touched upon the issues that he has focused on in stump speeches during his two-week old campaign education, health care, energy policy, economic policy and the war in Iraq.

Loud applause rose from the crowd each time he said, "At the end of my first term as president."

On Iraq, he called the war "ill-conceived" and said it is "distracting attention away from the war on terrorism."

He called for a phased redeployment beginning May 1 of this year and a complete pullout of combat troops by March 31, 2008.

"We cannot bring about change in Iraq militarily," he said. "What we can't do is put our young men and women in the middle of a sectarian war. It won't work."

Obama is considered among the early front-runners for the Democratic nomination with U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards.

U.S. Rep. John Yarmuth, D-Ky., appeared on stage with Obama, but said his appearance wasn't an endorsement.

"I would be here for any of the Democratic candidates," he said. "But if he's the nominee, I will be extremely enthusiastic."

A Hard Habit To Kick -- Right, Obama? (LAT)

By Allan M. Brandt

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

PRESIDENTIAL hopeful Barack Obama is trying to quit smoking. There are, of course, many good reasons to. He will significantly reduce his own risk of serious disease and that of those around him by not smoking. But clearly, one of the reasons Obama wants to quit now — beyond pressure from his wife — is that it would be widely perceived as unseemly and inappropriate to have a smoker in the White House.

Smoking has become a marginalized and often stigmatized behavior, a sign of personal weakness — which just won't do in a presidential candidate these days. A once-social behavior has become largely solitary; the fragrant has turned foul. Indeed, we've had a revolution in the meanings associated with cigarettes that has coincided with a remarkable decline in smoking.

At the time of the first U.S. surgeon general's report issued in 1964, nearly half of all adult Americans were smokers. Today, the number stands at about one in five. Nonetheless, smoking continues to exact an enormous health toll. Nearly 450,000 deaths each year in the U.S. are attributed to cigarette use.

As Obama must know, quitting is no easy matter. Most individuals attempting it have tried and failed. Even those who get the best counseling and pharmacologic treatments are likely (at a rate of about 80%) to be smoking still, or again, at the end of a year.

And it may well be getting even more difficult to quit. A recent study shows that the average dose of nicotine in a pack of cigarettes has increased by more than 10% just since 1995, a result of explicitly engineered modifications.

Yet tobacco giant Philip Morris claims that it is eager to help smokers quit. It says so on its website and in much-touted "Quit Assist" ads and booklets that offer cessation strategies to smokers. This is the brilliant contemporary formulation of an old tobacco industry yarn: any smoker can quit if they are motivated and persevere.

So, even as tobacco companies admit that smoking is harmful — a fact they denied for 40 years — they continue to assert that consenting adults assume the risks (though they don't like to get specific about what those risks are, like lung cancer and stroke). As we now know from the millions of pages of internal tobacco documents available on the Web, the industry blows smoke out of both sides of its mouth. Philip Morris has been especially eager to complete its makeover into a "responsible corporate citizen." The company gave $25 million to the University of Virginia this month to support research on, yes, smoking cessation. Meanwhile, the five major U.S. tobacco companies, including Philip Morris, spent more than $15 billion last year promoting cigarettes here.

For every American like Obama who may successfully quit, there are "replacement smokers" in foreign lands. When Americans and others in Western developed nations began quitting in greater numbers in the 1970s and 1980s, the industry ramped up its efforts abroad, often with the assistance of the U.S. trade representative. Philip Morris International now sells more than four times as many cigarettes as its American sister company.

This dramatic rise in global consumption will prove disastrous in the future, especially in poorer countries. While 100 million people worldwide died of tobacco-induced diseases in the 20th century, the World Health Organization now predicts that nearly 1 billion such deaths will occur in this century.

Yet the ability to regulate tobacco is severely limited both here and abroad. Despite a Supreme Court ruling Tuesday tossing out a $79.5-million punitive damages judgment against Philip Morris, litigation remains a critical approach to holding the companies accountable. (In this case, the award may still be reinstated or reduced.)

One new strategy is the Framework Convention for Tobacco Control, an international treaty developed by the World Health Organization to restrict tobacco use. Participating countries agree to formulate pricing, taxation, labeling and controls on advertising to promote public health.

Philip Morris worked concertedly behind the scenes during the drafting of the pact to undermine the treaty's key provisions. The chief U.S. treaty negotiator, a career public health officer, even quit in protest when the Bush administration assisted in trying to water down the final version.

The treaty has been ratified by 144 nations, with the notable exception of the U.S. The Bush administration has yet to forward it to Obama and his colleagues in the Senate.

If Obama quits, no doubt Philip Morris will be the first to congratulate him. After all, won't that prove that anyone can stop anytime he wants to? If only that were true. Then the global epidemic of tobacco deaths would be coming to a precipitous end instead of spiraling upward. As the tobacco executives know all too well, a new smoker is born every minute — and they are ready with a pack of Marlboros.

Keeping The Faith (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

Veteran Christian activist Marlene Elwell is not inclined to make political compromises. She helped engineer Pat Robertson's victory over George H. W. Bush in 1988's Iowa caucuses and led Michigan to constitutionally ban gay marriage in 2004. But after meeting with Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, interviewing California Rep. Duncan Hunter, and studying former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee-all 2008 presidential hopefuls who, like Elwell, are dyed-in-the-wool religious conservatives-she concluded that none could raise the tens of millions of dollars necessary for a competitive campaign. So she looked to the top-tier Republican candidates who were less ideologically pure on abortion and gay marriage.

Of course, that decision had its own challenges. Elwell knew she could rule out supporting ex-New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, a social liberal. She sat down with former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a onetime supporter of gay rights and abortion rights who now calls himself a staunch social conservative, but couldn't get past his "sketchy and inconsistent" record. So Elwell cast her lot with Arizona Sen. John McCain, who infuriated religious conservatives by supporting embryonic stem cell research and opposing a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage. She reasoned that McCain's many antiabortion votes in the Senate made him enough of a social conservative and that he has a strong shot at actually winning. Elwell signed on, not just as a supporter but as McCain's faith outreach director. Now her task is to convince fellow Christian right activists that the senator is not the social moderate they think he is. "At first, audiences say, 'Oh, my-McCain isn't pro-life,'" Elwell says. "But after I discuss his record, they're pleasantly surprised. There are converts."

Whether McCain and the other leaders of the GOP presidential pack-Giuliani and Romney-can make enough converts among the Republican Party's base of religious conservatives may determine whether any of them can win the presidential nomination. Because of their political records and personal lives, all three have raised abundant doubts within the Christian right. And what happens next could be crucial. "One possibility is that Christian right activists coalesce around Brownback or Huckabee-if united, they would be formidable," says John Green, a scholar at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life. "And if they unite against any one candidate's nomination, they could prevent him from winning the nomination." Trying to stave off either possibility, McCain and Romney-and, to a lesser extent, Giuliani-have launched Christian conservative outreach plans. But some powerful Christian right activists are skeptical. And others are determined to stop the front-runners in their tracks.

The Christian right's consternation over Giuliani, McCain, and Romney is a remarkable turnabout from 2004, when the movement was united behind the re-election of George W. Bush. White evangelicals, who made up roughly a quarter of the electorate in 2004 and 2006, accounted for nearly 4 in every 10 Bush votes. "I don't think any of the three are remotely acceptable, and I don't think I'm an outlier," says Michael Farris, a top Christian activist who organized meetings between Bush and evangelical leaders for his first presidential run. "Giuliani holds the opposite view of the Republican platform on social issues, Romney has held both sides of those issues, and McCain picked fights with us the last time he ran for president." An early February meeting of the Council for National Policy, a club of powerful social conservatives whose members include Focus on the Family founder James Dobson and Left Behind author Tim LaHaye, was thick with fretting over '08. "I've never seen more disillusionment at this point in the election in 30 years," says a source close to the Council for National Policy, which prohibits members from discussing meetings with the media. "There's a revolt out there, a feeling these top three are being pushed on us by Republican leadership in D.C."

Splits. Some heavyweights within the Council for National Policy and other conservative coalitions are weighing an effort to galvanize behind a socially conservative second-tier candidate, such as Huckabee or Brownback, in an attempt to catapult him into the top tier. "There is a very strong feeling that we have to assert ourselves or we're going to end up with somebody we can't support," says Paul Weyrich, a longtime conservative activist and cofounder of Moral Majority. Weyrich says Christian right leadership is currently split "around fifty-fifty" over whether to pursue such a plan or to adopt an every-man-for-himself approach, in which activists would gravitate toward the candidate of their choice.

A concerted attempt to steer evangelical and conservative Roman Catholic voters toward a second-tier candidate could hit Romney hardest. In reversing his support for abortion rights and gay rights, Romney's strategy is to convince right-wing Republicans leaning toward Huckabee or Brownback that he's the more viable candidate. (The plan presumes that McCain and Giuliani will fight for the votes of the Republican establishment.) "There's a big group of pragmatic social conservatives who don't want to waste their votes," says a Romney aide. "We're going to be the second choice of a lot of people who want to follow their hearts but want a strong candidate."

Of the three front-runners, Romney has been courting evangelical leaders most zealously. After a meeting at his Massachusetts home last fall with roughly 15 high-powered religious conservatives, Romney sent each attendee a wooden captain's chair mounted with a brass plaque that reads, "You are welcome at our table anytime." Because many evangelicals consider Romney's Mormonism to be a cult, he has the most to gain by winning over visible evangelical leaders. "If the person in the pulpit says [Mormonism] is a line you cannot cross, then you can't reach the person in the pew," says evangelical publicity executive Mark DeMoss, who organized the Massachusetts meeting. The courtship continued in February at the National Religious Broadcasters convention in Orlando, where DeMoss introduced Romney to closed-door sessions of Christian right activists by saying: "I've found the answer to the question of whether you can support a Mormon: It depends on who the Mormon is."

Romney has picked up support among key evangelicals, including DeMoss and Jay Sekulow, who runs the Christian legal group American Center for Law and Justice, founded by Pat Robertson. Romney's campaign has also been assiduously courting Dobson, the nation's most politically powerful evangelical leader, who announced earlier that he couldn't support McCain or Giuliani. U.S. News has learned that Romney sat down with Dobson last week at Focus's Colorado Springs, Colo., headquarters for their first getting-to-know-you session. Christian right activists say that unless Romney can win his support, Dobson-who has not met with other presidential candidates at Focus HQ-is inclined to back a second-tier candidate.

Critics. Romney has suffered among social conservatives in recent months, as activists around the country have E-mailed to one another more than a dozen memos and news clips criticizing his gubernatorial record. Among other things, the memos allege that Romney appointed liberals to fill state court vacancies and that he failed to use his executive power to stop the distribution of marriage licenses to gay couples. The Romney campaign notes that his court appointees needed approval of Democratic officials and argues that an amendment to the state Constitution to ban gay marriage, which Romney backed, was preferable to a one-time executive injunction. But many conservatives remain skeptical. " If there's anything else [social conservatives] should know, he should let them know now," says Family Research Council President Tony Perkins, who stood with Romney last fall in Massachusetts to oppose the state Supreme Court's legalization of gay marriage.

Even before recent disclosures about what an ardent gay-rights and abortion-rights supporter Romney had been, some activists were dubious of his conversion to social conservativism. "Bush had a pretty consistent record of being pro-life and pro-family-it wasn't perfect, but it was consistent," says Farris. "Romney is not even in the ballpark."

That's where the McCain campaign sees its opening. In the past month or two, McCain has hired a handful of staffers to make the case to religious conservatives that McCain's antiabortion record in the Senate makes him a trustworthy alternative to Romney. McCain recently told a South Carolina audience that Roe v. Wade should be overturned, and he has been lobbying the National Right to Life Political Action Committee for an endorsement. That effort has so far failed to bear fruit, but McCain's pitch is resonating. "One's record is a good indicator of future performance," said Perkins after emerging from a meeting with McCain at the National Religious Broadcasters conference. "The senator does have a pretty solid record on the life issues."

McCain has begun tying his support for states' rights on the issue of abortion to his view that states should decide how to deal with gay marriage. But his opposition to the so-called Marriage Protection Amendment isn't McCain's only sticking point with religious conservatives. Grass-roots groups like Focus on the Family loathe the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law because they say it restricts their ability to communicate with constituents before elections. And, despite McCain's recent buddying up with Jerry Falwell, many activists are still sore over his "agents of intolerance" excoriation of Christian conservatives in 2000. "People say, 'McCain hated us then,'" says Weyrich. "'How do we know that he doesn't still hate us?'"

Faith. Unlike Romney, an active member and former official in the Mormon Church, the Episcopal McCain rarely speaks about his religious life. That's another possible stumbling block among religious conservatives, whose favorite politicians, like George W. Bush and Ronald Reagan, discussed their faith openly. Though McCain's aides say he will avoid talking about his religion, he does, in sessions with religious conservatives, tell of his role as an unofficial chaplain among his fellow POWs during the Vietnam War.

Of course, with his well-known defense credentials, McCain stands to benefit if, in the first competitive post-9/11 Republican presidential primary, issues like abortion and gay marriage take a back seat to terrorism and national security. That certainly appears to be Giuliani's calculus. The former New York mayor has been on a hiring spree, but he hasn't brought aboard staff to court religious conservatives. (His campaign notes that Giuliani will speak at Robertson's Regent University in Virginia Beach this spring.) Giuliani has stressed that he would appoint "strict constructionists" to the judiciary, an important cause for social conservatives, and his staff says he holds some positions-like opposing gay marriage and the procedure critics call "partial-birth" abortion-that will appeal to religious conservatives. But his campaign believes the '08 Republican primary will see candidates' leadership qualities overshadow their stances on hot-button issues. "Rudy is moderate on social issues, and despite that, he's leading in the polls," says Bill Simon, a top Giuliani adviser. "This is a time when people feel uncertain about the international situation and want to know the person in the Oval Office is up to the task, even if they don't agree with him on everything."

If Giuliani winds up harnessing enough moderate Republican support to win the nomination, the GOP will have another problem on its hands: how to get evangelicals to the polls in the general election. "Evangelicals just won't vote" if Giuliani is the nominee, says the Southern Baptist Convention's Richard Land. "He'll lose Ohio, perhaps Tennessee-maybe even Texas." To Christian conservatives, it's a losing formula. But they still have to find a winning formula that includes them.

Winning With Evangelicals (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

DOJ_NMG_0136182

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

To appreciate how much is at stake in the Republican contenders' struggles to win over evangelical voters-and in the vows of the Democratic candidates to change their party's secular image-just consider the 2004 election. In his new book The Jesus Machine: How James Dobson, Focus on the Family, and Evangelical America Are Winning the Culture War, U.S. News Senior Editor Dan Gilgoff details how George W. Bush's evangelical outreach machine, and John Kerry's failure to connect with evangelicals and other religious voters, may have determined the outcome.

Despite the unprecedented get-out-the-vote efforts being organized by evangelical groups like Focus on the Family, the Bush-Cheney 2004 campaign wasn't taking any chances. After the 2000 election debacle, which saw Bush lose the popular vote, White House political don Karl Rove estimated publicly that 4 million white evangelical voters had stayed home on Election Day 2000. He vowed to reinvigorate them for 2004. No other demographic that size would consistently pull the Republican lever.

But rather than blame the Bush-Cheney 2000 campaign for the depressed evangelical turnout that year, the Bush-Cheney 2004 re-election team pointed the finger at evangelical groups like Focus on the Family. In the eyes of the Bushies, such groups claimed huge followings but had failed to get them to the polls four years earlier. Said one Bush-Cheney '04 official: "Because the ball was dropped so precipitously in 2000, [evangelical mobilization] had to be brought inside."

Officials inside Focus on the Family's public policy shop argued that they had been much less gung-ho about mobilizing evangelical voters in 2000 than in 2004 because candidate Bush was something of an unknown quantity; he promoted "compassionate conservatism" and a "big tent" GOP rather than play up antiabortion and antigay rights themes. "We didn't really know George Bush till he was inaugurated," said Focus on the Family public policy director Tom Minnery. "At that inauguration, he had Franklin Graham ... there were church hymns being sung. It was a Christian service was what it was."

Creating motivation. Focus on the Family officials also noted that at the time of the 2000 election, Massachusetts hadn't yet legalized gay marriage, and the proposed amendment to the Constitution banning gay marriage hadn't yet emerged as a key issue. Evangelicals, in other words, had fewer reasons to be motivated for Bush in 2000.

But Bush's re-election team had a different theory. When Ralph Reed left Christian Coalition after the 1996 election, the organization-which had boasted an $8.5 million budget and a thousand nationwide chapters-more or less collapsed. Membership dwindled and the group fell into debt. But, the Bushies theorized, neither GOP strategists nor Christian right groups had appreciated the vacuum in voter mobilization efforts left by Christian Coalition's implosion until the exit polls came back from 2000. "People trusted that there was still a Christian Coalition getting out the vote," said one Bush-Cheney '04 official. "But Christian Coalition had fallen apart, and no one else had picked up the slack yet."

So in 2004, the Bush team vowed to take evangelical mobilization into its own hands. In 2000, the Bush campaign had outsourced evangelical outreach to the consulting firm that Ralph Reed launched after leaving Christian Coalition. In 2004, Bush's campaign instead hired Reed to work from the inside. Officially, he was the Bush-Cheney chairman for the southeast region of the United States. But his more important assignment was to construct a vast volunteer infrastructure, extending into tens of thousands of voter precincts, to get evangelicals to the polls. "It was very new in terms of ... full-scale investment in this particular demographic," said Gary Marx, who worked under Reed as the Bush-Cheney 2004 national conservative coalition director. "It was the first time in Republican political history that the presidential campaign was run in such a way that this was a formalized element in everything we did, from radio buys to direct mail. ... It was a demographic group that was courted ... just as soccer moms were in 2000 and NASCAR dads in 2002."

Bush-Cheney headquarters sent the names of unregistered churchgoers back to volunteers across the country, who would call their evangelical neighbors and urge them to register. Some volunteers even offered to deliver registration forms and absentee ballots. Asked how many new voters the Bush campaign registered this way, Marx estimated the figure to be "in the range of millions."

Between the efforts of the Bush-Cheney campaign, the RNC, and outside groups like Focus on the Family, Rove nearly met his goal of turning out 4 million more evangelicals in 2004. Exit polls showed that 3.5 million white evangelicals who stayed home in 2000 cast ballots in 2004. Bush also captured a larger share of the evangelical vote in 2004-78 percent-than in 2000, when 68 percent backed him. Between new evangelical voters and those who had voted for Gore in 2000, Bush picked up nearly 6 million new evangelical votes, about twice his margin of victory.

Of course, to the true believers who built Bush's 2004 evangelical voter machine, there was more than demographics at work in his re-election. "Prayer was a hugely important part of the strategy," said Olsen, the Florida chairwoman for social conservative outreach. "I prayed that people not be persuaded by their pocketbooks [at the voting booth] but that ... they voted as if God was to come down and vote."

By April 2004, The John Kerry campaign had hired a born-again Christian and ex-Howard Dean aide named Mara Vanderslice to be its religious outreach director. At that point in the election cycle, Reed had been at work for six months assembling his evangelical outreach machine for President Bush. He had appointed chairpersons for social conservative outreach in battleground states. He had signed up tens of thousands of evangelical volunteers. Reed had begun collecting church directories to sign up new evangelical voters.

Vanderslice's operation inside the Kerry campaign was more modest. It comprised herself, then 29, and an unpaid intern. She had no volunteer lists. Except for Kerry's appearances before African-American congregations, the campaign had resolved to stay out of churches. "They didn't have any vision at all," Vanderslice said of the campaign's religious outreach strategy. "I just kind of had to make it up."

There were six months till Election Day.

Even before Kerry emerged as the Democratic front-runner, he had drawn fire from a handful of Catholic bishops. St. Louis Archbishop Raymond Burke said he would refuse to give Holy Communion to Kerry, a former altar boy and lifelong Catholic, because he was pro-choice. A Colorado Springs bishop went so far as to instruct Catholic voters who backed candidates supportive of abortion rights to forgo Communion.

Kerry was surprised and hurt by the attacks, according to aides. "I've met with many bishops ... on this very subject before and after the campaign," he said after the election. "And key prelates in the church have indicated to me that nowhere in canon law is there any refusal of the Eucharist to a parishioner." Still, Kerry responded swiftly at the time in the news media, expressing his respect for the bishops while affirming his own Catholic commitment and his opposition to "legislating articles of faith."

But beyond Kerry's own reactions in the press, his campaign declined to dispatch credible Catholic figures in his defense or to reach out to Catholics with Kerry's response. The way the story was playing out in the media, it was easy to infer that a rift had opened between Kerry and the Roman Catholic Church he claimed to belong to. "There were many conversations about it, but there was a lot of fear and indecision about how to respond," Vanderslice said. "[N]ot having some backup within the broader Catholic community made [the campaign] even more timid." The Kerry campaign decided to ignore the bishops.

Kerry's privacy. But one of Vanderslice's goals remained getting Kerry to open up about his faith. She noticed that Kerry's appearance at Ronald Reagan's funeral in June 2004, where he crossed himself over Reagan's coffin, went a long way in making religious people comfortable with him. "People were longing to understand ... what was guiding him," Vanderslice said. But Kerry was reluctant to discuss his faith, in contrast to President Bush, whose tale of conversion from drunk to born-again was well known.

It wasn't until 10 days before Election Day that Kerry delivered his so-called faith and values speech. At a stop in Florida, Kerry quoted from all four Gospels and the Ten Commandments. He spoke of how his Catholicism played into his upbringing and his service in the Vietnam War. He explained the Catholic notion of the "common good." The Washington Post called it "perhaps the most overtly religious speech of the campaign by either candidate."

Vanderslice welcomed the speech, but thought it came much too late. She had tried for months to insert religious themes into message development, but was stymied by senior campaign officials. She also felt that Kerry's "faith and values" speech was delivered in the wrong venue: to a largely Jewish audience in Fort Lauderdale, Fla. Vanderslice had long pressed for Kerry to appear in an overtly Christian setting, like an evangelical or Catholic college, but she met with resistance from the campaign.

The Kerry campaign's fears about its religious outreach effort backfiring seemed to be vindicated in June 2004, when the conservative Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights issued a press release attacking Kerry for hiring Vanderslice. It assailed Vanderslice for her involvement with her college's Socialist Alliance and noted her role as an organizer for World Trade Organization and World Bank protests.

After the Catholic League attack, Vanderslice was barred by the Kerry campaign from speaking to the press. She had been hired barely a month earlier. When the Catholic League later criticized the religious outreach director for the Democratic National Committee, that person was silenced as well. The result was that the Democrats' ties to the religious press were completely severed. "Reporters from the religious press ... didn't get their phone calls returned for two or three months," Vanderslice said.

That helps explain why Christianity Today's October 2004 John Kerry profile read like a hatchet job. The magazine noted that the Democratic nominee invoked God's name just once in the three days that its reporter rode aboard the campaign's press plane, and then in a secular context. Denied an interview with Kerry, Christianity Today resorted to citing his 1998 interview with American Windsurfer magazine as a source for "some of his most detailed public comments about his theological ideals." The story skewered Kerry's support for abortion rights and gay rights.

Barred from speaking to the press, Vanderslice focused on organizing grass-roots religious volunteers. The Bush campaign signed up more than 300,000 conservative religious volunteers; Vanderslice worked with a national volunteer list of 700. Rather than actively court volunteers, she simply tried to keep up with the calls and E-mails from religious Kerry supporters. They were requesting everything from bumper stickers and buttons to talking points on why Catholics could support Kerry despite the criticisms he'd received from Catholic bishops.

In addition to losing the evangelical vote by the most lopsided margin on record for a presidential candidate, election returns showed that Kerry became the first Democratic presidential candidate in memory to lose the Catholic vote, despite his own Catholicism.

In the crucial battleground of Ohio, Kerry won only about 1 in 3 weekly churchgoers. Two years later, in the 2006 midterms, successful Ohio Democratic Senate candidate Sherrod Brown would increase his share of weekly churchgoers to 48 percent. Had Kerry done that well among those Ohioans, he'd be in the White House today.

Edwards' Campaign Rides On Iowa (DMR)

By Thomas Beaumont

Des Moines Register, February 26, 2007

If any candidate inherits something from Tom Vilsack's departure from the Democratic presidential campaign, it's John Edwards.

What he gets: Pressure.

The former Iowa governor's campaign hinged on winning his home state's caucuses, the start of a fiercely competitive nominating gauntlet. Vilsack's decision Friday to quit the race shifts much of the burden of expectations in the caucuses to Edwards, the front-runner in early Iowa polls.

"Edwards has as much or more riding on the Iowa's outcome as any of the others," University of Iowa political science professor Peverill Squire said.

The former North Carolina senator's popularity among Iowa party activists has endured since his strong second-place finish in the 2004 caucuses, and survived losing the vice presidency and the entry of new, nationally popular rivals into the 2008 race.

He's not entirely the same Edwards that Iowans remember from his 2004 campaign. He has moved noticeably to the left since then, disavowing his support for the 2002 Senate resolution authorizing military force in Iraq.

He also now embraces a broad policy to provide health care to all Americans after supporting a more incremental approach in 2004.

Edwards' success at recapturing the Iowa momentum that vaulted him to contention in 2004 depends on Iowans' willingness to accept these changes and embrace Edwards, once the fresh face in the field, as a familiar face.

Edwards rejected the idea that Vilsack's withdrawal puts particular pressure on him to win in Iowa.

"It raises expectations for everyone," he said in a Des Moines Register interview Saturday.

"Other candidates might have used it as an excuse for not doing well," he added, referring to Vilsack's presence in the race. "That excuse is now gone."

But almost every poll of likely Democratic caucusgoers in Iowa taken in the past year has shown Edwards on top.

DOJ_NMG_0136185

Whether his early lead in Iowa has been a factor of residual loyalty to his 2004 campaign or Edwards' vigilant attention to Iowa since then, his status as the Iowa front-runner is enhanced by Vilsack's withdrawal, Squire said.

New York Sen. Hillary Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama "could carry on with only a reasonable finish in Iowa," Squire said. "But for Edwards, he really does need to land a knockout blow in Iowa to have the momentum he needs to carry him to the next couple of states."

Edwards has visited Iowa more often than any prospective presidential candidate in either party since the 2004 election.

Edwards' continued commitment to the theme that sparked his rise during the 2004 Iowa campaign is more important to Davenport Democrat Bev Strayhall, an Edwards supporter, than his repeated visits to Iowa over the past two years.

He has continued to hone the message that Americans ought to do more to improve the lives of the poor.

"He didn't just use that as a platform to run. Thank God he kept talking about it because when Katrina hit, people said, 'Oh, yeah. There it is,' " said Strayhall said, referring to the attention the 2005 hurricane shone on poverty in the Gulf Coast.

Edwards left elected office two years ago, after deciding in 2003 not to seek re-election to the U.S. Senate, where he served just one term.

Since then, he has traveled widely to key political states, helping candidates raise money for the 2006 midterm elections and campaigning for ballot initiatives to increase the minimum wage.

Edwards also moved back to North Carolina from Washington, D.C., in 2005 and helped establish a public policy institute at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill that researches poverty's causes and possible remedies.

In November 2005, Edwards wrote an op-ed column for the Washington Post in which he called his support for the resolution a mistake.

As a candidate for president this year, he has broadened his critique of the war to include the Democrat-controlled Congress, calling any action short of ending the war "betrayal."

Edwards' reversal on the war does not discourage Iowa City Democrat Lisa Fender from considering him as her choice in the caucuses.

His stance on the war, which has drawn attention to Clinton's refusal to call her vote a mistake, is a mark of Edwards' "humanity," Fender said.

"Whether it's a political move or not, he's saying he was wrong in plain terms. We want someone to admit when they were wrong, because we don't have that now," she said. "It doesn't suggest weakness. It suggests humility and part of being human."

Fender is undecided about whom she will support in the caucuses, now less than 11 months away. She is weighing Clinton, Edwards and Obama.

Despite Edwards' shifts on the war and health care, he has remained at or near the top of Iowa polls.

One survey in January showed Clinton ahead, while another showed Edwards and Obama tied for the early Iowa lead.

Most polls, however, have resembled one published last week, in which Edwards received support from 24 percent likely Democratic caucusgoers, compared to 18 percent for Clinton and Obama.

It's too early to say whether Edwards will inherit supporters, donors and staff from the defunct Vilsack campaign. He has hired Jennifer O'Malley to run his Iowa campaign. O'Malley was a top Iowa staffer for Edwards in 2004. The campaign expects to add roughly two dozen staff to the Iowa organization in the coming weeks, Edwards advisers said.

A lot can happen in the months before the caucuses, Edwards said. "I think we would expect to be competitive if the caucus were held today, but the caucus is not held today," he said. "We have a long campaign in front of us and I've been through this before."

Gore's Global Warming Doc Wins Oscar (AP)

By Gary Gentile, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 26, 2007

"An Inconvenient Truth," the documentary that turned former vice president Al Gore's power-point presentation on global warming into an engaging and entertaining film, won the Oscar Sunday night.

DOJ_NMG_0136186

The best-documentary win was a triumph for Gore, who has kept a sense of humor about his loss in the 2000 election that was decided in George W. Bush's favor by a U.S. Supreme Court decision.

"I am Al Gore. I used to be the next president of the United States of America," Gore says in the film, repeating a line he has used often.

Sunday, Gore used the Oscar win not to further his political career but to boost his campaign to find solutions for global warming and other environmental problems.

"My fellow Americans," Gore said to laughter from the crowd. "People all over the world, we need to solve the climate crisis. It's not a political issue, it's a moral issue. We have everything we need to get started with the possible will to act. That's a renewable resource. Let's renew it."

Earlier in the evening, Gore and Leonardo DiCaprio took the stage to unveil a series of efforts the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences took to make this year's awards more environmentally friendly.

Pressed by DiCaprio about any other major announcement he might like to make, the former vice president pulled out a statement.

"My fellow Americans, I'm going to take this opportunity right here and now, to formally announce my intentions to ..." Gore said before the orchestra broke in and he walked off, arm-in-arm and laughing, with DiCaprio.

Backstage, Gore put speculation to rest, saying "I do not have plans to become a candidate for office again."

Instead, Gore said he was dedicating all his efforts to pressuring governments to act on climate-crisis issues.

"It is the overriding world challenge of our time," Gore said. "I really hope the decision by the academy to honor the work by director Davis Guggenheim and these producers will convince people who did not go see it before to see the movie and learn about the climate crisis and become a part of the solution."

Party Talk (NY)

New Yorker, February 26, 2007

"Saturday Night Live" is erratic in middle age but rarely cruel. An exception came late last spring, when, at the stroke of eleven-thirty, an NBC announcer gravely told the American people to stand by for a "message from the President of the United States," and Al Gore, surrounded by Oval Office knickknacks, came into focus to deliver what could best be described as an interim report from a parallel, and happier, galaxy. President Gore reviewed some of his actions and their unintended consequences:

In the last six years we have been able to stop global warming. No one could have predicted the negative results of this. Glaciers that once were melting are now on the attack. As you know, these renegade glaciers have already captured parts of upper Michigan and northern Maine. But I assure you: we will not let the glaciers win.

Nor was this the only problem. Although Social Security had been repaired, the cost had been high: the budget surplus was "down to a perilously low eleven trillion dollars." The price of gas had dropped to nineteen cents a gallon, and the oil companies were hurting. ("I know that I am partly to blame by insisting that cars run on trash.") After winning the plaudits of a grateful world—and turning Afghanistan into a premier "spring-break destination"—Americans could no longer risk travelling abroad, for fear of "getting hugged." Even the national pastime was in danger. "But," Gore added hopefully, "I have faith in baseball commissioner George W. Bush when he says, 'We will find the steroid users if we have to tap every phone in America!' "

The cruelty here was not to Gore, who probably requires no prompting to brood now and then about what might have been, but to the audience. It is worse than painful to reflect on how much better off the United States and the world would be today if the outcome of the 2000 election had been permitted to correspond with the wishes of the electorate. The attacks of September 11, 2001, would likely not have been avoided, though there is ample evidence, in the 9/11 Commission report and elsewhere, that Gore and his circle were far more alert to the threat of Islamist terrorism than Bush and his. But can anyone seriously doubt that a Gore Administration would have meant, well, an alternate universe, in which, say, American troops were sent on a necessary mission in Afghanistan but not on a mistaken and misbegotten one in Iraq; the fate of the earth, not the fate of oil-company executives, was the priority of the Environmental Protection Agency; civil liberties and diplomacy were subjects of attention rather than of derision; torture found no place or rationale?

In increasing numbers, poll results imply, Americans are disheartened by the real and existing Presidency, and no small number also feel regret that Gore—the winner in 2000 of the popular vote by more than half a million ballots, the almost certain winner of any reasonable or consistent count in the state of Florida—ended up the target of what it is not an exaggeration to call a judicial coup d'état. Justice Antonin Scalia routinely instructs those who question his vote in Bush v. Gore to stop their ceaseless whinging. "It's water over the deck," he told an audience at Iona College last month. "Get over it." But it is neither possible nor wise to "get over it." The historical damage is too profound.

And yet, despite the burden of injury and injustice, Gore, more than any other major Democratic Party figure, including the many candidates assembled for next year's Presidential nomination, has demonstrated in opposition precisely the quality of judgment that Bush has lacked in office. Gore's critiques of the Administration's rush to war in Iraq and of the deceptions used to justify it were early, brave, and correct. On the issue of climate change, of course, he has exercised visionary leadership. With humor and intelligence, and negligible self-pity, he dispensed with the temptations of political martyrdom and became a global Jeremiah. Beginning in the nineteen-eighties, he waged what was at first a fairly lonely campaign to draw attention to the problem; now, as a popularizing propagandist, he has succeeded in registering it as a crisis with nearly everyone, from field-tripping schoolchildren to reality-dubious members of the Administration. With his documentary film, "An Inconvenient Truth," Gore made the undeniability of the crisis a matter of consensus; thanks largely to him, an environmental issue will be an electoral issue. His secular evangelism has earned him an honored night at the Academy Awards and—almost as glittering—a nomination for the Nobel Peace Prize.

For the moment, Gore has absented himself from the 2008 Presidential race with a deliberately provisional explanation: He has no plans to be a candidate. He doesn't expect to be a candidate. (Or, as he satirized his language for Jay Leno when talking about his future in the movies, "I just want to clarify: I have no plans to do a nude scene. I have no intention to do a nude scene. I don't expect to do a nude scene. But I haven't made a Shermanesque statement about it.")

Gore's reluctance is understandable. The balloting in Iowa and New Hampshire is nearly a year away. He is in no rush. He may have shared Bill Clinton's love of policymaking but not his relish for full-immersion politicking. In the view of former aides still close to him, Gore can't lose by staying on the electoral sidelines. While Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama start competing—warily at first, and then, inevitably, taking direct aim at one another's weaknesses—Gore can stand unbruised, nursing the lingering glamour of his popular margin in 2000 and, perhaps, demanding by quiet inference that we take stock of a distinguished public career that began three decades ago, when Gore was a twenty-eight-year-old Vietnam veteran freshly elected to Congress.

If only to take an honest man's word for it, Gore's entry into the race is unlikely. Clinton, Obama, Bill Richardson, John Edwards, Joseph Biden, Christopher Dodd—the field already provides a pool of talent and a range of possibilities infinitely more encouraging than the status quo. Moreover, the nomination and election of any one of the first three would take America a long way toward keeping the unfulfilled promise of "We the people"—not least because the appeal of all three is based only incidentally upon gender, race, or ethnic heritage.

If the next few months produce an obvious and relatively intact nominee, fine. Gore can stay active in his new role, and perhaps carry that role further, as a kind of climate czar in a Democratic Administration. But, as someone once said, stuff happens. The campaign may get nasty quickly. Clinton's Iraq position may prove untenable in any of its iterations. Obama's youthful charisma may look like inexperience after prolonged exposure to electoral gamesmanship. David Geffen might grow claws. A year is a very long time in politics, especially in the circular shooting contests that the Democrats so often convene.

There will still be Gore, patient and untrammelled. In any case, he will not have embarrassed himself. Post-lock-box, he has developed a keener sense of that. When the writers at "Saturday Night Live" suggested that he take part in a sketch featuring some scatological themes, Gore demurred with a combination of ironic self-preservation and his customary good judgment. "I'm sure this is funny," he said, "but at the end of this I want to have some bread crumbs left leading back to my dignity."

Warner Backs McCain (RC)

DOJ_NMG_0136188

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who has been among the staunchest supporters of President Bush's effort to increase troop levels in Iraq, is set to receive the endorsement of one of the most prominent critics of the "surge" plan.

Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) will announce his support of McCain's 2008 presidential bid today, lending the name of one of the chamber's most respected old bulls to the Republican frontrunner's developing Capitol Hill support.

In a brief interview, Warner, a former Armed Services chairman and one-time secretary of the Navy, cited his long personal history with McCain — as well as the importance of national security issues in the 2008 campaign — as the chief factors that led to his endorsement.

"To me, voters are going to seek out that candidate, be it Republican or Democrat, that's got the proven credentials on issues that concern security abroad and here at home," Warner said.

McCain, a Naval aviator who spent five and a half years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, was released from captivity in 1973 while Warner was serving as Navy Secretary.

Warner recalled that on his trips to Vietnam as secretary, he would stop in Hawaii to be briefed by Adm. John McCain Sr., Sen. McCain's father who was commander in chief of the U.S. Pacific Command at the time.

"Of the people who worked with me in that period ... he was one of the most valued advisers that I had in that intense period of the war," Warner said of the senior McCain. "He was absolutely superb."

In recent weeks, however, Warner has been the chief GOP spokesman in the Senate against Bush's latest Iraq War strategy, going so far as to draft a bipartisan resolution that expressed that opposition.

McCain and his two main rivals for the 2008 GOP nod, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, support the president's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq by 21,500.

But while Warner and McCain have been on opposite ends of the surge debate, the two men have a long history of shared causes.

Warner noted that his "fierce battles" against McCain on the Senate floor only served to boost their mutual respect.

"We've gone toe-to-toe together and we've gone arm-and-arm together," Warner said. "I think that strengthens the relationship."

In the previous Congress, McCain and Warner were instrumental members of the "Gang of 14," which sought to avert a Senate showdown over judicial nominations.

Also, Warner and McCain backed now-Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott's (R-Miss.) leadership bid last fall. Lott is now one of McCain's most active presidential backers.

Last week, McCain's campaign rolled out the endorsements of Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) and Rep. Chip Pickering (R-Miss.), both of whom are close to Lott and are far more conservative than Warner.

While political insiders debate the ultimate worth and impact of Congressional endorsements, McCain's campaign has been steadily adding to its ranks after getting off to what was perceived as a slow start.

Romney was most aggressive out of the gate in January in garnering Hill supporters and some Republican observers have privately speculated that McCain's team was caught off-guard initially.

With the addition of Warner, McCain now has eight backers in the Senate and 17 in the House, with more to come soon. Both Romney's and Giuliani's support is rooted almost entirely in the House.

In a recent interview, McCain acknowledged he has been slow to add Congressional endorsements, saying he's been preoccupied by the Senate debate over Bush's troop proposal. McCain took a leading role in the discussions as one of the top supporters of the plan.

"I am working on it," McCain said of lining up backers. "I've been working so much on Iraq, I haven't had as much time meeting with people. I'll take some time when the Iraq debate dies down a little."

He also said that Congressional endorsements were less about numbers and more about the weight those supporters carry back home.

DOJ_NMG_0136189

While Giuliani has been out front in most public polls that tested the GOP field, McCain's national security credentials, political apparatus and leftover support from his unsuccessful 2000 bid put him first among most political handicappers in the race for the 2008 nod. Still, McCain's thorny relationship with social conservatives remains the biggest wild card in his path to the nomination.

Romney, who is the least-known of all three top contenders, began a TV ad campaign last week to boost his profile.

Meanwhile, McCain also has recently announced the support of several people with ties to Capitol Hill.

Former Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio), who was defeated for re-election last year, will chair McCain's campaign in Ohio and former Sen. Warren Rudman (R-N.H.) will be a co-chairman of his national exploratory committee. DeWine was a member of the Gang of 14 along with McCain.

Last week, McCain also got the backing of Indiana Gov. Mitch Daniels (R), a former Office of Management and Budget director, and moderate Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.).

Intensive Care For RomneyCare (WSJ)

By Sally C. Pipes

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

Presidential hopeful John Edwards recently unveiled a plan for universal health care, proving that the bad idea of raising taxes on employers and forcing individuals to purchase insurance holds bipartisan appeal. Before others get carried away with this model, they should take a look at its most recent manifestation in Massachusetts.

When then-Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, introduced a universal health-insurance plan in the Bay State early last year, it was widely acclaimed. But less than a year after passage, RomneyCare is in the intensive care unit, soon to be wheeled into hospice.

The first signs of trouble appeared last August. In a filing to support general obligation bonds, officials projected that the new plan would increase state government health-care spending by $276.4 million in 2007. That's $151 million more than what the public had been told the plan would cost. Meanwhile, the state's new bureaucracy, busily signing up people for free care, has run into trouble finding affordable plans for those who have to pay. The premiums for subsidized plans would consume up to 6% of a person's income -- prompting calls from activists and echoes from politicians that they should be exempted from the individual mandate. So much for universal coverage.

Reality fully hit in late January of this year, when private insurers submitted bids to the bureaucracy that would administer the new program. The average premium for the unsubsidized plans was not $200 per month -- as Mr. Romney promised from the stump -- but rather $380. That's more than 15% of the target audiences' income -- and for a plan with a $2,000 deductible and a total cost sharing of $5,000. People were stunned, outraged. Naturally, "greedy" private insurers were blamed. Politicians called for price controls.

Interestingly, monthly premiums of $325 were forecast by insurers cited in an April 6, 2006 article in the Boston Globe entitled "Health Bill Premiums May Exceed Prediction." At the time, Romney administration consultant and MIT economist Jonathan Gruber, who helped design the plan and now advises the bureaucracy, dismissed the predictions.

There's a slim chance that the new Democratic governor Deval Patrick and the Democratic legislature will implement this plan and enforce the mandate. But if they do, an individual with a $30,000 income would be on the hook for 32% of his or her income before being fully covered by insurance. Yet there is an equally small chance that the politicians will deregulate the state's insurance market.

Regulators are however settling in comfortably to their jobs, dictating health-insurance design by creating the standards for Minimum Creditable Coverage (MCC) that individuals must meet to avoid paying the fine. If these standards are implemented, they would render illegal roughly 200,000 high-deductible policies currently in force -- exactly the sort of insurance that makes sense for the self-employed and young individuals.

Meanwhile, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has introduced an even more comprehensive plan to guarantee universal coverage. The $12 billion plan includes individual and employer mandates, expansion of Medi-Cal and Healthy

Families, and a tax on doctors and hospitals. If enacted, Californians will face higher taxes, a much larger bureaucracy and increased spending. And I predict the problem of the uninsured will not be solved.

Libertarian Candidate In '88, Paul Eyes GOP Nomination (NH)

By Benjamin Kepple

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 26, 2007

CONCORD – U.S. Rep. Ron Paul, R-Texas, brought his anti-war and limited government message to a gathering of largely like-minded activists here yesterday, and condemned the Republican establishment for forsaking principles it claims to uphold.

Paul, who ran as the Libertarian Party's presidential candidate in 1988, is now exploring a run for the Republican Party's presidential nomination. Should he decide to enter the race, he would prove a long shot at best, and run at a considerable disadvantage in terms of fundraising. The Texas congressman said yesterday he believed his message would garner support from those upset about how the nation is now run.

"The message is always the same - government intrusion into our lives is way too much," said Paul prior to his talk. "I think the Republicans have failed to live up to their commitments to smaller government."

On the national scene, Paul, a physician, largely toils in obscurity, although The Washington Post last year wrote a profile which mentioned his nickname, "Dr. No." This sobriquet referred to Paul's general opposition to spending proposals and other measures he considers outside the government's Constitutional scope.

Paul - who had been in New Hampshire since Thursday - found himself treated like a rock star at yesterday's event, and a couple of hundred people were on hand to hear him speak at the Free State Project's New Hampshire Liberty Forum. About half the 350 people who attended the days-long conference, at the Holiday Inn on North Main Street, were from New Hampshire, organizers said.

Paul, who received a standing ovation before and after his remarks, touched on many points during his address. For instance, he noted his long-standing opposition to the war in Iraq, which he said stemmed from his belief there was no security threat to America and the vote authorizing the war represented an illegal transfer of power to the president. He also called for the United States to withdraw from Iraq.

"The worst thing that could happen to al-Qaeda is for that war to end," Paul said.

Among other issues, Paul also voiced support for abandoning the war on drugs, allowing gold and silver to serve as legal tender, repealing the Seventeenth Amendment €" which lets voters directly elect U.S. Senators €" and ending the practice of withholding taxes from one's pay. Instead, taxpayers would have to actually write checks to pay their taxes, a move Paul figured would soon end what he called the present tax-and-spend philosophy of government.

Yesterday, Paul said he planned to take part in a debate among Republican presidential candidates scheduled for Apr. 4. However, he said he was still unsure about whether he would actually throw his hat into the ring.

"If this exploratory committee doesn't go well, maybe I ought to consider moving here and running (in) a statewide race," Paul said, to cheers.

War Critic Speaks From Heart Of Bush Country (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 26, 2007

KEARNEY, Neb. — Jeff Strong, a recently retired National Guardsman and "rock-ribbed Republican," churned with conflicting emotions as he sat in an auditorium at the University of Nebraska at Kearney, waiting for Sen. Chuck Hagel.

Strong personifies the dilemma for many residents in this state, where President Bush captured two-thirds of the vote in 2004. Strong is uncomfortable with the role Hagel, the state's Republican senior senator, has taken in criticizing Bush's war plans. "I just don't understand how his anti-war rhetoric is helping to stabilize Iraq," said Strong, a postal worker.

Yet Strong is less enthusiastic about Bush, who got his vote two years ago. Hagel, who served in the infantry in Vietnam, gets "the benefit of the doubt because he's been on the ground," Strong said. "The people running the country now, they haven't been on the ground. They haven't suffered. They just played with people's lives."

Such sentiments in this Great Plains community are an indication of the challenge facing Bush as Congress returns this week with more confrontations in store on Iraq.

In the Senate, Democrats will try to revoke the 2002 resolution authorizing the use of force in Iraq. Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, D-Mich., said Sunday on Meet the Press that legislation he is drafting would remove most combat troops from Iraq by next year. In the House, Democrats are working on requirements for equipping and resting troops that would make it harder for Bush to send as many to Iraq as he'd like.

So far, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., has been able to hold the line in the Senate, where it takes 60 votes to move legislation. How long he can continue to do so remains an open question, given doubts that are arising in Bush country.

The president has been enormously popular in Nebraska. Only Utah, Wyoming and Idaho gave him larger margins of victory in the last presidential election. But Hagel has not only emerged as a leading critic of the administration's foreign policy, he's also flirting with running for president next year — possibly on a hybrid ticket that would include a Democrat.

"If I decide to get into this, I would run not just to make a statement," Hagel, 60, said in an interview last week.

He said that if he ran he would seek the Republican nomination. Yet he's also talking up Unity08. That's a plan by a bipartisan group of political operatives to draft a bipartisan presidential ticket on the Internet and offer voters an alternative to the Democratic and Republican candidates next year.

"I think it's a very intriguing enterprise," Hagel said. He said most Americans are disenchanted with the major political parties.

Despite his own stated misgivings, Hagel voted with 76 other senators in October 2002 to give Bush the authority to go to war in Iraq. He said he did so after being assured by the president and his advisers that "he was going to use that leverage to get the diplomatic effort on track."

Since then, Hagel has become a prominent critic of Bush's policies in Iraq and the Middle East generally. This culminated in an impassioned speech last month in a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing when he challenged his colleagues to take a stand on a resolution he co-sponsored disapproving of the president's planned troop increase in Iraq. "If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes," he said.

When his resolution hit the floor of the Senate, Hagel voted first against and then for allowing the debate to proceed. The first vote was an act of party loyalty, he said. He wanted to give Senate GOP leader McConnell negotiating leverage to win a vote on a separate resolution expressing opposition to cutting funds for troops in Iraq.

Hagel acknowledged that the vote McConnell was seeking was intended to "embarrass the other party," but argued, "Why not have the debate that we all say we want, let the resolutions come, let them be debated and let the American people sort it out?"

When it appeared that wasn't going to happen, he and other Republican war critics switched their votes, but the effort to force debate on a resolution of disapproval still fell four votes short of 60.

In Nebraska last week, Hagel warned that Bush's troop increase will plunge U.S. soldiers into "a vat of chaos." In his speech at Kearney, Hagel turned his attention to Iran and accused the administration of blowing a chance to win a "pro-American generation" of young Iranians. Instead of saber rattling over Iran's nuclear ambitions, Hagel said, the administration should open a consulate in Tehran.

Hagel has irked the White House. "I believe firmly in Ronald Reagan's '11th Commandment': Thou shalt not speak ill of a fellow Republican," Vice President Cheney told Newsweek magazine in an interview this month. "But it's very hard sometimes to adhere to that where Chuck Hagel is involved."

At home, however, Hagel seems to be paying no great political price for his apostasy. While there have been some angry letters to the editor of the Omaha World-Herald, no Republican has emerged to challenge Hagel next year, when he will be up for election to a third term.

In fact, Republican leaders ranging from McConnell to Nebraska Gov. Dave Heineman to the state GOP chairman, Mark Quandahl, say they want Hagel to run again.

Hagel's continued popularity in Republican circles is in part a reflection of his work at shoring up his base. Quandahl said the senator has been "very helpful" in recruiting candidates and raising money for the party. It may also be a sign that more Nebraskans are beginning to share Hagel's Iraq concerns.

Bob Lucas, a private investigator who attended Hagel's speech in Kearney, supported Bush in the 2004 election but said "I'm not sure I do now." Bush is "too rigid" in his foreign policy, Lucas said. "I agree with Hagel that talking with people doesn't cost anything."

The state's Republican governor, a longtime Hagel friend, said his constituents tend to be more tolerant of criticism when it comes from a Vietnam War vet. Hagel brings "an unusual insight that needs to be respected," Heineman said.

Heineman acknowledged that more Nebraskans are questioning the president. Nevertheless, Hagel "has lost a lot of support out here, no question about it," he said. "There's a lot of nervousness. A lot of people don't want to lose this war and yet, the concern is, is there a way to win it?"

Which 2008 Candidates Are Most Web Savvy? (NSWK)

By Daren Briscoe

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

In the early race for 2008, most national polls have Hillary Clinton thumping Democratic rival Barack Obama by double digits. But the junior senator from Illinois can take comfort in at least one tally: MySpace, apparently, is Obama country. About 48,000 members of the wildly popular social-networking site have added Obama to their online profiles as a "friend," while only 25,000 have "friended" Clinton. It may seem a trivial statistic. But to the political junkies who run techPresident.com, a new "group blog" that obsessively follows how the presidential campaign is playing on the Internet, no Web trend is too small to track.

Micah Sifry, the site's cofounder and editor, says he's trying to make sense of "how candidates are using the Web and how the Web is using them." A lot has changed since the 2004 campaign, when Howard Dean helped pioneer a new kind of Net politicking, creating an online community of supporters that ultimately brought in $27 million and redefined campaign fund-raising. Now all candidates—drawn by the Web's potential to help get their message out, yet leery of its ability to magnify the smallest mistake—are Web savvy. (Or at least they hire people who are.) Sifry is trying to make sense of it: "We want to be an interpreter, to help people understand how the Internet is changing politics on a daily basis."

The trick is doing that without being accused of being a stooge for one side or the other. TechPresident's stable of bloggers includes Zephyr Teachout, the Internet director of Dean's 2004 campaign, and Mike Turk, the e-campaign director for Bush-Cheney 2004. Sifry, a former political reporter for the left-wing Nation magazine, forbids techPresident bloggers from making "partisan" arguments. "If we have a bias, it's toward making campaigns to make smarter use of the Web," he says. (TechPresident is financed by cofounder Andrew Rasiej and doesn't pay bloggers.) In recent posts, the site critiqued a photo of Bill and Hillary Clinton in a fund-raising e-mail (too much Bill, not enough Hill); praised John Edwards for linking to 24 different social-networking sites on his homepage ("I like the spaghetti tactic—let's throw it all at the wall and see what sticks."); and chided the major Republican candidates for not having a single, candidate-created MySpace profile among them ("The No. 1 most popular watering hole," wrote David All, a "modern media" consultant for Republican candidates. "I guess I just see things a little bit differently."). In addition to the blogs, the site also features a tracker tallying how often candidates are mentioned in the blogosphere and a daily digest of what other sites on the Web are saying about online campaigning.

And prominently displayed on the homepage is that up-to-the-minute scorecard of nearly all of the presidential candidates' MySpace friends. The Republican hopeful with the most pals—2,757, as of last Friday—is Ron Paul, a GOP Texas congressman who's running for president. Sifry says the MySpace numbers mean ... something, though it's unclear if a candidate's online friends will cast real-world votes. "It is a measure of enthusiasm," he says. "It's the world live Web now, and it reflects the conversations people are having around the digital water cooler." Such as: who, exactly, is this Ron Paul guy?

Presidential candidates have the opportunity to set the national agenda by bringing forward new proposals and innovative policies. Some do this: Bill Clinton in 1992, George W. Bush in 2000. Others don't. Like most or all of the 2008 candidates. Click through their websites, and what you find is pretty thin gruel.

Especially so from the two leading in the polls. Hillary Rodham Clinton's home page links to her recent Senate speech on Iran, but not her 2002 speech backing the Iraq war resolution. She calls for putting "some of the oil industry's windfall profits into a fund that would help develop practical new sources of renewable energy," but with no details. You might find out more by clicking on her "Let the Conversation Begin" webcasts. Rudy Giuliani tells you even less. His exploratory committee website has an account of his work as mayor of New York. But I could find nothing on what he would do as president.

John McCain's website makes some interesting points. As president he would "use the veto pen" on pork and earmarks. The section on "human dignity and the sanctity of life" mentions his opposition to abortion for many years and to funding embryonic stem cell research: a reminder to cultural conservatives that he's been on their side, though he has seldom talked about it. For Iraq he wants a "more robust counterinsurgency strategy"-which seems to be under way now. Barack Obama's issue positions seem to be taken more or less intact from his senatorial website. He cites his work with various Republican senators on important issues. He wants government to assume domestic autoworkers' healthcare costs if they invest half in fuel-efficient technology, and he promises more "resources" to teachers: something for the United Auto Workers and the teachers unions.

John Edwards provides more detail. He wants withdrawal from Iraq "within 12-18 months," plus direct talks with Iran and Syria and a regional peace conference. Would Israel be invited? Variety reported (and Edwards denied) that he told a Hollywood crowd an attack by Israel on Iran was the greatest threat to world peace. He calls for universal health insurance through requiring employer coverage, expanding Medicaid, "reform[ing] insurance," and restricting drug ads. Eliminating poverty, his trademark theme in 2004, gets one paragraph. Mitt Romney has an Issue Watch tab, with single-paragraph discussions of eight issues and multiple recent Romney quotes. He calls for "address[ing] entitlement programs" and universal health insurance "through market reforms."

Rest of the pack. Single-digit candidates' websites vary. Mike Huckabee has a four-word slogan and a YouTube link. Duncan Hunter discusses border security, trade, and the war on terrorism. Joe Biden has a few paragraphs on 10 issues (with Afghanistan and Darfur treated as one issue). Chris Dodd identifies six issues but has single paragraphs on only four so far. Jim Gilmore reports on his record as governor of Virginia. John Cox, a Chicago-area accountant who ran for the Senate in 2004, wants lower spending, calls global warming "overblown," and stresses his opposition to abortion.

Some offer more. Bill Richardson invites you to sign a petition for diplomacy with Iran and has one-paragraph takes on seven issues. Dennis Kucinich's front page is mostly about Iraq but has links to long comments on 10 issues from healthcare to the Patriot Act. Mike Gravel highlights his opposition to the Iraq war and his proposals for national initiative elections. Sam Brownback mentions issues he's taken the lead on (human rights, Darfur) and calls for a $5,000 tax credit for rural first-time home buyers. Tom Tancredo starts with immigration, his signature issue, but provides some detail on 10 others (he's for a flat tax or national sales tax).

Yes, it's early yet. The candidates haven't had time to get issue shops up and running. Clinton and Bush got started much later in the 1992 and 2000 cycles. But so far, candidates have told us very little about where they think the world is headed and what we should do about it. And they've shown us little to indicate that they've thought seriously about governance and long-term problems like Social Security and Medicare. Let's hope they do better as they make their way through Iowa's 99 counties and New Hampshire's 234 cities and towns.

Cole Ponders Change Of Course (RC)

By Nicole Duran And David M. Drucker

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Cole (Okla.) believes a strategy combining the “all races are local” mantra of his predecessor with the nationalized campaign Democrats employed is the way to undo the drubbing the GOP took at the polls this past year.

DOJ_NMG_0136194

This cycle the NRCC will spread the wealth among consultants and pollsters, giving political professionals inside and outside the Beltway a crack at consulting contracts, Cole said Friday. Cole did not disavow the localized approach to House races preferred by former NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), but said his 2008 plan will include key elements of a nationalized campaign.

"The 'you have a national campaign or a local campaign' is a false dichotomy," Cole said by telephone from Oklahoma. "There's no question that good campaigns address both things. I tell our members: 'Know your locality, but also you are going to have to address the big national issues.'"

Cole already has eschewed Reynolds' tactic of playing in the occasional Republican primary. He built his own team and generally snubbed top Reynolds' aides, which made clear he is abandoning the mind-set that recently prevailed at the NRCC. Saying 2008 "unquestionably will be a national election," Cole is adjusting the committee's governing political strategy.

Where Reynolds only strayed from "all races are local" in those House districts where the big national issues were of most concern to voters, Cole espouses splitting the difference, running all campaigns with one eye on the national and one eye on the local.

"It's really about crafting the right message and finding the right balance," said Cole, a political consultant by trade before being elected to Congress in 2002.

According to one Republican strategist with knowledge of how the NRCC was run during the 2004 and 2006 cycles, Reynolds did rely on national issues when necessary.

Meanwhile, Cole is reviewing the NRCC's past dealings with political consultants, media firms and pollsters and studying their work product. Some of it was quite good, he said, while some of it needs to be revisited.

Whom Cole chooses to conduct polling, produce direct-mail pieces, television ads and provide general consulting for the committee, could say the most about which strategic direction he will go. In particular, pollsters wield a lot of influence and affect committee tactics the most.

But the Oklahoma Republican — who retains a financial interest in his old consulting firm, Cole Hargrave Snodgrass & Associates — has yet to sign up any firms, and he is in no hurry to do so.

"We're going to try and spread the work around more broadly," he said. "That's no reflection on the people who have done it, but we just think with the number of competitive races we expect to see this cycle, we need to have a big enough range of people so they aren't overloaded."

As Cole makes changes, Republican consultants are debating the merits of the "all-races-are-local" path the GOP tread since the 1998 cycle, in light of House Democrats' 30-seat pickup last year.

Some, citing a shifting media environment and the television viewing habits of voters, contend that the day of the localized House race — even in a non-wave election — is over.

But others, echoing Reynolds, former Republican National Republican Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman and White House strategist Karl Rove, say each district must be handled separately, with Republican candidates campaigning on national or local issues according to what is likely to be the most effective.

Glen Bolger, a Republican consultant who specializes in House races, cautioned against reading too much into the results of the 2006 elections, which most political professionals say was unique.

"I think it's a little bit of a stretch to say this is the end of local politics. All politics has never been local, but it's not all going to be national, either," Bolger said. "It depends on how contentious or polarized the national environment is. When it's less controversial, there will be more of a default to local politics."

The Republican strategist with knowledge of the NRCC under Reynolds said the committee this past year relied on national issues to win races in campaigns where the Democratic candidate did not have a voting record that could be exploited.

In those cases, Republicans relied on poll-tested attack lines that the Democratic candidate would raise taxes or be weak on border security.

"Localizing is code for giving the people in that district a reason to disqualify your opponent," this strategist said. "If [the NRCC] had better issues to talk about in that district, it did."

DOJ_NMG_0136195

David Dixon of the Democratic Dixon/Davis Media Group said Democrats will continue to beat the GOP in Congressional elections if the Republican candidates seem detached from the bigger picture, as he believes many appeared to be last year.

"Candidates needed to acknowledge there was a scandal, they didn't have to do 'mea culpa' ads but there was no communication from their side even recognizing there was a problem," Dixon said.

As to the NRCC's reliance on tried and true messages, Dixon said voters eventually want to hear something new.

"They went to the well on abortion and gay marriage too many times — they used those issues like doctors use antibiotics to treat children's ear infections, but sometimes the arithromycin stops working."

Special Set (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) has asked that June 19 be the date for a special election to fill the 10th district seat of Rep. Charlie Norwood (R), who died Feb. 13.

State Sens. Ralph Hudgens (R) and Jim Whitehead (R) have emerged as the early frontrunners in the race for the Augusta-based seat, which leans heavily toward Republicans.

Both men will have to relinquish their state legislative seats once they qualify to run in the special election under Georgia law. Georgia Secretary of State Karen Handel (R) has agreed to set the qualifying date for the Congressional election after the current session of the General Assembly concludes, allowing Hudgens and Whitehead to continue to serve through the end of the session.

Several Democrats have said they are contemplating running in the special election. If no candidate gets more than 50 percent in the all-party June special election, a runoff between the top two vote-getters, regardless of party, will be held on July 17.

Another Conservative May Challenge Gilchrest (RC)

By Josh Kurtz

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

A conservative Maryland state Senator is taking steps to challenge Rep. Wayne Gilchrest in the 2008 Republican primary, though he said Friday that he has not completely decided whether to make the race.

State Sen. Andrew Harris said he has thought about challenging the Congressman for several months and was leaning against it until two weeks ago, when Gilchrest joined 16 other House Republicans in voting for a resolution that criticized President Bush's proposal to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

"That has changed the calculus a little bit," Harris said.

Gilchrest easily turned back conservative challengers in 2002 and 2004, but Harris, the sole physician in the state Senate, could be more formidable because he is no stranger to tough races.

He was elected to the state Senate in 1998 by ousting the sitting Minority Leader, a moderate, in the GOP primary. Last fall, he beat back an expensive general election challenge in his Baltimore County district from the president of the Maryland State Teachers Association, whose campaign was fueled by labor support.

Harris also has collected chits throughout the 1st district, which spans both sides of the Chesapeake Bay, by campaigning for Republican candidates for legislative and local offices in 2006.

But Harris conceded that Gilchrest remains a difficult target. Even though conservative groups routinely criticize him, the unassuming former teacher and house painter remains a popular figure in his district.

Although he is not a prodigious fundraiser, Gilchrest began 2007 with $308,000 in his campaign account, after spending just $178,000 on his 2006 re-election, which he won with 69 percent of the vote. Harris, who would not have to sacrifice his Senate seat to run for Congress, said he spent about $250,000 on his own re-election last year and estimated that he would need $750,000 to beat Gilchrest.

Both Gilchrest's chief of staff and communications director could not be reached for comment by press time Friday. But Chris Baron, a spokesman for the Republican Main Street Partnership, a national group that aids GOP centrists, said Gilchrest's reputation as “an independent fighter” with a strong record on taxes, the environment and agriculture should serve him well in a primary with Harris.

“He’s somebody who we think is a good fit for his district,” Baron said.

Still, Harris said he detected a restlessness among Republican voters in Maryland that could accrue to his benefit, especially since the Iraq vote. He called Gilchrest wrong on economic policies, social issues and the Iraq War, and said Republicans want a more faithful conservative in a district that gave Bush 62 percent of the vote in 2004.

“I just don’t understand how Congressman Gilchrest didn’t get the message from the last election that Republicans are supposed to return to their base,” Harris said. “A district as Republican as the 1st Congressional district should elect as conservative a Republican as we can.”

Harris said he would spend the next several weeks meeting with interest groups and attending local Republican meetings before deciding whether to run. He could be aided by several national organizations, including the Victory Caucus, a new group put together by conservative talk show hosts dedicated to defeating the 17 House Republicans who opposed the troop surge, and the Club for Growth, the anti-tax group.

Last year, Gilchrest was listed as 212th of 232 Republican House Members when it came to supporting club priorities, and the group’s political action committee has worked against Gilchrest in the past.

In 2002, the club endorsed David Fischer, a lawyer and political neophyte who took just 36 percent of the vote in his primary challenge against Gilchrest. Later that year, the club sent Gilchrest a check for the general election — which he refused to deposit and has kept as a souvenir.

Two years later, the club stayed out when another conservative state Senator, Richard Colburn (R), took just 38 percent of the primary vote against Gilchrest.

Club President Pat Toomey, a former Pennsylvania Congressman, said the group is aware of Harris but has not yet had a conversation with him.

“We’ll just have to see how it develops,” Toomey said.

Farrakhan In Speech: 'My Time Is Up' (AP)

By Jeff Karoub, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 26, 2007

Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan was greeted by cheers, tears and chants from tens of thousands as he returned to the public eye just long enough to say he would be leaving it soon.

Farrakhan, who ceded leadership duties last year because of illness, spoke for nearly two hours Sunday. Looking healthy and fit, he credited the prayers of millions from all walks of life for allowing him to take the stage at Detroit's Ford Field.

His vitality seemed at odds with his message, that his time left in the spotlight was short.

"My time is up," the 73-year-old Farrakhan said, describing his exit from leadership. "I believe ... that my time to be with my spiritual father and his sender has come. And your time to go through serious trial has come."

The topic of the speech was "One Nation Under God." But Farrakhan said the world is at war because Christians, Muslims and people of other faiths are divided.

Farrakhan said Jesus Christ and the Prophet Muhammad would embrace each other with love if they were on the stage behind him.

"Our lips are full of praise, but our hearts are far removed from the prophets we all claim," he said. "That's why the world is in the shape that it's in."

The leader of 1995's Million Man March said he is leaving at a time of great conflict, citing the war in Iraq specifically, and he believes God is angry with leaders who are putting politics and greed above service to others. He predicted "the fall of the great Babylon, the United States of America."

He said President Bush should be impeached or at least censured for his "wicked policies," and urged young people to avoid joining a military that will have them "leave one way and come back another."

DOJ_NMG_0136197

The speech at the home of the National Football League's Detroit Lions capped the Nation's three-day convention in the city where it was founded in 1930.

The downtown venue was not filled to capacity, but seats on the field and in the lower levels of the 65,000-seat stadium were packed.

Anita Baker performed two songs before Farrakhan took the stage and speakers from various religious and ethnic groups welcomed him. Among those on the stage behind him were U.S. Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich.; Russell Simmons, hip-hop pioneer and entrepreneur; and Joe Shirley Jr., Navajo Nation president.

The annual convention, usually held in Chicago, honors Nation founder Wallace D. Fard, who attracted black Detroiters on the margins of society with a message of self-improvement and separation from whites. Fard said whites were inherently evil because of their enslavement of blacks.

The Nation of Islam, which promotes black empowerment and nationalism, was rebuilt by Farrakhan in the late 1970s after W.D. Mohammed, the son of longtime leader Elijah Mohammed, moved his followers toward mainstream Islam.

Farrakhan became notorious for calling Judaism a "gutter religion" and suggesting crack cocaine might have been a CIA plot to enslave blacks. He met with foreign leaders at odds with the United States — Moammar Gadhafi, Fidel Castro and Saddam Hussein — prompting the State Department in 1996 to accuse him of "cavorting with dictators."

Farrakhan, who embraced W.D. Mohammed on stage in 2000 after years of discord, has credited his steps toward reconciliation to what he called a "near death" experience related to prostate cancer, which he began battling in 1991.

Detroiter Che-Lin Aldridge, who described herself as spiritual but not a member of the Nation, welcomed Farrakhan and what he had to say.

"This message is something everybody needs to hear — a message that's universal," Aldridge said. "What he said was critical for our lives today."

Farrakhan recalled the story of the final message delivered by the Prophet Muhammad, who was dying at the time. "Within 80 days ... he expired," Farrakhan said.

"I don't see expiration for me," he said, "but I do see exaltation."

A Necessary Vaccine (NYT)

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

Debate over a new vaccine to prevent cervical cancer and genital warts has reached a high pitch. State legislatures are debating whether to mandate the vaccine or insist that its use be kept voluntary. The manufacturer stopped a vigorous lobbying campaign lest it provoke more opposition than support. And some health professionals who had been championing the vaccine flinched at making it mandatory, at least for now.

Even so, state legislatures should require that all young girls be given this vaccine, which protects against a virus that causes some 10,000 new cases of cervical cancer in the United States each year — and 3,700 cancer deaths.

Three weeks ago we applauded Gov. Rick Perry for making Texas the first state to require vaccinating young schoolgirls — ages 11 and 12 — against the human papillomavirus. In the ensuing uproar, the Texas House has moved to overturn his order, but the Virginia Legislature has approved a similar mandate. Some 20 states have bills pending to require the vaccinations for school attendance.

We have endorsed a mandate because the vaccine — Merck's Gardasil — looks highly effective against strains that cause 70 percent of all cervical cancer. With more than two million doses already distributed, the reported side effects have been mostly minor, such as dizziness or fainting. Many parents who oppose a mandate are aghast at the thought of vaccinating such young girls against a sexually transmitted disease. But the vaccine works only if taken before a girl becomes infected. Social conservatives object that the vaccine will encourage promiscuity, but it seems farfetched to believe that protection from cervical cancer will change any girl's behavior. Others complain that a mandate will pre-empt parental rights to make health decisions, but all vaccine mandates do that, to protect the children and those they might infect.

The strongest arguments against moving ahead quickly tend to be practical and financial. States have typically used school mandates for vaccines that are already in wide use, and it is possible that unexpected side effects could emerge (though any mandate could be suspended if that happened). Health professionals also need to be certain that there are stable supplies, adequate insurance coverage, ample public money to vaccinate low-income children and physician support.

Merck deserves praise for developing Gardasil at a time when many companies shun the vaccine business as risky and unprofitable. But it is charging $360 for a three-dose regimen, a price that might come down if a competing vaccine enters the market soon, as expected.

The vaccine could prevent thousands of new cases of cervical cancer annually and hundreds of thousands of cases of genital warts and precancerous growths. A mandate would force the health care system to get cracking. And it is the best way to ensure that all children get the vaccine, not just those who are aware of it and can afford it.

Bush To Warn Pakistan To Act On Terror (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25 — President Bush has decided to send an unusually tough message to one of his most important allies, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, the president of Pakistan, warning him that the newly Democratic Congress could cut aid to his country unless his forces become far more aggressive in hunting down operatives with Al Qaeda, senior administration officials say.

The decision came after the White House concluded that General Musharraf is failing to live up to commitments he made to Mr. Bush during a visit here in September. General Musharraf insisted then, both in private and public, that a peace deal he struck with tribal leaders in one of the country's most lawless border areas would not diminish the hunt for the leaders of Al Qaeda and the Taliban or their training camps.

Now, American intelligence officials have concluded that the terrorist infrastructure is being rebuilt, and that while Pakistan has attacked some camps, its overall effort has flagged.

"He's made a number of assurances over the past few months, but the bottom line is that what they are doing now is not working," one senior administration official who deals often with South Asian issues said late last week. "The message we're sending to him now is that the only thing that matters is results."

Democrats, who took control of Congress last month, have urged the White House to put greater pressure on Pakistan because of statements from American commanders that units based in Pakistan that are linked to the Taliban, Afghanistan's ousted rulers, are increasing their attacks into Afghanistan.

For the time being, officials say, the White House has ruled out unilateral strikes against the training camps that American spy satellites are monitoring in North Waziristan, in Pakistan's tribal areas on the border. The fear is that such strikes would result in what one administration official referred to as a "shock to the stability" of General Musharraf's government.

General Musharraf, a savvy survivor in the brutal world of Pakistani politics, knows that the administration is hesitant to push him too far. If his government collapses, it is not clear who would succeed him or who would gain control over Pakistan's arsenal of nuclear weapons.

But the spread of Al Qaeda in the tribal areas threatens to undermine a central element of Mr. Bush's argument that he is succeeding in the administration's effort to curb terrorism. The bomb plot disrupted in Britain last summer, involving plans to hijack airplanes, has been linked by British and American intelligence agencies to camps in the Pakistan-Afghan border areas.

General Musharraf has told American officials that Pakistani military operations in the tribal areas in recent years so alienated local residents that they no longer provide the central government with quality intelligence about the movements of senior Islamic militants.

Congressional Democrats have threatened to review military assistance and other aid to Pakistan unless they see evidence of aggressive attacks on Al Qaeda. The House last month passed a measure linking future military aid to White House certification that Pakistan "is making all possible efforts to prevent the Taliban from operating in areas under its sovereign control."

Pakistan is now the fifth-largest recipient of American aid. Mr. Bush has proposed $785 million in aid to Pakistan in his new budget, including $300 million in military aid to help Pakistan combat Islamic radicalism in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0136199

The rumblings from Congress give Mr. Bush and his top advisers a way of conveying the seriousness of the problem, officials said, without appearing to issue a direct threat to the proud Pakistani leader themselves.

"We think the Pakistani aid is at risk in Congress," said the senior official, who declined to speak on the record because the subject involved intelligence matters.

The administration has sent a series of emissaries to see the Pakistani leader in recent weeks, including the new secretary of defense, Robert M. Gates. Mr. Gates was charged with prompting more action in a region in which American forces operate with great constraints, if they are allowed in at all.

"This is not the type of relationship where we can order action," said an administration official involved in discussions over Pakistan policy. "We can strongly encourage."

Relations between General Musharraf and Mr. Bush have always been tense, as the Pakistani leader veers between his need for American support and protection and his awareness that many Pakistani people — and the intelligence service — have strong sympathies for Al Qaeda and the resurgent Taliban. Officials involved with the issue describe the current moment between the leaders as especially fraught.

Mr. Bush was deeply skeptical of the deal General Musharraf struck with the tribal leaders last year, fearing that it would limit the government's powers to intercede in what Mr. Bush has called the "wild west" of Waziristan, administration officials said at the time.

During his visit to Washington last fall, General Musharraf said the agreement he signed with tribal leaders, giving them greater sovereignty in the region, had "three bottom lines." He said one was "no Al Qaeda activities in our tribal agencies or across the border in Afghanistan." The second was "no Taliban activity" in the same areas. And the third was "no Talibanization," which he described as "obscurantist thoughts or way of life."

American intelligence officials have made an assessment that senior Qaeda leaders in Pakistan have re-established significant control over their global network and are training operatives in some of the camps for strikes on Western targets.

One American official familiar with intelligence reports about Pakistan said intelligence agencies had established "clear linkages" between the Qaeda camps and the plot to blow up trans-Atlantic flights that was thwarted last August. American analysts said the recent trials of terrorism suspects in Britain showed that some defendants had been trained in Pakistan.

American officials say one reason General Musharraf agreed to pull government troops back to their barracks in North Waziristan and allow tribal leaders greater control over security was to give him time to rebuild his intelligence network in the border region gradually.

Rice: Pakistan Must Control Border Area (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, February 26, 2007

The White House is pressuring Pakistan to crack down on al-Qaida and Taliban operatives in the lawless border area with Afghanistan that President Bush recently said was "wilder than the Wild West."

The move comes amid growing concern in Congress and the administration that terrorist forces are regrouping in the border area and preparing for a spring offensive in Afghanistan.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday the administration was concerned that al-Qaida was attempting to stage a comeback.

"I don't doubt that al-Qaida has tried to regenerate some of its leadership," Rice said on ABC's "This Week." "I don't doubt that. I don't think that anybody would claim that this is the same organization or the same kind of organization that operated out of Afghanistan.

"But we have to be vigilant, and that's why we are working with the Pakistanis, we are working with the Afghans, we're working worldwide in our intelligence network to continue to degrade this institution, this organization worldwide and on the Afghan border," the secretary said.

Pakistan's border regions have long been suspected to be the hiding places for al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri. Pakistan, an Islamic country, is one of the biggest beneficiaries of U.S. foreign aid.

DOJ_NMG_0136200

Rice, asked whether Musharraf was constrained in how tough he could be, said, "I'm certainly aware that there are political issues in Pakistan. To not say that would be not to face reality."

But she said Musharraf has been "a stalwart fighter" and himself a target of al-Qaida assassination attempts.

"And the Pakistani leadership knows that al-Qaida would like nothing better than to destabilize Pakistan and to use Pakistan as the base rather than Afghanistan for its operations," Rice said. "And so we have excellent cooperation with the Pakistanis on hunting down al-Qaida, on working to disrupt its network. More al-Qaida have been caught in Pakistan and in Saudi Arabia than any other place in the world.

"And so they are working very hard with us," the secretary said. "We have excellent cooperation on that.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates, earlier this month, traveled to Pakistan for talks with Musharraf, about the terrorist traffic across its border into Afghanistan. Recent sharp criticism of Pakistan's porous border has triggered angry denials from Musharraf.

Asked whether he had talked with Pakistan President Gen. Pervez Musharraf about the hunt for al-Qaida fugitive Osama bin Lden, Gates said he would not "get into specifics" about their talks.

But, said Gates, "If I were Osama bin Laden, I'd keep looking over my shoulder."

No 'Brakes' On Iran Nuclear Effort (WP/AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 25 -- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Sunday that his country's disputed nuclear program was like a train "without brakes" or a reverse gear, prompting Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to respond that Iran needs "a stop button."

The comments came as senior officials representing Germany and the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council -- the United States, Britain, France, China and Russia -- prepared to meet in London on Monday to discuss increasing international pressure on Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment program.

The International Atomic Energy Agency last week reported that Iran had ignored a U.N. Security Council ultimatum to freeze the enrichment program and instead had expanded it by setting up hundreds of centrifuges. Iran has repeatedly refused to halt enrichment as a precondition to negotiations about the program.

"The train of the Iranian nation is without brakes and a rear gear," state radio quoted Ahmadinejad as telling a gathering of Muslim clerics. "We dismantled the rear gear and brakes of the train and threw them away some time ago."

He also repeated his call for further negotiations, saying the time for "bullying" had expired.

Rice responded by saying, "They don't need a reverse gear. They need a stop button." She also told "Fox News Sunday" that Iran needs "to stop enriching and reprocessing, and then we can sit down and talk about whatever is on Iran's mind."

"I've said that I am prepared to meet my counterpart or an Iranian representative at any time if Iran will suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities. That should be a clear signal," she added.

Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel, but further enrichment makes it suitable for use in building a bomb. The United States and its allies fear that Iran is using its nuclear program in an effort to produce atomic weapons, an allegation Iran denies, saying its aim is solely to generate electricity.

In December, the Security Council imposed limited sanctions on Iran over its refusal to suspend enrichment and gave it 60 days to halt enrichment. The deadline expired Wednesday.

Meanwhile, in Pakistan, seven Muslim nations warned of a "dangerous escalation of tension" over Iran's nuclear program and urged that the standoff be resolved diplomatically rather than by force.

The statement came after ministers from Egypt, Indonesia, Jordan, Malaysia, Saudi Arabia, Turkey and Pakistan met to seek ways to resolve Middle East conflicts, including the Iran issue.

Rice Offers Iran Conditional Talks (USAT)

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday that the United States would hold direct talks with Iran if the Islamic republic suspended its nuclear program. "I am prepared to meet my counterpart or an Iranian representative at any time if Iran will suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities. That should be a clear signal," Rice said on Fox News Sunday.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad pledged to continue enriching uranium. He likened the country's nuclear program to a train without a reverse gear or brakes.

Diplomats from the five permanent United Nations Security Council members and Germany were to meet today in London. They planned to discuss what steps to take to increase international pressure on Iran to cooperate with U.N. demands to halt its nuclear program.

Cheney visits Oman; plane experiences electrical glitch

Vice President Cheney arrived Sunday in Oman, an oil-rich U.S. ally in the Middle East that allows the United States to use four air bases.

An Omani government official told the Associated Press that Cheney was to discuss regional security issues, including the U.S. standoff with Iran over its nuclear program. The official, in the capital, Muscat, spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the news media. A U.S. Embassy spokesman in Oman declined to detail Cheney's plans or the focus of his visit.

Earlier Sunday, Cheney's plane experienced "an electrical problem involving a generator, but no safety issue," White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore said. "The plane is fine." She said the problem was fixed during a planned stop in Singapore. Cheney left Australia after a three-day visit to thank the government for contributing troops to Iraq and Afghanistan. He had earlier visited Japan and Guam.

Rice Says She'd Meet With Iran (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday that the U.S. would hold direct talks with Iran if it suspended its nuclear program. Iran's president, however, pledged to move ahead with enrichment activity that Washington contends masks weapons development.

"I am prepared to meet my counterpart or an Iranian representative at any time if Iran will suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities. That should be a clear signal," Rice said in Washington.

Earlier, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad compared his nation's nuclear program to a train without a reverse gear or brakes. "We dismantled the rear gear and brakes of the train and threw them away some time ago," he was quoted on the radio as telling Muslim clerics.

Rice, in response, said that the Iranians "don't need a reverse gear. They need to stop and then we can come to the table and we can talk about how to move forward."

The International Atomic Energy Agency said Thursday that Iran had ignored a United Nations Security Council mandate to freeze its uranium enrichment program and had expanded the program by setting up hundreds of centrifuges.

A council resolution adopted Dec. 23 penalized Tehran and warned of further punishment if it did not comply.

Diplomats from the five permanent Security Council members and Germany planned to meet in London today to begin discussing what steps to take to increase international pressure on Tehran to cooperate.

US Renews Offer Of Talks With Iran (AFP)

AFP, February 26, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice brushed aside Iran's latest defiant statements on its nuclear program Sunday to reaffirm her offer of talks with Tehran if it suspends uranium enrichment.

Rice also expressed confidence that US, Russian, Chinese and European diplomats due to meet in London on Monday would find common ground on measures to increase pressure on Iran over its suspected nuclear arms drive.

DOJ_NMG_0136202

"We all agreed we needed to pursue the Security Council track," Rice said in an interview on Fox News Sunday, referring to the possibility of additional UN sanctions against Iran.

"We're leaving open the track of negotiations, because the best way to resolve this would be to have Iran come to the table," she said.

Earlier Sunday, Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad insisted his government would press ahead with its uranium enrichment regardless of UN threats, comparing the program -- which Tehran insists is aimed only at producing nuclear power -- to a runaway train.

"Iran has reached the technology to produce nuclear fuel and Iran's movement on this path is like a train on a one-way track with no room for stopping, reverse gear or braking," he said.

"They don't need a reverse gear, they need a stop button," retorted Rice.

"Then we can come to the table and we can talk about how to move forward," she said.

"We're all prepared to have full-scale negotiations anytime, at any place," she said.

Rice said UN and US sanctions imposed on Tehran since December after Iran refused to comply with an earlier demand it suspend its enrichment program were beginning to fuel dissatisfaction among Iranians over Ahmadinejad's actions.

"People are looking hard at investment in Iran, at the reputational risk, the investment risk of dealing with a country that is under Chapter 7 status," she said, referring to the mandatory UN sanctions resolution passed in December.

"If you just read the press you see the criticism of President Ahmadinejad by people inside Iran, knowledgeable and authoritative people in Iran, that (his) policies are isolating Iran," she said in a separate interview on ABC television.

Rice sidestepped questions on whether President George W. Bush's policy toward the largely Shiite Muslim nation, which he has branded part of an "axis of evil," aimed to topple its radical Islamic regime.

New Yorker magazine reported Sunday that US covert actions against Iran had increased under a major recent shift in US Middle East strategy, with the unintended result of exacerbating regional Sunni-Shiite sectarian tensions and bolstering Sunni radicals hostile to the United States.

Reporter Seymour Hersh wrote in the magazine that US military and special-operations teams have increased activities inside Iran, entering from Iraq to gather intelligence and to pursue Iranian operatives leaving Iraq.

US clandestine operations in Iran, Lebanon and Syria under the redirected US regional approach "has brought the United States closer to an open confrontation with Iran and, in parts of the region, propelled it into a widening sectarian conflict between Shiite and Sunni Muslims," Hersh wrote.

"A by-product of these activities has been the bolstering of Sunni extremist groups that espouse a militant vision of Islam and are hostile to America and sympathetic to Al-Qaeda," Hersh concludes.

He said the strategy, guided by US Vice President Dick Cheney and reliant on Saudi Arabia's national security advisor Prince Bandar bin Sultan, had complicated the war in Iraq, where the rise to power of Shiites over the previously dominant Sunnis has empowered Iran.

Earlier this week Cheney reignited concerns the Bush administration could use military action against Iran.

"It would be a serious mistake if a nation like Iran were to become a nuclear power," Cheney warned during a visit to Australia. "All options are still on the table."

While Rice made no reference to the New Yorker article, she said pressing for democratic change in Iran remained a US policy goal, and reaffirmed that Washington's problems with Tehran extended beyond the nuclear dispute.

"Iran also has other activities that it needs to stop. It needs to stop its support for terrorism in places like Lebanon and in the Middle East more broadly," she said.

THE REDIRECTION (NY)

A STRATEGIC SHIFT

DOJ_NMG_0136203

In the past few months, as the situation in Iraq has deteriorated, the Bush Administration, in both its public diplomacy and its covert operations, has significantly shifted its Middle East strategy. The "redirection," as some inside the White House have called the new strategy, has brought the United States closer to an open confrontation with Iran and, in parts of the region, propelled it into a widening sectarian conflict between Shiite and Sunni Muslims.

To undermine Iran, which is predominantly Shiite, the Bush Administration has decided, in effect, to reconfigure its priorities in the Middle East. In Lebanon, the Administration has coöperated with Saudi Arabia's government, which is Sunni, in clandestine operations that are intended to weaken Hezbollah, the Shiite organization that is backed by Iran. The U.S. has also taken part in clandestine operations aimed at Iran and its ally Syria. A by-product of these activities has been the bolstering of Sunni extremist groups that espouse a militant vision of Islam and are hostile to America and sympathetic to Al Qaeda.

One contradictory aspect of the new strategy is that, in Iraq, most of the insurgent violence directed at the American military has come from Sunni forces, and not from Shiites. But, from the Administration's perspective, the most profound—and unintended—strategic consequence of the Iraq war is the empowerment of Iran. Its President, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has made defiant pronouncements about the destruction of Israel and his country's right to pursue its nuclear program, and last week its supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, said on state television that "realities in the region show that the arrogant front, headed by the U.S. and its allies, will be the principal loser in the region."

After the revolution of 1979 brought a religious government to power, the United States broke with Iran and cultivated closer relations with the leaders of Sunni Arab states such as Jordan, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia. That calculation became more complex after the September 11th attacks, especially with regard to the Saudis. Al Qaeda is Sunni, and many of its operatives came from extremist religious circles inside Saudi Arabia. Before the invasion of Iraq, in 2003, Administration officials, influenced by neoconservative ideologues, assumed that a Shiite government there could provide a pro-American balance to Sunni extremists, since Iraq's Shiite majority had been oppressed under Saddam Hussein. They ignored warnings from the intelligence community about the ties between Iraqi Shiite leaders and Iran, where some had lived in exile for years. Now, to the distress of the White House, Iran has forged a close relationship with the Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

The new American policy, in its broad outlines, has been discussed publicly. In testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in January, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that there is "a new strategic alignment in the Middle East," separating "reformers" and "extremists"; she pointed to the Sunni states as centers of moderation, and said that Iran, Syria, and Hezbollah were "on the other side of that divide." (Syria's Sunni majority is dominated by the Alawi sect.) Iran and Syria, she said, "have made their choice and their choice is to destabilize."

Some of the core tactics of the redirection are not public, however. The clandestine operations have been kept secret, in some cases, by leaving the execution or the funding to the Saudis, or by finding other ways to work around the normal congressional appropriations process, current and former officials close to the Administration said.

A senior member of the House Appropriations Committee told me that he had heard about the new strategy, but felt that he and his colleagues had not been adequately briefed. "We haven't got any of this," he said. "We ask for anything going on, and they say there's nothing. And when we ask specific questions they say, 'We're going to get back to you.' It's so frustrating."

The key players behind the redirection are Vice-President Dick Cheney, the deputy national-security adviser Elliott Abrams, the departing Ambassador to Iraq (and nominee for United Nations Ambassador), Zalmay Khalilzad, and Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the Saudi national-security adviser. While Rice has been deeply involved in shaping the public policy, former and current officials said that the clandestine side has been guided by Cheney. (Cheney's office and the White House declined to comment for this story; the Pentagon did not respond to specific queries but said, "The United States is not planning to go to war with Iran.")

The policy shift has brought Saudi Arabia and Israel into a new strategic embrace, largely because both countries see Iran as an existential threat. They have been involved in direct talks, and the Saudis, who believe that greater stability in Israel and Palestine will give Iran less leverage in the region, have become more involved in Arab-Israeli negotiations.

The new strategy "is a major shift in American policy—it's a sea change," a U.S. government consultant with close ties to Israel said. The Sunni states "were petrified of a Shiite resurgence, and there was growing resentment with our gambling on the moderate Shiites in Iraq," he said. "We cannot reverse the Shiite gain in Iraq, but we can contain it."

DOJ_NMG_0136204

"It seems there has been a debate inside the government over what's the biggest danger—Iran or Sunni radicals," Vali Nasr, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, who has written widely on Shiites, Iran, and Iraq, told me. "The Saudis and some in the Administration have been arguing that the biggest threat is Iran and the Sunni radicals are the lesser enemies. This is a victory for the Saudi line."

Martin Indyk, a senior State Department official in the Clinton Administration who also served as Ambassador to Israel, said that "the Middle East is heading into a serious Sunni-Shiite Cold War." Indyk, who is the director of the Saban Center for Middle East Policy at the Brookings Institution, added that, in his opinion, it was not clear whether the White House was fully aware of the strategic implications of its new policy. "The White House is not just doubling the bet in Iraq," he said. "It's doubling the bet across the region. This could get very complicated. Everything is upside down."

The Administration's new policy for containing Iran seems to complicate its strategy for winning the war in Iraq. Patrick Clawson, an expert on Iran and the deputy director for research at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, argued, however, that closer ties between the United States and moderate or even radical Sunnis could put "fear" into the government of Prime Minister Maliki and "make him worry that the Sunnis could actually win" the civil war there. Clawson said that this might give Maliki an incentive to coöperate with the United States in suppressing radical Shiite militias, such as Moqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army.

Even so, for the moment, the U.S. remains dependent on the coöperation of Iraqi Shiite leaders. The Mahdi Army may be openly hostile to American interests, but other Shiite militias are counted as U.S. allies. Both Moqtada al-Sadr and the White House back Maliki. A memorandum written late last year by Stephen Hadley, the national-security adviser, suggested that the Administration try to separate Maliki from his more radical Shiite allies by building his base among moderate Sunnis and Kurds, but so far the trends have been in the opposite direction. As the Iraqi Army continues to founder in its confrontations with insurgents, the power of the Shiite militias has steadily increased.

Flynt Leverett, a former Bush Administration National Security Council official, told me that "there is nothing coincidental or ironic" about the new strategy with regard to Iraq. "The Administration is trying to make a case that Iran is more dangerous and more provocative than the Sunni insurgents to American interests in Iraq, when—if you look at the actual casualty numbers—the punishment inflicted on America by the Sunnis is greater by an order of magnitude," Leverett said. "This is all part of the campaign of provocative steps to increase the pressure on Iran. The idea is that at some point the Iranians will respond and then the Administration will have an open door to strike at them."

President George W. Bush, in a speech on January 10th, partially spelled out this approach. "These two regimes"—Iran and Syria—"are allowing terrorists and insurgents to use their territory to move in and out of Iraq," Bush said. "Iran is providing material support for attacks on American troops. We will disrupt the attacks on our forces. We'll interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria. And we will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

In the following weeks, there was a wave of allegations from the Administration about Iranian involvement in the Iraq war. On February 11th, reporters were shown sophisticated explosive devices, captured in Iraq, that the Administration claimed had come from Iran. The Administration's message was, in essence, that the bleak situation in Iraq was the result not of its own failures of planning and execution but of Iran's interference.

The U.S. military also has arrested and interrogated hundreds of Iranians in Iraq. "The word went out last August for the military to snatch as many Iranians in Iraq as they can," a former senior intelligence official said. "They had five hundred locked up at one time. We're working these guys and getting information from them. The White House goal is to build a case that the Iranians have been fomenting the insurgency and they've been doing it all along—that Iran is, in fact, supporting the killing of Americans." The Pentagon consultant confirmed that hundreds of Iranians have been captured by American forces in recent months. But he told me that that total includes many Iranian humanitarian and aid workers who "get scooped up and released in a short time," after they have been interrogated.

"We are not planning for a war with Iran," Robert Gates, the new Defense Secretary, announced on February 2nd, and yet the atmosphere of confrontation has deepened. According to current and former American intelligence and military officials, secret operations in Lebanon have been accompanied by clandestine operations targeting Iran. American military and special-operations teams have escalated their activities in Iran to gather intelligence and, according to a Pentagon consultant on terrorism and the former senior intelligence official, have also crossed the border in pursuit of Iranian operatives from Iraq.

At Rice's Senate appearance in January, Democratic Senator Joseph Biden, of Delaware, pointedly asked her whether the U.S. planned to cross the Iranian or the Syrian border in the course of a pursuit. "Obviously, the President isn't going to rule anything out to protect our troops, but the plan is to take down these networks in Iraq," Rice said, adding, "I do think that everyone will understand that—the American people and I assume the Congress expect the President to do what is necessary to protect our forces."

The ambiguity of Rice's reply prompted a response from Nebraska Senator Chuck Hagel, a Republican, who has been critical of the Administration:

Some of us remember 1970, Madam Secretary. And that was Cambodia. And when our government lied to the American people and said, "We didn't cross the border going into Cambodia," in fact we did.

I happen to know something about that, as do some on this committee. So, Madam Secretary, when you set in motion the kind of policy that the President is talking about here, it's very, very dangerous.

The Administration's concern about Iran's role in Iraq is coupled with its long-standing alarm over Iran's nuclear program. On Fox News on January 14th, Cheney warned of the possibility, in a few years, "of a nuclear-armed Iran, astride the world's supply of oil, able to affect adversely the global economy, prepared to use terrorist organizations and/or their nuclear weapons to threaten their neighbors and others around the world." He also said, "If you go and talk with the Gulf states or if you talk with the Saudis or if you talk with the Israelis or the Jordanians, the entire region is worried. . . . The threat Iran represents is growing."

The Administration is now examining a wave of new intelligence on Iran's weapons programs. Current and former American officials told me that the intelligence, which came from Israeli agents operating in Iran, includes a claim that Iran has developed a three-stage solid-fuelled intercontinental missile capable of delivering several small warheads—each with limited accuracy—inside Europe. The validity of this human intelligence is still being debated.

A similar argument about an imminent threat posed by weapons of mass destruction—and questions about the intelligence used to make that case—formed the prelude to the invasion of Iraq. Many in Congress have greeted the claims about Iran with wariness; in the Senate on February 14th, Hillary Clinton said, "We have all learned lessons from the conflict in Iraq, and we have to apply those lessons to any allegations that are being raised about Iran. Because, Mr. President, what we are hearing has too familiar a ring and we must be on guard that we never again make decisions on the basis of intelligence that turns out to be faulty."

Still, the Pentagon is continuing intensive planning for a possible bombing attack on Iran, a process that began last year, at the direction of the President. In recent months, the former intelligence official told me, a special planning group has been established in the offices of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, charged with creating a contingency bombing plan for Iran that can be implemented, upon orders from the President, within twenty-four hours.

In the past month, I was told by an Air Force adviser on targeting and the Pentagon consultant on terrorism, the Iran planning group has been handed a new assignment: to identify targets in Iran that may be involved in supplying or aiding militants in Iraq. Previously, the focus had been on the destruction of Iran's nuclear facilities and possible regime change.

Two carrier strike groups—the Eisenhower and the Stennis—are now in the Arabian Sea. One plan is for them to be relieved early in the spring, but there is worry within the military that they may be ordered to stay in the area after the new carriers arrive, according to several sources. (Among other concerns, war games have shown that the carriers could be vulnerable to swarming tactics involving large numbers of small boats, a technique that the Iranians have practiced in the past; carriers have limited maneuverability in the narrow Strait of Hormuz, off Iran's southern coast.) The former senior intelligence official said that the current contingency plans allow for an attack order this spring. He added, however, that senior officers on the Joint Chiefs were counting on the White House's not being "foolish enough to do this in the face of Iraq, and the problems it would give the Republicans in 2008."

PRINCE BANDAR'S GAME

The Administration's effort to diminish Iranian authority in the Middle East has relied heavily on Saudi Arabia and on Prince Bandar, the Saudi national-security adviser. Bandar served as the Ambassador to the United States for twenty-two years, until

DOJ_NMG_0136206

2005, and has maintained a friendship with President Bush and Vice-President Cheney. In his new post, he continues to meet privately with them. Senior White House officials have made several visits to Saudi Arabia recently, some of them not disclosed.

Last November, Cheney flew to Saudi Arabia for a surprise meeting with King Abdullah and Bandar. The Times reported that the King warned Cheney that Saudi Arabia would back its fellow-Sunnis in Iraq if the United States were to withdraw. A European intelligence official told me that the meeting also focussed on more general Saudi fears about "the rise of the Shiites." In response, "The Saudis are starting to use their leverage—money."

In a royal family rife with competition, Bandar has, over the years, built a power base that relies largely on his close relationship with the U.S., which is crucial to the Saudis. Bandar was succeeded as Ambassador by Prince Turki al-Faisal; Turki resigned after eighteen months and was replaced by Adel A. al-Jubeir, a bureaucrat who has worked with Bandar. A former Saudi diplomat told me that during Turki's tenure he became aware of private meetings involving Bandar and senior White House officials, including Cheney and Abrams. "I assume Turki was not happy with that," the Saudi said. But, he added, "I don't think that Bandar is going off on his own." Although Turki dislikes Bandar, the Saudi said, he shared his goal of challenging the spread of Shiite power in the Middle East.

The split between Shiites and Sunnis goes back to a bitter divide, in the seventh century, over who should succeed the Prophet Muhammad. Sunnis dominated the medieval caliphate and the Ottoman Empire, and Shiites, traditionally, have been regarded more as outsiders. Worldwide, ninety per cent of Muslims are Sunni, but Shiites are a majority in Iran, Iraq, and Bahrain, and are the largest Muslim group in Lebanon. Their concentration in a volatile, oil-rich region has led to concern in the West and among Sunnis about the emergence of a "Shiite crescent"—especially given Iran's increased geopolitical weight.

"The Saudis still see the world through the days of the Ottoman Empire, when Sunni Muslims ruled the roost and the Shiites were the lowest class," Frederic Hof, a retired military officer who is an expert on the Middle East, told me. If Bandar was seen as bringing about a shift in U.S. policy in favor of the Sunnis, he added, it would greatly enhance his standing within the royal family.

The Saudis are driven by their fear that Iran could tilt the balance of power not only in the region but within their own country. Saudi Arabia has a significant Shiite minority in its Eastern Province, a region of major oil fields; sectarian tensions are high in the province. The royal family believes that Iranian operatives, working with local Shiites, have been behind many terrorist attacks inside the kingdom, according to Vali Nasr. "Today, the only army capable of containing Iran"—the Iraqi Army—"has been destroyed by the United States. You're now dealing with an Iran that could be nuclear-capable and has a standing army of four hundred and fifty thousand soldiers." (Saudi Arabia has seventy-five thousand troops in its standing army.)

Nasr went on, "The Saudis have considerable financial means, and have deep relations with the Muslim Brotherhood and the Salafis"—Sunni extremists who view Shiites as apostates. "The last time Iran was a threat, the Saudis were able to mobilize the worst kinds of Islamic radicals. Once you get them out of the box, you can't put them back."

The Saudi royal family has been, by turns, both a sponsor and a target of Sunni extremists, who object to the corruption and decadence among the family's myriad princes. The princes are gambling that they will not be overthrown as long as they continue to support religious schools and charities linked to the extremists. The Administration's new strategy is heavily dependent on this bargain.

Nasr compared the current situation to the period in which Al Qaeda first emerged. In the nineteen-eighties and the early nineties, the Saudi government offered to subsidize the covert American C.I.A. proxy war against the Soviet Union in Afghanistan. Hundreds of young Saudis were sent into the border areas of Pakistan, where they set up religious schools, training bases, and recruiting facilities. Then, as now, many of the operatives who were paid with Saudi money were Salafis. Among them, of course, were Osama bin Laden and his associates, who founded Al Qaeda, in 1988.

This time, the U.S. government consultant told me, Bandar and other Saudis have assured the White House that "they will keep a very close eye on the religious fundamentalists. Their message to us was 'We've created this movement, and we can control it.' It's not that we don't want the Salafis to throw bombs; it's who they throw them at—Hezbollah, Moqtada al-Sadr, Iran, and at the Syrians, if they continue to work with Hezbollah and Iran."

The Saudi said that, in his country's view, it was taking a political risk by joining the U.S. in challenging Iran: Bandar is already seen in the Arab world as being too close to the Bush Administration. "We have two nightmares," the former diplomat told me. “For Iran to acquire the bomb and for the United States to attack Iran. I’d rather the Israelis bomb the Iranians, so we can blame them. If America does it, we will be blamed.”

In the past year, the Saudis, the Israelis, and the Bush Administration have developed a series of informal understandings about their new strategic direction. At least four main elements were involved, the U.S. government consultant told me. First, Israel would be assured that its security was paramount and that Washington and Saudi Arabia and other Sunni states shared its concern about Iran.

Second, the Saudis would urge Hamas, the Islamist Palestinian party that has received support from Iran, to curtail its anti-Israeli aggression and to begin serious talks about sharing leadership with Fatah, the more secular Palestinian group. (In February, the Saudis brokered a deal at Mecca between the two factions. However, Israel and the U.S. have expressed dissatisfaction with the terms.)

The third component was that the Bush Administration would work directly with Sunni nations to counteract Shiite ascendance in the region.

Fourth, the Saudi government, with Washington’s approval, would provide funds and logistical aid to weaken the government of President Bashir Assad, of Syria. The Israelis believe that putting such pressure on the Assad government will make it more conciliatory and open to negotiations. Syria is a major conduit of arms to Hezbollah. The Saudi government is also at odds with the Syrians over the assassination of Rafik Hariri, the former Lebanese Prime Minister, in Beirut in 2005, for which it believes the Assad government was responsible. Hariri, a billionaire Sunni, was closely associated with the Saudi regime and with Prince Bandar. (A U.N. inquiry strongly suggested that the Syrians were involved, but offered no direct evidence; there are plans for another investigation, by an international tribunal.)

Patrick Clawson, of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, depicted the Saudis’ coöperation with the White House as a significant breakthrough. “The Saudis understand that if they want the Administration to make a more generous political offer to the Palestinians they have to persuade the Arab states to make a more generous offer to the Israelis,” Clawson told me. The new diplomatic approach, he added, “shows a real degree of effort and sophistication as well as a deftness of touch not always associated with this Administration. Who’s running the greater risk—we or the Saudis? At a time when America’s standing in the Middle East is extremely low, the Saudis are actually embracing us. We should count our blessings.”

The Pentagon consultant had a different view. He said that the Administration had turned to Bandar as a “fallback,” because it had realized that the failing war in Iraq could leave the Middle East “up for grabs.”

JIHADIS IN LEBANON

The focus of the U.S.-Saudi relationship, after Iran, is Lebanon, where the Saudis have been deeply involved in efforts by the Administration to support the Lebanese government. Prime Minister Fouad Siniora is struggling to stay in power against a persistent opposition led by Hezbollah, the Shiite organization, and its leader, Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah. Hezbollah has an extensive infrastructure, an estimated two to three thousand active fighters, and thousands of additional members.

Hezbollah has been on the State Department’s terrorist list since 1997. The organization has been implicated in the 1983 bombing of a Marine barracks in Beirut that killed two hundred and forty-one military men. It has also been accused of complicity in the kidnapping of Americans, including the C.I.A. station chief in Lebanon, who died in captivity, and a Marine colonel serving on a U.N. peacekeeping mission, who was killed. (Nasrallah has denied that the group was involved in these incidents.) Nasrallah is seen by many as a staunch terrorist, who has said that he regards Israel as a state that has no right to exist. Many in the Arab world, however, especially Shiites, view him as a resistance leader who withstood Israel in last summer’s thirty-three-day war, and Siniora as a weak politician who relies on America’s support but was unable to persuade President Bush to call for an end to the Israeli bombing of Lebanon. (Photographs of Siniora kissing Condoleezza Rice on the cheek when she visited during the war were prominently displayed during street protests in Beirut.)

The Bush Administration has publicly pledged the Siniora government a billion dollars in aid since last summer. A donors’ conference in Paris, in January, which the U.S. helped organize, yielded pledges of almost eight billion more, including a promise of more than a billion from the Saudis. The American pledge includes more than two hundred million dollars in military aid, and forty million dollars for internal security.

The United States has also given clandestine support to the Siniora government, according to the former senior intelligence official and the U.S. government consultant. "We are in a program to enhance the Sunni capability to resist Shiite influence, and we're spreading the money around as much as we can," the former senior intelligence official said. The problem was that such money "always gets in more pockets than you think it will," he said. "In this process, we're financing a lot of bad guys with some serious potential unintended consequences. We don't have the ability to determine and get pay vouchers signed by the people we like and avoid the people we don't like. It's a very high-risk venture."

American, European, and Arab officials I spoke to told me that the Siniora government and its allies had allowed some aid to end up in the hands of emerging Sunni radical groups in northern Lebanon, the Bekaa Valley, and around Palestinian refugee camps in the south. These groups, though small, are seen as a buffer to Hezbollah; at the same time, their ideological ties are with Al Qaeda.

During a conversation with me, the former Saudi diplomat accused Nasrallah of attempting "to hijack the state," but he also objected to the Lebanese and Saudi sponsorship of Sunni jihadists in Lebanon. "Salafis are sick and hateful, and I'm very much against the idea of flirting with them," he said. "They hate the Shiites, but they hate Americans more. If you try to outsmart them, they will outsmart us. It will be ugly."

Alastair Crooke, who spent nearly thirty years in MI6, the British intelligence service, and now works for Conflicts Forum, a think tank in Beirut, told me, "The Lebanese government is opening space for these people to come in. It could be very dangerous." Crooke said that one Sunni extremist group, Fatah al-Islam, had splintered from its pro-Syrian parent group, Fatah al-Intifada, in the Nahr al-Bared refugee camp, in northern Lebanon. Its membership at the time was less than two hundred. "I was told that within twenty-four hours they were being offered weapons and money by people presenting themselves as representatives of the Lebanese government's interests—presumably to take on Hezbollah," Crooke said.

The largest of the groups, Asbat al-Ansar, is situated in the Ain al-Hilweh Palestinian refugee camp. Asbat al-Ansar has received arms and supplies from Lebanese internal-security forces and militias associated with the Siniora government.

In 2005, according to a report by the U.S.-based International Crisis Group, Saad Hariri, the Sunni majority leader of the Lebanese parliament and the son of the slain former Prime Minister—Saad inherited more than four billion dollars after his father's assassination—paid forty-eight thousand dollars in bail for four members of an Islamic militant group from Dinniyeh. The men had been arrested while trying to establish an Islamic mini-state in northern Lebanon. The Crisis Group noted that many of the militants "had trained in al-Qaeda camps in Afghanistan."

According to the Crisis Group report, Saad Hariri later used his parliamentary majority to obtain amnesty for twenty-two of the Dinniyeh Islamists, as well as for seven militants suspected of plotting to bomb the Italian and Ukrainian embassies in Beirut, the previous year. (He also arranged a pardon for Samir Geagea, a Maronite Christian militia leader, who had been convicted of four political murders, including the assassination, in 1987, of Prime Minister Rashid Karami.) Hariri described his actions to reporters as humanitarian.

In an interview in Beirut, a senior official in the Siniora government acknowledged that there were Sunni jihadists operating inside Lebanon. "We have a liberal attitude that allows Al Qaeda types to have a presence here," he said. He related this to concerns that Iran or Syria might decide to turn Lebanon into a "theatre of conflict."

The official said that his government was in a no-win situation. Without a political settlement with Hezbollah, he said, Lebanon could "slide into a conflict," in which Hezbollah fought openly with Sunni forces, with potentially horrific consequences. But if Hezbollah agreed to a settlement yet still maintained a separate army, allied with Iran and Syria, "Lebanon could become a target. In both cases, we become a target."

The Bush Administration has portrayed its support of the Siniora government as an example of the President's belief in democracy, and his desire to prevent other powers from interfering in Lebanon. When Hezbollah led street demonstrations in Beirut in December, John Bolton, who was then the U.S. Ambassador to the U.N., called them "part of the Iran-Syria-inspired coup."

Leslie H. Gelb, a past president of the Council on Foreign Relations, said that the Administration's policy was less pro democracy than "pro American national security. The fact is that it would be terribly dangerous if Hezbollah ran Lebanon." The fall of the Siniora government would be seen, Gelb said, "as a signal in the Middle East of the decline of the United States and the ascendancy of the terrorism threat. And so any change in the distribution of political power in Lebanon has to be opposed by the United States—and we're justified in helping any non-Shiite parties resist that change. We should say this publicly, instead of talking about democracy."

Martin Indyk, of the Saban Center, said, however, that the United States "does not have enough pull to stop the moderates in Lebanon from dealing with the extremists." He added, "The President sees the region as divided between moderates and extremists, but our regional friends see it as divided between Sunnis and Shia. The Sunnis that we view as extremists are regarded by our Sunni allies simply as Sunnis."

In January, after an outburst of street violence in Beirut involving supporters of both the Siniora government and Hezbollah, Prince Bandar flew to Tehran to discuss the political impasse in Lebanon and to meet with Ali Larijani, the Iranians' negotiator on nuclear issues. According to a Middle Eastern ambassador, Bandar's mission—which the ambassador said was endorsed by the White House—also aimed "to create problems between the Iranians and Syria." There had been tensions between the two countries about Syrian talks with Israel, and the Saudis' goal was to encourage a breach. However, the ambassador said, "It did not work. Syria and Iran are not going to betray each other. Bandar's approach is very unlikely to succeed."

Walid Jumblatt, who is the leader of the Druze minority in Lebanon and a strong Siniora supporter, has attacked Nasrallah as an agent of Syria, and has repeatedly told foreign journalists that Hezbollah is under the direct control of the religious leadership in Iran. In a conversation with me last December, he depicted Bashir Assad, the Syrian President, as a "serial killer." Nasrallah, he said, was "morally guilty" of the assassination of Rafik Hariri and the murder, last November, of Pierre Gemayel, a member of the Siniora Cabinet, because of his support for the Syrians.

Jumblatt then told me that he had met with Vice-President Cheney in Washington last fall to discuss, among other issues, the possibility of undermining Assad. He and his colleagues advised Cheney that, if the United States does try to move against Syria, members of the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood would be "the ones to talk to," Jumblatt said.

The Syrian Muslim Brotherhood, a branch of a radical Sunni movement founded in Egypt in 1928, engaged in more than a decade of violent opposition to the regime of Hafez Assad, Bashir's father. In 1982, the Brotherhood took control of the city of Hama; Assad bombarded the city for a week, killing between six thousand and twenty thousand people. Membership in the Brotherhood is punishable by death in Syria. The Brotherhood is also an avowed enemy of the U.S. and of Israel. Nevertheless, Jumblatt said, "We told Cheney that the basic link between Iran and Lebanon is Syria—and to weaken Iran you need to open the door to effective Syrian opposition."

There is evidence that the Administration's redirection strategy has already benefitted the Brotherhood. The Syrian National Salvation Front is a coalition of opposition groups whose principal members are a faction led by Abdul Halim Khaddam, a former Syrian Vice-President who defected in 2005, and the Brotherhood. A former high-ranking C.I.A. officer told me, "The Americans have provided both political and financial support. The Saudis are taking the lead with financial support, but there is American involvement." He said that Khaddam, who now lives in Paris, was getting money from Saudi Arabia, with the knowledge of the White House. (In 2005, a delegation of the Front's members met with officials from the National Security Council, according to press reports.) A former White House official told me that the Saudis had provided members of the Front with travel documents.

Jumblatt said he understood that the issue was a sensitive one for the White House. "I told Cheney that some people in the Arab world, mainly the Egyptians"—whose moderate Sunni leadership has been fighting the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood for decades—"won't like it if the United States helps the Brotherhood. But if you don't take on Syria we will be face to face in Lebanon with Hezbollah in a long fight, and one we might not win."

THE SHEIKH

On a warm, clear night early last December, in a bombed-out suburb a few miles south of downtown Beirut, I got a preview of how the Administration's new strategy might play out in Lebanon. Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, the Hezbollah leader, who has been in hiding, had agreed to an interview. Security arrangements for the meeting were secretive and elaborate. I was driven, in the back seat of a darkened car, to a damaged underground garage somewhere in Beirut, searched with a handheld scanner, placed in a second car to be driven to yet another bomb-scarred underground garage, and transferred again. Last summer, it was reported that Israel was trying to kill Nasrallah, but the extraordinary precautions were not due only to that threat. Nasrallah's aides told me that they believe he is a prime target of fellow-Arabs, primarily Jordanian intelligence operatives, as well as Sunni jihadists who they believe are affiliated with Al Qaeda. (The government consultant and a retired four-star general said that Jordanian intelligence, with support from the U.S. and Israel, had been trying to infiltrate Shiite groups, to work against Hezbollah. Jordan's King Abdullah II has warned that a Shiite government in Iraq that was close to Iran would lead to the emergence of a Shiite crescent.) This is something of an ironic turn: Nasrallah's battle with Israel last summer turned him—a Shiite—into the most popular and influential figure among Sunnis and Shiites throughout the region. In recent months, however, he has increasingly been seen by many Sunnis not as a symbol of Arab unity but as a participant in a sectarian war.

Nasrallah, dressed, as usual, in religious garb, was waiting for me in an unremarkable apartment. One of his advisers said that he was not likely to remain there overnight; he has been on the move since his decision, last July, to order the kidnapping of two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid set off the thirty-three-day war. Nasrallah has since said publicly—and repeated to me—that he misjudged the Israeli response. "We just wanted to capture prisoners for exchange purposes," he told me. "We never wanted to drag the region into war."

Nasrallah accused the Bush Administration of working with Israel to deliberately instigate fitna, an Arabic word that is used to mean "insurrection and fragmentation within Islam." "In my opinion, there is a huge campaign through the media throughout the world to put each side up against the other," he said. "I believe that all this is being run by American and Israeli intelligence." (He did not provide any specific evidence for this.) He said that the U.S. war in Iraq had increased sectarian tensions, but argued that Hezbollah had tried to prevent them from spreading into Lebanon. (Sunni-Shiite confrontations increased, along with violence, in the weeks after we talked.)

Nasrallah said he believed that President Bush's goal was "the drawing of a new map for the region. They want the partition of Iraq. Iraq is not on the edge of a civil war—there is a civil war. There is ethnic and sectarian cleansing. The daily killing and displacement which is taking place in Iraq aims at achieving three Iraqi parts, which will be sectarian and ethnically pure as a prelude to the partition of Iraq. Within one or two years at the most, there will be total Sunni areas, total Shiite areas, and total Kurdish areas. Even in Baghdad, there is a fear that it might be divided into two areas, one Sunni and one Shiite."

He went on, "I can say that President Bush is lying when he says he does not want Iraq to be partitioned. All the facts occurring now on the ground make you swear he is dragging Iraq to partition. And a day will come when he will say, 'I cannot do anything, since the Iraqis want the partition of their country and I honor the wishes of the people of Iraq.' "

Nasrallah said he believed that America also wanted to bring about the partition of Lebanon and of Syria. In Syria, he said, the result would be to push the country "into chaos and internal battles like in Iraq." In Lebanon, "There will be a Sunni state, an Alawi state, a Christian state, and a Druze state." But, he said, "I do not know if there will be a Shiite state." Nasrallah told me that he suspected that one aim of the Israeli bombing of Lebanon last summer was "the destruction of Shiite areas and the displacement of Shiites from Lebanon. The idea was to have the Shiites of Lebanon and Syria flee to southern Iraq," which is dominated by Shiites. "I am not sure, but I smell this," he told me.

Partition would leave Israel surrounded by "small tranquil states," he said. "I can assure you that the Saudi kingdom will also be divided, and the issue will reach to North African states. There will be small ethnic and confessional states," he said. "In other words, Israel will be the most important and the strongest state in a region that has been partitioned into ethnic and confessional states that are in agreement with each other. This is the new Middle East."

In fact, the Bush Administration has adamantly resisted talk of partitioning Iraq, and its public stances suggest that the White House sees a future Lebanon that is intact, with a weak, disarmed Hezbollah playing, at most, a minor political role. There is also no evidence to support Nasrallah's belief that the Israelis were seeking to drive the Shiites into southern Iraq. Nevertheless, Nasrallah's vision of a larger sectarian conflict in which the United States is implicated suggests a possible consequence of the White House's new strategy.

In the interview, Nasrallah made mollifying gestures and promises that would likely be met with skepticism by his opponents. "If the United States says that discussions with the likes of us can be useful and influential in determining American policy in the region, we have no objection to talks or meetings," he said. "But, if their aim through this meeting is to impose their policy on us, it will be a waste of time." He said that the Hezbollah militia, unless attacked, would operate only within the borders of Lebanon, and pledged to disarm it when the Lebanese Army was able to stand up. Nasrallah said that he had no interest in initiating another war with Israel. However, he added that he was anticipating, and preparing for, another Israeli attack, later this year.

Nasrallah further insisted that the street demonstrations in Beirut would continue until the Siniora government fell or met his coalition's political demands. "Practically speaking, this government cannot rule," he told me. "It might issue orders, but the majority of the Lebanese people will not abide and will not recognize the legitimacy of this government. Siniora remains in office because of international support, but this does not mean that Siniora can rule Lebanon."

President Bush's repeated praise of the Siniora government, Nasrallah said, "is the best service to the Lebanese opposition he can give, because it weakens their position vis-à-vis the Lebanese people and the Arab and Islamic populations. They are betting on us getting tired. We did not get tired during the war, so how could we get tired in a demonstration?"

There is sharp division inside and outside the Bush Administration about how best to deal with Nasrallah, and whether he could, in fact, be a partner in a political settlement. The outgoing director of National Intelligence, John Negroponte, in a farewell briefing to the Senate Intelligence Committee, in January, said that Hezbollah "lies at the center of Iran's terrorist strategy. . . . It could decide to conduct attacks against U.S. interests in the event it feels its survival or that of Iran is threatened. . . . Lebanese Hezbollah sees itself as Tehran's partner."

In 2002, Richard Armitage, then the Deputy Secretary of State, called Hezbollah "the A-team" of terrorists. In a recent interview, however, Armitage acknowledged that the issue has become somewhat more complicated. Nasrallah, Armitage told me, has emerged as "a political force of some note, with a political role to play inside Lebanon if he chooses to do so." In terms of public relations and political gamesmanship, Armitage said, Nasrallah "is the smartest man in the Middle East." But, he added, Nasrallah "has got to make it clear that he wants to play an appropriate role as the loyal opposition. For me, there's still a blood debt to pay"—a reference to the murdered colonel and the Marine barracks bombing.

Robert Baer, a former longtime C.I.A. agent in Lebanon, has been a severe critic of Hezbollah and has warned of its links to Iranian-sponsored terrorism. But now, he told me, "we've got Sunni Arabs preparing for cataclysmic conflict, and we will need somebody to protect the Christians in Lebanon. It used to be the French and the United States who would do it, and now it's going to be Nasrallah and the Shiites.

"The most important story in the Middle East is the growth of Nasrallah from a street guy to a leader—from a terrorist to a statesman," Baer added. "The dog that didn't bark this summer"—during the war with Israel—"is Shiite terrorism." Baer was referring to fears that Nasrallah, in addition to firing rockets into Israel and kidnapping its soldiers, might set in motion a wave of terror attacks on Israeli and American targets around the world. "He could have pulled the trigger, but he did not," Baer said.

Most members of the intelligence and diplomatic communities acknowledge Hezbollah's ongoing ties to Iran. But there is disagreement about the extent to which Nasrallah would put aside Hezbollah's interests in favor of Iran's. A former C.I.A. officer who also served in Lebanon called Nasrallah "a Lebanese phenomenon," adding, "Yes, he's aided by Iran and Syria, but Hezbollah's gone beyond that." He told me that there was a period in the late eighties and early nineties when the C.I.A. station in Beirut was able to clandestinely monitor Nasrallah's conversations. He described Nasrallah as "a gang leader who was able to make deals with the other gangs. He had contacts with everybody."

TELLING CONGRESS

The Bush Administration's reliance on clandestine operations that have not been reported to Congress and its dealings with intermediaries with questionable agendas have recalled, for some in Washington, an earlier chapter in history. Two decades ago, the Reagan Administration attempted to fund the Nicaraguan contras illegally, with the help of secret arms sales to Iran. Saudi money was involved in what became known as the Iran-Contra scandal, and a few of the players back then—notably Prince Bandar and Elliott Abrams—are involved in today's dealings.

Iran-Contra was the subject of an informal "lessons learned" discussion two years ago among veterans of the scandal. Abrams led the discussion. One conclusion was that even though the program was eventually exposed, it had been possible to execute it without telling Congress. As to what the experience taught them, in terms of future covert operations, the participants found: "One, you can't trust our friends. Two, the C.I.A. has got to be totally out of it. Three, you can't trust the uniformed military, and four, it's got to be run out of the Vice-President's office"—a reference to Cheney's role, the former senior intelligence official said.

I was subsequently told by the two government consultants and the former senior intelligence official that the echoes of Iran-Contra were a factor in Negroponte's decision to resign from the National Intelligence directorship and accept a sub-Cabinet position of Deputy Secretary of State. (Negroponte declined to comment.)

The former senior intelligence official also told me that Negroponte did not want a repeat of his experience in the Reagan Administration, when he served as Ambassador to Honduras. "Negroponte said, 'No way. I'm not going down that road again, with the N.S.C. running operations off the books, with no finding.' " (In the case of covert C.I.A. operations, the President must issue a written finding and inform Congress.) Negroponte stayed on as Deputy Secretary of State, he added, because "he believes he can influence the government in a positive way."

The government consultant said that Negroponte shared the White House's policy goals but "wanted to do it by the book." The Pentagon consultant also told me that "there was a sense at the senior-ranks level that he wasn't fully on board with the more adventurous clandestine initiatives." It was also true, he said, that Negroponte "had problems with this Rube Goldberg policy contraption for fixing the Middle East."

The Pentagon consultant added that one difficulty, in terms of oversight, was accounting for covert funds. "There are many, many pots of black money, scattered in many places and used all over the world on a variety of missions," he said. The budgetary chaos in Iraq, where billions of dollars are unaccounted for, has made it a vehicle for such transactions, according to the former senior intelligence official and the retired four-star general.

"This goes back to Iran-Contra," a former National Security Council aide told me. "And much of what they're doing is to keep the agency out of it." He said that Congress was not being briefed on the full extent of the U.S.-Saudi operations. And, he said, "The C.I.A. is asking, 'What's going on?' They're concerned, because they think it's amateur hour."

The issue of oversight is beginning to get more attention from Congress. Last November, the Congressional Research Service issued a report for Congress on what it depicted as the Administration's blurring of the line between C.I.A. activities and strictly military ones, which do not have the same reporting requirements. And the Senate Intelligence Committee, headed by Senator Jay Rockefeller, has scheduled a hearing for March 8th on Defense Department intelligence activities.

Senator Ron Wyden, of Oregon, a Democrat who is a member of the Intelligence Committee, told me, "The Bush Administration has frequently failed to meet its legal obligation to keep the Intelligence Committee fully and currently informed. Time and again, the answer has been 'Trust us.' " Wyden said, "It is hard for me to trust the Administration."

Iran Defiant On Nuclear Pursuit (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, February 26, 2007

President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad warned on Sunday that Iran would not retreat from its nuclear programme, while Tehran sought to underline its technological prowess by announcing that it had fired a rocket into the atmosphere.

"Iran has obtained the technology to produce nuclear fuel and Iran's move is like a train that has no brakes . . . and no reverse gear," Mr Ahmadi-Nejad said, according to Iran's ISNA student news agency.

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's comments were quickly picked up by Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state. "They don't need a reverse gear," she responded on Fox News. "They need a stop button."

Iran failed last week to meet a United Nations deadline to curb activities related to uranium enrichment, a process that can produce both nuclear fuel and weapons grade material.

The extent to which Iran has mastered such technology remains one of the most important questions in the controversy over the nuclear programme, together with other factors such as Tehran's true intentions and the difficulty of forging a common front on the issue among big powers.

In a sign of the heightened tension, Manouchehr Mohammadi, a deputy foreign minister, said on Sunday: "We have prepared ourselves for any situation, even for war."

However, the Iranian foreign ministry is not generally considered to be one of the main actors in the dispute over Iran's nuclear programme, and western diplomats say they believe Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's influence in the country is declining in favour of a corps of more established pragmatists.

DOJ_NMG_0136213

At the weekend, Vice-President Dick Cheney reiterated the US position that “all options” were on the table for dealing with Iran’s nuclear ambitions, adding that it was “still our preference” to resolve the issue peacefully through working with the European Union and the UN.

Diplomats from the permanent five members of the UN Security Council and Germany meet in London today to make a first attempt to reach consensus on a new set of UN sanctions on Iran.

“It’s reassuring that the Americans are working this way,” a French diplomat said. “We certainly don’t have the impression that they want a military conflict.”

In a further source of tension, Iran was yesterday initially reported by agencies to have fired a rocket into space using technology similar to intercontinental ballistic missiles.

But Ali Akbar Golrou, the executive deputy of Iran’s aerospace research centre, later told Fars News Agency the rocket was not a missile capable of reaching space but would eventually fall back to earth after reaching a suborbital position.

As U.S. Puts Pressure On Iran, Gulf's Religious Rift Spreads (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

MUHARRAQ, Bahrain -- One night last fall, incendiary leaflets denouncing Iran suddenly appeared on the walls of houses and mosques in this tiny Persian Gulf kingdom.

"Iranians are trying to occupy your homes, the homes of your fathers and grandfathers," warned the anonymous tracts. "Do you want to be ruled by these people? No, a thousand times no!"

Bahrain, a crucial American ally and home to the U.S. Navy's Fifth Fleet, was quickly caught up in a wave of anti-Iranian paranoia. Politicians, clerics and the media jumped on the theme, turning Iran into a big issue in bitter local elections at the end of the year.

The trigger for all the noisy alarm? A ruckus over the purchase of a ramshackle house by a handful of local Bahrainis who share the Shiite Muslim faith of Iran.

At a time of rising tension between Washington and Tehran, the scare-mongering in Bahrain shows how America's geopolitical standoff with Iran is paralleled by much older animosities between the Muslim world's two great traditions, Sunni and Shiite. The Arab world is majority Sunni while Persian Iran is mostly Shiite. In a dangerous dynamic, legitimate concerns about Tehran's intentions are being overlain with phobias and political calculation as Arab governments, rabble-rousing politicians and clerics fan sectarian fears.

Washington views Iran as a rogue nation that arms militias in Iraq, wants to build a nuclear bomb and seeks Israel's destruction. From Arab kingdoms on the Persian Gulf to Lebanon on the Mediterranean, however, Iran is also viewed through another prism, as a non-Arab, and, for some, heretical power intent on expanding the clout of itself and fellow Shiites at the expense of the region's Sunni establishment.

Containing Tehran has become a major American foreign-policy goal. But for these countries, Iran is a hot-button domestic issue as well. Bahrain is ruled by a Sunni royal family but roughly 70% of the populace is Shiite. The nation was shaken by a series of clashes this month between Shiite protesters and security forces dominated by Sunnis.

Saudi Arabia frets about the Shiite minority who inhabit its oil-producing eastern region next to Bahrain. Kuwait, too, has a sizable Shiite minority. Lebanon's Sunni-dominated government is under threat from Hezbollah, a Shiite militia.

Even countries with hardly any Shiites, such as Egypt and Jordan, have domestic concerns. By denouncing Iran (and by association Shiites), leaders hope to outflank their most virulent critics -- militant Sunni Islamists, who often fume against Shiites as heretics. They also seek to blemish the reputation of Hassan Nasrallah, the Shiite Hezbollah leader whose radical views spook Sunni leaders but delight some of their citizenry.

When the U.S. invaded Iraq in 2003, it believed that the overthrow of Saddam Hussein, a Sunni, would seed tolerant democracy there and elsewhere. The war instead uncorked pent-up sectarian tensions in Iraq, pitting the country's once-dominant Sunni minority against its long-oppressed Shiite majority. The Iraqi chaos also has emboldened neighboring Iran to flex its muscles in Iraq and beyond, further stirring passions rooted in centuries of theological, political and ethnic rivalry.

DOJ_NMG_0136214

Until recently, Washington focused on Sunni threats, from Sunni insurgents in Iraq to the remnants of al Qaeda, a Sunni outfit. In his January state of the union address, however, President Bush also warned of the menace posed by Shiite extremists who "take direction from the regime in Iran." It has become clear, he said, that "we face an escalating danger" from militant Shiites "determined to dominate the Middle East." This reassessment of America's enemies underpins what Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has hailed as a "realignment in the Middle East" -- a drawing together of Sunni-led Arab countries against Iran.

Some experts on the region warn that America's standoff with Iran is exacerbating Sunni-Shiite rivalry and pushing the U.S. into some unruly company. Indeed, America now unintentionally finds itself on the same page as Sunni firebrands who loathe America but sometimes hate Shiites even more. Much of the most venomous anti-Iranian rhetoric comes from militants whose views echo Osama bin Laden's.

Anti-Shiite fervor, says Vali Nasr, a professor at the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, Calif., is "part of the DNA" of America's biggest foes, Sunni extremists. In recent testimony to the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, he urged a cooling of tempers with Iran. "It will boomerang back against us," he says.

Shiites make up 15% or less of the world's Muslim community, but in many Sunni eyes they hold outsize influence because of Shiite-ruled Iran, which now rivals and sometimes even eclipses Israel as an object of loathing. On the gallows in Baghdad at the end of December, Saddam Hussein used his last words to denounce Americans and "Persians," or Iranians. He didn't name Israel.

A lexicon of Arab polemic previously dominated by "Zionists" and "Crusaders" -- i.e., Israel and America -- now has a new villain: the Safawis, or Iranians. The term refers to the Safavid dynasty that established Shiism as Iran's state religion in the 16th century.

The most splenetic diatribes against Iran and Shiites often come from militant Sunnis who previously focused their fire on the U.S. In a January document entitled "Covenant of the Supreme Council of Jihad Groups," for example, a Kuwaiti extremist cleric ranked Iran ahead of the U.S. and Israel in a hierarchy of foes. He railed against the "Safawi enemy that seeks the destruction of Islamic civilization."

Saudi Arabia, a prime source of toxic jihad theology in the past, now also churns out bile against Iran and Shiites. At the end of December, Abdel-Rahman al-Barrak, a senior cleric, labeled Shiites "more dangerous than Jews and Christians." King Abdullah, in a recent interview with a Kuwaiti newspaper, predicted defeat for what he suggested was an Iranian-backed campaign to convert the Sunni world to Shiism and "to diminish [the Sunnis'] historical power."

Fear of Iran, of course, is anchored in real-world issues. Tehran's nuclear-research push has caused widespread jitters and prompted Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia to suggest they might start nuclear programs, too. Iran's involvement in Iraq since the toppling of Mr. Hussein's Sunni tyranny has stirred real fear that Iraq will be led by a Shiite regime loyal to Tehran.

The hostility between Sunnis and Shiites began with the death of the Prophet Muhammad in 632 and a dispute that followed over whether his father-in-law (the Sunni choice) or his son-in-law (the Shiite candidate) was the worthy successor. The schism later fed into another rift now at the heart of the region's rivalries -- between ethnically Persian Iran, which became Shiite, and the ethnically Arab heartland, which became mostly Sunni.

Bahrain, home to some 2,500 U.S. military personnel, plays a key role in U.S. efforts to contain Iran. The Fifth Fleet's command center here controls an armada of U.S. warships -- beefed up this month by a second aircraft-carrier battle group -- that is America's main military lever against Tehran. A banking center and weekend playground for revelers from neighboring Saudi Arabia, Bahrain boasts a vibrant economy and is much more open than most Arab countries.

But as a predominantly Shiite land of roughly 700,000 ruled by Sunnis, Bahrain also sits astride the Muslim fault line shaking the region.

At the beginning of the decade, Bahrain began opening up its political system. As Shiites began to demand real power, however, the opening stalled. Washington, preoccupied by Iraq and then Iran, muted calls for greater democracy here and elsewhere in the region.

"We notice a change in America's view," says Mohammed Bin Mubarak Al Khalifa, the deputy prime minister and a member of the Sunni ruling family. "Iraq was supposed to be a good example. It failed." Democracy's weakness, he adds, is that it gives "too much influence to outsiders" -- which in this part of the world means Iran.

This month, violence flared after police arrested three Shiite activists who had long denounced Sunni political dominance. The trio were released after being charged with illegal agitation and other crimes. In one Shiite area last week, youths hurled fire bombs and riot police fired tear gas. More arrests followed. Newspapers close to the government alleged a conspiracy to sow chaos and reported that Shiites had set up a military training camp. Shiites denounced the reports as fabrication.

Mohammed Khaled Ebrahim, a hard-line Sunni member of Bahrain's parliament, urges visitors to read a document called "The Secret Plan of the Ayatollahs in Light of New Circumstances." It purports to detail an Iranian plot to dominate the Middle East and force Sunnis to convert. In tone and taste for conspiracy it mimics The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a century-old Russian forgery and classic of anti-Semitic propaganda.

"It explains everything," says Mr. Ebrahim, waving an Arabic translation of the supposedly covert, Farsi-language plan. He found it on the Internet.

Though he is a shrill critic of America, he says he supports any effort to restrain Iran. He doesn't want the U.S. Navy to leave Bahrain because this "would clear the area for Iran." This, he says, is "what Shiites want." America is "like a cancer" but Iran is still more dangerous and "much more devious."

The spark for a recent flare-up of Sunni-Shia tension was a modest property investment in Muharraq, a predominantly Sunni area. Five local Shiites, all members of Bahrain's small and centuries-old community of ethnic Persians, pooled their money to buy a decrepit house for around $400,000 from its Sunni owner. They registered the purchase and then got planning permission to tear down most of the structure and rebuild separate new homes. Contractors moved in last spring to start demolition work.

One of the first to ring the alarm was Isa Adwan, a Sunni zealot and part-time preacher who lives next door. Mr. Adwan complained about "Iranians" ruining the neighborhood. A likeminded preacher joined his campaign.

Sitting on the floor of his dingy living room, Mr. Adwan explains that he despises America, too, but thinks Shiites are worse and wishes President Bush well against Tehran. He thinks Shiites have too many children -- he has six himself -- and don't pray at the right time. But most disturbing, says Mr. Adwan, is Shiite reverence for Iranian religious figures, which he believes makes them loyal to Iran, not Bahrain. The house next door, says Mr. Adwan, was just "their first target." Iranians "want to take over the whole neighborhood, the whole country."

The neighborhood tiff reached a wider audience with the posting of the anti-Iranian leaflets. The tracts infuriated Shiites and also moderate Sunnis. Police quickly tore them down. "These things are very dangerous," says the Sunni governor of Muharraq, Salman Bin Hindi.

Instead of fading, the fear of an Iranian plot was then fanned by local media. A flurry of articles reported that officials had uncovered a secret plan by Iran to buy up land using local Shiite proxies. Authorities, prodded by Sunni politicians, formed a committee to investigate the Iranian connection.

As campaigning heated up for elections in November and December for Bahrain's largely powerless parliament, several Sunni hopefuls grabbed onto the issue. They claimed that an Iranian state-owned bank and the Iranian Embassy were financing home purchases by Shiites.

"We sniffed something very strange," recalls Isa Ahmed Abul Fateh, a Sunni former banker who was in a tight race for a seat in Muharraq, a small island. Denunciations of Iran became a big part of his campaign. Iran, he says, has been buying up land in Basra, Iraq, and "maybe they have the same objective in Bahrain."

Rivals slammed the fear-mongering -- and lost. Islamists -- both Sunni and Shiite -- won all but a handful of seats. The big losers were secular candidates who bridge the sectarian divide.

In the middle of the real-estate flap, a bombshell hit: A British national of Sudanese origin who had worked as a government consultant released a report that, backed by official documents, detailed a campaign by some hard-line Sunni officials to manipulate sectarian tensions, exploit fears of Iran and entrench Sunni dominance. One of the leaked documents was a policy paper that warned, among other things, that Shiites were buying property in Muharraq.

The former consultant, Salah Al Bander, says he sent his findings to the royal family last August and, when he received no response, later sent copies to the American, British and German embassies and to the local press. He was promptly expelled to Britain. After a burst of press coverage, the government charged the former consultant with stealing documents and other offenses. He denies doing anything wrong and says he hasn't received any notification of the charges.

Another policy paper recommends that Bahraini authorities play on U.S. hostility toward Iran and "explain to the American embassy and the international community in general" that Bahrain's main Shiite party is a Bahraini version of Hezbollah, the Iranian-backed Lebanese militia.

It is unclear whether the proposals were ever acted on or when they were made. But, say Shiite activists, they reflect the mindset of at least some in the government.

"The government strategy is to invest in anti-Iranian feeling in the West, particularly in America," says Mr. Bander, the former consultant, who is himself a Sunni.

Sheik Mohammed, the deputy prime minister, derides Mr. Bander's claims as a "mockery" but declined to comment in detail, saying the case is now in the hands of the judiciary.

At the end of September, the five Shiites who bought the house next to Mr. Adwan received a letter from the Ministry of Municipalities and Agriculture. It ordered them to sell their property, which by this point had been mostly demolished to make way for rebuilding. The letter gave no explanation other than citing a 1975 decree allowing forced purchases in "the public interest." The Shiites ignored the order. Police arrived to force their contractors to stop work.

In December, Muharraq's governor, Mr. Bin Hindi, announced that he would start vetting all property deals as a part of what he said was a drive to preserve old buildings. Shiite activists howled in protest, accusing the government of sectarian zoning.

The property next to Mr. Adwan is still empty. Its Shiite owners recently received a second letter ordering them to sell. They're haggling over compensation. The committee looking into Iran's role hasn't found any Iranian connection. But says Mr. Adwan, Iranian influence has been rolled back a few yards. Had the Shiites moved in, "I'd be surrounded on all sides."

Iran Says It Launched A Suborbital Rocket (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 25 — Iran announced Sunday that it had launched a research rocket that attained a suborbital altitude, a test that appeared to move it closer toward its aim of putting its own satellites into space.

Initially, the director of the Aerospace Research Center, Mohsen Bahrami, was quoted by the Iranian Student News Agency on Saturday as saying that the rocket, carrying a research cargo, “was launched successfully into space.” But he did not disclose any information about the altitude the rocket reached or when it was launched. The state television also reported the news on Sunday.

Ali Akbar Golrou, another official at the center, told the Fars News Agency on Sunday that the rocket was a so-called sounding rocket carrying atmosphere-testing equipment that rose 94 miles before falling back to earth by parachute, he said.

“The rocket was launched only for scientific and research purposes,” Mr. Golrou was quoted as saying. “Some of the news agencies have reported that a missile has been launched into space, which is false,” he said, referring to earlier reports that the launching might have been a weapons test.

A test rocket capable of reaching greater altitudes would have had significant meaning not only for Iran’s effort to put satellites into orbit, but also for developing a transcontinental ballistic missile, making it a topic of keen interest to other countries. The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution on Dec. 23 that imposed a ban on trade of goods or technology related to Iran’s nuclear and missile programs. Iran refused to comply with a two-month deadline in the resolution to suspend its uranium enrichment program, and now, the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council are meeting in London on Monday to discuss possible further sanctions.

Mr. Bahrami told the Iranian Students News Agency that the cargo intended for research was produced jointly by the Aerospace Research Center and the Ministry of Defense.

Iran launched its first satellite, known as Sina-1, from a Russian rocket in 2005. But it said that it wanted to improve its Shahab-3 missile, which has a range of 1,250 miles, to launch satellites. Iran says it needs to launch four more satellites by 2010 to increase the number of people with access to telephones or cellphones to 80 million from 22 million, and to increase the number of Internet users to 35 million from 5.5 million.

Defense Minister Mohammad Najar said that "building satellites, launchers, launching the first satellite of Sina with Russia and entering the space club, creating missile test centers and expanding its infrastructure and training personnel are among the ministry's plans," the daily Etemad Meli quoted him as saying Sunday.

Science and Technology Minister Mohammad Soleimani said Iran planned to accelerate its space program, the students news agency reported. "Investment in space is very serious and requires time," he said, "but we are trying to speed it up."

Cheney Arrives In Persian Gulf For Talks (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, February 26, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney landed in the U.S.-allied Arab monarchy of Oman on Sunday and went directly to talks with its foreign minister, Omani government officials said.

A U.S. embassy spokesman in Oman declined to detail Cheney's plans or the focus of his visit to the sparsely populated oil-producing state, which allows the United States use of four air bases. But an Omani government official said Cheney was to discuss regional security issues, including the U.S. standoff with Iran over its nuclear program. The official, in the capital Muscat, spoke on condition of anonymity because he was unauthorized to speak to the press.

Oman sits across the strategically important Strait of Hormuz from Iran, through which two-fifths of the world's oil passes.

The sultanate allows the United States to use the air bases — including one just 50 miles from Iran — for refueling, logistics and storage of pre-positioned military supplies. Little has been revealed publicly about U.S. military ties with the reclusive country, a deeply sensitive topic inside Oman, an isolated country on the southeastern corner of the Arabian peninsula that has been a quiet U.S. military ally for decades.

The country's cooperation with the U.S. military appears to have dwindled over the past few years, but renewed U.S. access to its bases would give a huge boost to any American action on Iran.

"The Omanis are very careful not to associate themselves with American forces. There are major objections to U.S. activities in Oman and they don't want a large visible presence," said Mustafa Alani, a Gulf Research Center military analyst.

An Omani Foreign Ministry official said Foreign Minister Yousuf bin Alawi bin Abdullah was to urge U.S. support for an immediate revival of the Palestinian-Israeli peace process.

Cheney's stopover could be seen as an attempt to ratchet up military pressure on Iran ahead of a meeting by the U.N. Security Council that will discuss tightening of sanctions imposed over its disputed nuclear program.

The visit to Oman was Cheney's second during his time as vice president. In March 2002, Cheney toured U.S. installations at the Masirah Island Air Base, which hosted U.S. B-1B bombers, C-130 transports and U.S. Special Forces AC-130 gunships during the war in Afghanistan, according to press and research reports.

Cheney left Australia on Sunday after a three-day visit to thank the government for contributing troops to Iraq and Afghanistan. He had earlier visited Japan and Guam.

A White House spokeswoman said the vice presidential plane had an electrical problem after leaving Australia earlier Sunday. Reporters on the plane said a power surge during the flight disabled the cabin's electrical outlets. The problem was fixed during a planned stop in Singapore.

A Congressional Research Service report said the Pentagon extended U.S. basing rights in 2000 by providing $120 million to Oman to upgrade its al-Musnanah air base, which sits next to the Strait of Hormuz.

CRS reported 550 U.S. troops were based in Oman as recently as 2004. But that number appears to have slipped to around 270 last year, mainly U.S. Air Force and Navy personnel, some of whom are training the Omani air force, according to the Dubai-based Gulf Research Center.

The CRS report said the Air Force maintains access rights to four Oman air bases, al-Musnanah; al-Seeb, just outside the capital Muscat; Thumrait, near the southern coast; and the Masirah Island Air Base, in the Arabian Sea.

Oman's Masirah air base was the staging base for the failed U.S. attempt to rescue 66 American hostages from the former U.S. embassy in Tehran in 1979.

Oman is led by the reclusive Sultan Qaboos, who overthrew his father in 1970. Qaboos has focused on modernizing Oman, but at a slower pace than the frenetic growth transforming neighboring United Arab Emirates and Qatar.

Hizbullah Builds New Line Of Defense (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, February 26, 2007

The metal sign dangling from a shiny new chain reads: "Warning. Access to this area is forbidden. Hizbullah."

The notice strung between two concrete blocks on a hillside overlooking the Litani River, is just one indication that the Shiite militants have relocated here to build a new line of defense.

Hizbullah's strengthening presence just across the Litani – the northern border of the zone UN peacekeeping forces and Lebanese troops have been policing since last summer's war between Hizbullah and Israel – coincides with a series of land purchases here by a Shiite businessman with ties to the militant group and, critics say, with funds from Tehran.

While analysts say the military buildup does not necessarily signal any intention by the Iranian-supported militants to launch a fresh round of fighting, they say it is a troubling sign that Hizbullah is rearming just out of sight of the United Nations.

Regionally, say critics, that means Iran could be rebuilding its ally's military capability inside Lebanon and could strike again at Israel. "If you have a major Iranian- American clash, one thing we fear is that the Iranian reaction could be from Lebanon," says Marwan Hamade, Lebanon's telecommunications minister and political opponent of Hizbullah.

Hizbullah has chosen to abandon its former stronghold in Lebanon's UN-patrolled southern border district where its fighters withstood Israel's month-long onslaught last summer.

In that area, the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) has swelled to six times its former size with reinforcements from NATO countries such as France, Italy, and Spain. They have been joined by some 20,000 Lebanese troops and together they man around 100 checkpoints and conduct 500 patrols day and night, UNIFIL officials say.

To be sure, Hizbullah's fighters continue to live in the southern border villages and keep a close eye on movements along the Israeli border and on the newly arrived European UN troops. But UNIFIL officials say that they have seen no armed fighters since September and that Hizbullah's former "security pockets" and bunkers have been abandoned.

"Some arms caches have been found, but they are from before the war. There have been no instances of attempts to smuggle weapons into the area," says Milos Strugar, UNIFIL's senior adviser.

But now, locals say, Hizbullah is seen more frequently in these remote hills just north of the Litani. "They have always been in the area but there's a lot more movement now," says one man who lives in the vicinity but requested anonymity due to the sensitivity of the subject.

On a brush-covered hillside overlooking the Litani River, two Hizbullah fighters wearing camouflage uniforms and carrying rifles and walkie-talkies emerged from the bushes beside a stone track. They take the name of a visiting reporter and politely – but firmly – say that no entry is permitted into the area.

Less than a mile to the west, another Hizbullah position is guarded by an armed and uniformed fighter sitting in a small hut with a landline telephone.

According to one veteran Hizbullah fighter, during the war, long-range rockets were launched at Israel, around 10 miles to the south, from underground firing positions in this same area.

Lebanese troops man checkpoints along the main roads here, but are not interfering with Hizbullah's activities. With Hizbullah refusing to disarm and the Lebanese government and Army incapable of dismantling it by force, the fate of the group's arms remains an intractable political dilemma.

Hizbullah does not deny that it is replenishing its war-depleted stocks. Three weeks ago, a truck filled with rockets and mortars destined for Hizbullah was discovered by Lebanese customs police. Hizbullah asked that the weapons be returned, but the Lebanese minister of defense refused, saying they would be handed over to the Lebanese Army.

DOJ_NMG_0136219

In a speech on Feb. 16, Hizbullah chief Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah admitted that the group was "transporting weapons to the front [in the south]."

"We have weapons of all kinds and quantities, as many as you want. We don't fight our enemy with swords made of wood," he said.

Still, the extent of the military buildup in these "security pockets" north of the Litani is unclear given the ingenuity of Hizbullah's engineers and the strict secrecy under which the group operates. Before the war last summer, Hizbullah spent six years secretly building bunkers, tunnels, and firing positions along the border with Israel.

In one case, a bunker complex 100 feet underground covering an area of almost a square mile was built within 300 yards of a UNIFIL observation post and an Israeli army position on the border, but its existence remained hidden until after the war.

"They let us see certain things like their observation posts along the border fence, but all the time they were building an underground city in the south that we never knew existed," says Timur Goksel, who retired as UNIFIL's senior adviser in 2003.

Hizbullah's area of deployment north of the Litani is populated by Shiites, Christians, and Druze who live in small villages and farmsteads tucked into the folds of these remote mountains.

For the past year, Ali Tajiddine, a Shiite businessman who traded diamonds in West Africa before branching into property development and construction, has been snapping up vast tracts of land in the district from impoverished Christian and Druze property holders.

On one barren windswept hillside, a new community called Ahmadiyeh is being built from scratch with houses and shops surrounding a stone quarry owned by Mr. Tajiddine. Some two-thirds of a nearby Druze village called Sraireh has been bought up and more than 440 acresof land has been purchased from the nearby Christian hamlet of Qotrani where 30 buildings are under construction and have been sold to Shiites, according to local residents.

"There's no living to make here, so people are selling their land and moving," says one of the 350 remaining residents of Sraireh, which has seen 80 percent of its population leave, mainly to the Druze-dominated Chouf mountains farther north. He says that Tajiddine was paying in cash whatever amount was requested by property owners.

Walid Jumblatt, leader of Lebanon's Druze and arch foe of Hizbullah, says that the land is being purchased with Iranian funds delivered to Hizbullah and disbursed by Tajiddine. Tajiddine's connections to Hizbullah are widely known locally in south Lebanon. One of his relatives was arrested in Antwerp, Belgium, in May 2003 in a case involving diamonds from West Africa and suspected money laundering on behalf of Hizbullah.

Mr. Jumblatt says the intention is to create a Shiite belt spanning the northern bank of the Litani, allowing Hizbullah freedom to operate while severing Christian and Druze districts from each other.

"I have bought some land in Sraireh to encourage people to stay," he says. "But I can't compete financially with Iran."

But Hizbullah officials dismiss the allegations as unfounded. "Walid Jumblatt likes to stir calm waters," says Sheikh Naim Qassem, Hizbullah's deputy leader. "Since when was Lebanon a series of cantons where Shiites can only buy land in Shiite areas?"

Tajiddine also plays down the sectarian nature of his business dealings, arguing that the area in question is only a "tiny fraction" of his nationwide property developments. "The buildings are for my employees who work in the quarries. I have employees who are Shiites, Druze, Sunnis, and Christians."

But the remaining residents of Qotrani and Sraireh question Tajiddine's interest in this remote district of south Lebanon. "There's nothing here. This is not an area for investment," says one, gesturing at the surrounding brush-covered mountains.

Israeli Troops Place Curfew On West Bank City (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 25 — The Israeli Army put the large West Bank city of Nablus under curfew on Sunday in one of the biggest military operations there in two years.

DOJ_NMG_0136220

The Israeli forces discovered an explosives laboratory in Nablus, the second one found in two days, containing pipe bombs, explosive materials and a hand-held Lau guided missile and launcher that apparently had belonged to the Israeli Army, said Maj. Avital Leibovich of the Israeli Army.

It was not immediately clear whether the missile had been stolen or purchased.

The operation began Saturday and intensified before dawn on Sunday, with nearly 100 Israeli jeeps and armored vehicles moving into Nablus, blocking main roads. Troops began sweeps of the closely packed old city.

Some Palestinians responded by throwing stones or chunks of concrete, or by firing weapons. Two Israeli soldiers were slightly wounded, the army said, and six Palestinians were wounded, most by rubber-coated bullets, Palestinian medics said.

Two Palestinians were arrested and more than 30 detained for questioning, most of whom were released by nightfall on Sunday, Major Leibovich said.

Nablus, one of the largest cities in the West Bank, is a center for Palestinian militants, and the Israeli Army regularly patrols there. But this operation, the army said, was devised to "trim back" militant groups who had been stockpiling matériel, and to arrest some militants.

Hamas, which is more secretive in the Israeli-occupied West Bank than it is in Gaza, has been organizing in Nablus. It has quietly recruited members for a West Bank version of its police force in Gaza, known as the Executive Force, which it formed because the existing Palestinian police force is dominated by the rival Fatah faction.

Some 10,000 people in the center of Nablus were said to be under curfew. School classes were canceled. The Israeli Army also took over local television and radio stations, warning that the clampdown would remain in effect for several days, Palestinian residents said.

Saeb Erekat, a Palestinian negotiator and an aide to the Palestinian Authority's president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, said, "This will undermine the efforts that are being made to sustain the cease-fire with Israel."

In a statement, Mr. Abbas said, "This aggression by the Israeli occupation government is like cutting the road forward after all our efforts to find peace."

In Gaza, Hamas officials said the raid had been intended to undermine efforts at completing a unity government that included Hamas and Fatah ministers. "We question why these military campaigns are increasing now," said Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Hamas-led government.

Referring to the recent talks between Palestinian leaders in Saudi Arabia, he said, "This indicates the Israeli government is trying to turn what was agreed upon in Mecca into a failure."

A Hamas legislator also criticized King Abdullah II of Jordan for asking that a unity government meet international requirements and recognize Israel.

"I asked myself, What did the king offer to lift the siege on the Palestinian people and was he a part of the Arabic system or a part of another one?" said the lawmaker, Yehia Moussa.

In an interview broadcast Saturday night on Israeli Channel 2, King Abdullah said, "There is Arabic and international harmony, and the upcoming Palestinian government must abide by this harmony."

Elsewhere, a Jewish settler was stabbed to death Sunday near the West Bank city of Hebron, The Associated Press reported. The police said that it was unclear who killed the man, and that they were not ruling out a Palestinian attack, The AP said.

Israeli Troops Raid West Bank City (USAT)

USA Today, February 26, 2007

Israeli security forces placed large areas of Nablus under curfew Sunday and conducted house-to-house raids in the largest military operation in the West Bank since July. Brig. Gen. Yair Golan said the operation was crucial to stop militant attacks against Israel. The army seized TV and radio stations, ordered people to stay indoors and said the clampdown would remain in effect for several days. The army said the curfew was to limit civilian casualties.

"We condemn this military incursion," said Saeb Erekat, a confidant to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. "This will undermine the efforts that are being made to sustain the cease-fire with Israel."

Prodi likely to stay in power

Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi's center-left coalition has secured enough support to win a confidence vote this week that will assure his continuation in power, a top ally said. "We have the majority," said Piero Fassino, who leads the coalition's largest party. Coalition partners committed to support Prodi's 12-point program. Prodi resigned Wednesday after losing a parliamentary vote on foreign policy, including keeping Italian troops in Afghanistan.

Guinea ruler agrees to demands

Guinea President Lansana Conte agreed to pick a new prime minister from a list proposed by opponents, a move that will end a general strike that has crippled the West African nation since Feb. 12.

"The strike will be lifted," union negotiator Ousmane Souare said. On Friday, the parliament rejected Conte's request to continue martial law, which has curbed street protests. Conte, 72, seized power in a 1984 coup. Political unrest has killed scores of people this year.

Pirates hijack U.N. aid ship

Pirates off the Horn of Africa hijacked a ship hired by the United Nations' World Food Program to carry aid to Somalia. "They have not made any demands," said Andrew Mwangura, director of the East African Seafarers Assistance Program.

Leo van der Velden, the food program's deputy country director for Somalia, said the Kenyan-owned freighter MV Rozen was empty after its 12-man crew had unloaded goods.

Out Of Gaza, Settlers In The Cold (LAT)

By Vita Bekker

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

NITZAN, ISRAEL — The wood-framed photo stands atop the television set, an obstinate reminder of what Avi Burstein's family lost.

In it, Burstein, his wife and four children are hugging one another on the green lawn of a sprawling red-roofed house. The tanned faces of the two grown sons stare bitterly into the camera. Their younger sisters, in long denim skirts with their brown hair pulled back, wear sad expressions.

The shot was taken hours before Israel removed more than 8,000 Jewish settlers, including the Bursteins, from the Gaza Strip in the summer of 2005.

"Imagine," Burstein said, a green knit skullcap covering his graying hair, as he peered at the photo through dark-rimmed glasses. "A person builds a house with his own 10 fingers. And then one day it's all erased."

But more than his home is gone. Burstein, 49, a farmer who grew lettuce, tomatoes and roses in greenhouses for export, has been jobless since the evacuation.

The Bursteins live in this southern Israeli community about 15 miles north of the Gaza Strip along with the biggest group of Gaza evacuees, numbering in the hundreds. Their temporary prefabricated house is less than half the size of the one they lost.

Straining to meet daily expenses, Burstein already has spent one-third of the compensation his family received to build a permanent home.

Other Gaza evacuees are in a similar fix. Many are older than 50 and unskilled for available jobs, an evacuees committee said. Others who restarted their businesses are losing money because costs in Israel are higher than in the Gaza Strip.

At this point, a quarter of the Gaza evacuees remain unemployed. And in more than 21 sites designated to become their permanent communities, construction has been delayed by the red tape of a resettlement program that has cost the Israeli government more than $2 billion.

The evacuees' predicament is a measure of the decline in political power of Israel's settler movement. It also is an indication of the difficulties Israel may encounter in any evacuation of the much larger number of settlements in the West Bank, considered an inevitable part of any final peace accord with the Palestinians. Only four small settlements in the northern West Bank were evacuated at the time of the Gaza withdrawal.

Israel's unilateral pullout from Gaza, led by then-Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, was widely welcomed by the international community as a step toward reviving long-moribund peace talks with the Palestinians. It was the first withdrawal from territories captured during the 1967 Middle East War and claimed by the Palestinians as part of a future state.

Most Israelis supported Sharon's "disengagement" from Gaza, which included the closing of Israel's military bases in the coastal strip. But the settlers, viewed by most Israelis as obstacles to peace, protested their "expulsion" from land they consider part of Jews' biblical birthright.

After Sharon suffered a debilitating stroke in January 2006, Ehud Olmert inherited the leadership of his newly formed centrist Kadima party, founded on a platform aiming to redraw Israel's borders.

Olmert was elected to succeed Sharon as prime minister in March 2006 on a pledge to withdraw many of the 250,000 settlers in the West Bank, a plan supported by the United States. The idea was shelved after Israel's war with Hezbollah last summer ended without clear resolution, weakening Olmert's government.

But the settler movement has not recovered.

The National Religious Party and the National Union, far-right parties closely identified with the movement, won a total of nine seats out of 120 in last year's parliamentary elections, and are part of the opposition. They had 11 seats between them in the previous parliamentary term, when they were initially part of the governing coalition.

Their decline is attributed in part to voter disappointment over their failure to influence the government to stop the withdrawal, political analysts say.

Another sign of the movement's waning power is the fact that few Gaza evacuees have chosen to restart their lives in the West Bank.

"People who in the past would have been considered perfect nominees for settling there are more hesitant because they're afraid they'll face the same future," said Yair Sheleg, a researcher at the Jerusalem-based Israel Democracy Institute and a columnist for the Haaretz newspaper.

Since the Gaza pullout, the settler movement has succeeded in pressing the government to support settlement expansion in the West Bank, in violation of Israel's commitment to freeze such activity under a 4-year-old U.S.-backed peace proposal known as the road map, with which neither side has complied.

Dror Etkes of Peace Now, an Israeli advocacy group that opposes settlements, said the settler population in the West Bank has continued to grow at a rate of about 5% a year in the last decade, mostly from births, and new construction has averaged about 1,500 housing units annually.

But the settlers have failed in efforts to persuade the government to establish new settlements in the West Bank. Defense Minister Amir Peretz approved plans in December to build a new housing outpost for Gaza evacuees on the site of an abandoned army base in the northern Jordan Valley, but an international outcry forced him to freeze construction a month later.

For many Gaza evacuees, their frustration has less to do with where they are allowed to relocate than how to make ends meet.

From his tiny office on the premises of what used to be a barber shop, about nine miles east of the city of Ashkelon, Lior Kalfa accuses the government of mishandling the evacuees' troubles.

"The system is doing all it can to wear us out," Kalfa, chairman of the evacuees committee, said.

Kalfa says the compensation settlers received for their Gaza homes is too little to allow them to build similar houses in southern Israel, where most have relocated.

Each family received between $70 and $93 per square foot of their former homes, he said, but in southern Israel building costs range from $90 to $110 per square foot.

Evacuees also say that compensation for their businesses, such as retail shops, factories and greenhouses, has been insufficient for them to start anew.

And they say Israeli law doesn't pay farmers for the loss of several growing seasons or compensate other business owners for the time it takes them to reestablish their companies.

"The Finance Ministry didn't want to create a costly precedent," Kalfa said. "They're worried about the financial significance of, God forbid, another withdrawal."

DOJ_NMG_0136223

Avigdor Itzchaky, a member of Knesset, or parliament, with Olmert's Kadima party, acknowledged that the law had several "distortions" on payouts and he was mediating between the evacuees and the government to resolve them.

Criticism of the government's resettlement program has crossed political lines. Leading public figures who supported the Gaza pullout, including writers Amos Oz and A.B. Yehoshua, issued a petition this month warning the government that continued neglect of the evacuees "may erode the state's legitimacy" should it try to withdraw settlers from the West Bank.

Some of the problems stem from the fact that most Gaza evacuees rejected direct contact with the government until after the withdrawal. Nor did it help that the government agency created to administer the evacuation became fully operational only six months before the pullout.

Some evacuees won't let their disappointment get in the way of establishing new, remote settlements along Israel's desolate frontier lands.

Clad in a long beige skirt and black sweater, Dikla Cohen stood on a barren hill just east of the southern Israeli city of Kiryat Gat, surrounded by mostly hilly, rocky terrain speckled with patches of woods.

Two days earlier, Prime Minister Olmert had toured the area and promised to step up plans for seven new communities in Israel, mostly for Gaza evacuees. They would be situated less than a mile from the barrier separating Israel from the West Bank.

Cohen, 42, said her group's initial request to move to the West Bank was rejected by the government.

"We searched for a piece of land that Israel hasn't yet developed," said the mother of nine, with a gleam of eagerness in her blue eyes. "The government betrayed us with the evacuation, but they won't succeed in breaking my ideology."

Court Asked: Israel Still 'Occupying' Gaza? (CSM)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Christian Science Monitor, February 26, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice last week held up improvements in Gaza's only commercial link to the outside world as evidence of progress in Israeli-Palestinian relations.

But Sunday the Karni crossing at the Israel-Gaza border became the focus of a dispute in Israel's Supreme Court between human rights groups and the government. At issue: Does Israel have a responsibility to alleviate delays – lasting up to three months – in imported goods?

The debate highlights Gaza's murky legal status and whether Israel's control over the impoverished strip's key access points still determines it as an occupying power, even though it withdrew troops a year and a half ago.

The Supreme Court has yet to rule on the petition, submitted when Israel had shut down most crossings amid a military offensive there.

Human rights groups say Israel exercises an "invisible hand" in Gazans' daily lives because it can regulate commercial goods coming or leaving the territory. "The only way Gaza residents can receive a crate of milk ... and a shipment of medicines is through Israeli-controlled crossings,' " says Sari Bashi, the director of Gisha, an Israeli human rights group that cosponsored the petition. "Only Israel can fulfill this obligation to the residents of Gaza."

According to a Palestinian commercial group, the Karni crossing was open an average of five hours a day in December, despite Israel's commitment under a US-brokered accord on borders and access to ensure "continuous" operationover the terminal. Some 182 trucks carrying goods have been allowed in each day in the last half of 2006, compared with nearly twice that number in February 2006.

Still, both sides agree that commercial traffic has recovered in recent weeks – prompting Ms. Rice to cite the flow of goods at Karni to counter an impression that the Israeli-Palestinian peace process was stuck.

In November 2005, Israelis and Palestinians agreed to expand operation at Karni and Gaza's civilian crossing with Egypt at Rafah. Although Israel recently pledged to expand the hours at Karni, inspectors lacked funds to work at the crossing for more than one shift.

The dispute over Gaza's crossings underscores the tradeoff between Israeli security needs and the Palestinian need for the passage of people and commercial goods. In an affidavit submitted to the court, the Palestinian water utility said Gaza's main north-south highway has been flooded by sewage because Israeli authorities haven't let through the needed pipes. An Israeli army official, said that the pipe infrastructure has been dug up by militants and used in Kassam rockets to fire into Israel.

Gisha argued in January that Israel's occupation in Gaza remains in force. It claims that Israel controls everything from land crossings to tax policy to the Gaza population registry.

According to the 1907 Hague Convention on war, the litmus test to determine foreign occupation is whether an outside power exercises "effective control" over another territory.

Israel argues that it no longer occupies the Gaza Strip, having pulled out its last soldiers in September 2005. It points out that it has even turned its civilian passage with Gaza, the Erez crossing, into an international border terminal.

Israel blames the Palestinians for their economic hardship, citing continued cross- border rocket fire and the Hamas-led Palestinian government, which refuses to meet international conditions for budgetary aid.

"The claim that Israel retains effective control today is to ignore reality," says Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry.

The Israeli-Palestinian peace accords in the 1990s defined the Gaza Strip and the West Bank as a single political unit, challenging Israel's claim to have ended the occupation in one area.

"It was a partial evacuation,' " says Yoram Dinstein, an expert on international law at Tel Aviv University. "There are remnants of the occupation, and access is one of those remnants."

U.S., Russia Envoys Seek To Cool Tension (AP)

By Desmond Butler

AP, February 26, 2007

The top U.S. and Russian diplomats on Sunday tried to play down concerns about a Cold War revival set off by Russian President Vladimir Putin's claim that Washington is fostering a global arms race.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov could not put aside disagreements about a proposed U.S. missile defense system in Europe.

Lavrov wrote in Sunday's Washington Post that Putin's recent remarks have been widely misinterpreted.

"From the reaction of some Western journalists and politicians, one would think that the Russian president wished to ignite a blast of anti-American rhetoric to spark another Cold War," Lavrov wrote.

Rice also denied the rhetoric could push the countries back to Cold War-era relations.

"Russia is not the Soviet Union and we have to recognize that," she said. "We are cooperating with the Russians on a number of fronts, on North Korea, on Iran, in nuclear — trying to prevent nuclear terrorism."

Putin said at a conference in Germany this month that the United States "has overstepped its national borders in every way" and is promoting a global arms race. His speech and subsequent Russian statements raised concerns about a proposed U.S. missile defense system in Europe that would include facilities in two former Soviet satellites, Poland and the Czech Republic .

Lavrov said Putin's speech reflected objections about the U.S. exerting its power without consulting other countries.

"He called for a world with many centers of influence where different interests work together, multilaterally, to shape a common denominator on global issues," Lavrov wrote. "What should Russia believe when the United States seeks to place anti-missile systems in Eastern Europe?"

Rice said Russia's objections to the missile defense system were unjustified.

"No one would suggest, anyone who knows anything about this, would suggest that somehow 10 interceptors deployed in Poland are going to threaten the thousands of warheads in the Russian deterrent," Rice said. "It's a ludicrous claim."

U.S. officials have said the interceptors being proposed for Europe could be overwhelmed easily by the size and speed of Russia's vast arsenal of intercontinental nuclear missiles and that the system is aimed at counteracting a potential threat from Iran.

Other parts of the system outside of Europe would be aimed at defending against a possible attack from North Korea.

But in an interview published Sunday, Lavrov repeated Russian concerns that the system would in fact be directed elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0136225

"To retaliate against threats, even imagined ones, radars and anti-missile launch pads wouldn't seem necessary, because the trajectories of the imagined missiles flying from Iran or North Korea go in an absolutely different direction," Lavrov was quoted as saying by the Interfax news agency.

In his op-ed, Lavrov also addressed NATO's expansion into what was the Soviet sphere of influence.

"With the Warsaw Pact dissolved for more than 15 years, why does NATO still spread toward Russian borders?" he wrote.

Rice said NATO no longer threatened Russia.

"I think the expansion of NATO and the expansion of the European Union is, in fact, one of the great stories of the post-Cold War time," she said. "Russia has nothing to fear by having democracies on its borders."

Rice was interviewed on "Fox News Sunday."

Europe Warms To US Missile Shield (CSM)

By Jeffrey White, Contributor To The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, February 25, 2007

Concerns about Iran have reduced opposition to US plans to extend its 'star wars' defense system.

PRAGUE, CZECH REPUBLIC

US plans to extend its "star wars" missile-defense program to Europe, which once dismissed the technology as an unproven cold-war anachronism, are gaining acceptance among governments here.

Despite Russia's mounting opposition, the Czech Republic, Poland, and – as of Friday – Britain have all expressed serious interest in hosting parts of the shield. Other countries traditionally cool to the idea have been notably quiet. The trigger: concern about a nuclear Iran.

"This is all a result of Iran," says Tim Williams, a European security analyst at the Royal United Services Institute for Defence and Security Studies in London. "Governments see that Iranian missiles can hit Europe, and suddenly they are very worried about the threat from ballistic missiles. They have to look at missile defenses."

Sunday, Iranian media reported that the country had launched a rocket into space, raising speculation that Iran was nearing the technological capacity to launch intercontinental missiles. That report, which quoted the head of Iran's aerospace research center, was quickly denied by his deputy, however.

There was no such equivocation from Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who, ahead of Tuesday's UN Security Council meeting on Iran's disputed nuclear program, compared its nuclear drive to a train that has no brakes.

The US, which says that a European shield would intercept ballistic missiles fired from "rogue states" such as Iran, wants to build a radar station here in the Czech Republic and a corresponding base with 10 interceptor missiles in neighboring Poland. After years of talks, the US last month approached the Czech and Polish governments about hosting the shield.

Since then, developments have come quickly. A week ago, Czech Prime Minister Mirek Topolánek met with Polish Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski in Warsaw and said they expected to go along with the plan. Then on Friday, Britain confirmed that Prime Minister Tony Blair has been in talks with the US about stationing antiballistic missiles there as part of the shield.

Czech President Václav Klaus travels to Washington next month to discuss the matter with Vice President Dick Cheney. President Bush is weighing a trip to Poland and possibly here this summer.

Currently two bases – one in Alaska, one in California, believed to host 13 and three missiles respectively – make up the US missile defense shield. Detractors say missile defense technology – in which radars and missile silos work in tandem to pinpoint and then intercept enemy missiles – still remains unproven.

But Mr. Bush has made missile defense a priority: He has earmarked $18.5 billion to be spent by 2009. Czech media reported that the US plans to set aside $118 million for a base in Central Europe this year.

"The US is eager to move quickly on this because they have spent a lot of money and they want something to show for it," says Mr. Williams.

The plan is to start constructing the base and radar station next year, with the shield coming online by 2012.

Russia fears 'arms race'

DOJ_NMG_0136226

Russia, whose Kaliningrad enclave borders Poland, has been the plan's most vocal opponent so far. A Russian general recently threatened Czechs and Poles with a future retaliatory missile strike.

And in Munich earlier this month, Russian President Vladimir Putin said the missile shield would plunge the world into a new arms race, and that the US, Europe, and Russia were on the brink of a new cold war.

"[The proposed shield] is very serious, and it breaks the strategic balance that now exists in Europe," says Alexey Fedotov, Moscow's ambassador to Prague.

Germany chided the US for not informing Russia of its designs on an antiballistic missile base in Poland, but it also appeared to throw some support to the US, calling for a full discussion of the proposal without protests and "anti-American insinuations." France, traditionally Europe's staunchest opponent of missile defense, has been silent on the issue, as have Denmark and Sweden – two countries that have been cool toward past US missile defense plans.

"You don't see the French and Germans kicking up much of a fuss about this," says Williams.

The shift away from opposition to US plans for a missile shield has been subtle and easy to miss, experts say. In a largely unnoticed speech about his country's nuclear strategy, for example, French President Jacques Chirac said last year for the first time that there was room in it for missile defense.

The US plan is moving ahead outside NATO, whose own shield proposal – the Active Load Theater Missile Defense – has dragged on for years in feasibility studies.

But it is NATO, experts say, which sheds some light on Russia's truculent opposition to a US missile base in Europe.

Since the fall of communism, Moscow watched as NATO continued to expand almost to its borders, incorporating most of the countries in the former Eastern Bloc.

"There is a moment when you suddenly remember all the bad things that have been happening for some time. You look at them and you see an array of negative signals, and you cannot ignore them," says Ivan Safranchuk, director of the Moscow branch of the World Security Institute.

But Russia watchers see little likelihood that Moscow will act.

"Russia's response is totally political," says Alexander Golts, who covers security issues for Yezhednyevny Zhurnal, an online newspaper in Russia. "To all serious experts it's obvious that this missile defense cannot threaten Russia's nuclear forces."

Don't look for referendums

The Czech and Polish governments seem poised to move on the US plan without putting it to a pubic vote, despite a growing call in both countries for a referendums. A Czech poll last week put 60 percent of the country against hosting any part of the shield, and in Britain, antinuclear groups are already criticizing the Blair government for wanting to be involved in the US shield.

"What we're seeing now is the product of near on seven years of diplomatic effort led by the Bush administration to get European governments to leave behind the cold-war version of missile defense," says Tom Karako, director of the Claremont Institute, a conservative think tank in Claremont, Calif.

"Now that the cold war is over, these governments have come to the realization that that version ... won't suffice in the future."

Italy's Prodi Set To Revive Government (WSJ)

By Gabriel Kahn

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

ROME -- After resigning as Italy's prime minister last week, Romano Prodi is preparing to resurrect his government with his old cabinet intact and push ahead with his political program.

Keeping his slate of ministers in place could be a positive sign for completing some of the ambitious fiscal and economic goals Mr. Prodi has set.

After Mr. Prodi's administration came undone last week when it lost a Senate vote, President Giorgio Napolitano directed him to rebuild his parliamentary coalition -- which had commanded only a one-vote Senate majority.

DOJ_NMG_0136227

Over the past few days, Mr. Prodi has lured a few new allies to his side in order to bolster his narrow majority in Parliament. He also forced the members of his coalition to sign off on a 12-point document aimed at guaranteeing greater cohesion within the group, which now numbers 10 parties ranging from Catholics to hard-core communists. Among Mr. Prodi's new supporters are the members of a small centrist party founded by a former ally of center-right opposition leader Silvio Berlusconi.

With a new coalition tentatively in place, Mr. Prodi must address Parliament this week before facing confidence votes in the upper and lower houses.

In an unusual development, Mr. Prodi's cabinet is expected to remain unchanged. Past Italian government shake-ups have usually resulted in a shuffling of ministerial posts, as power is redistributed among different parties to maintain a delicate balance.

Mr. Prodi has achieved modest success in reversing years of runaway deficit spending that had risked unraveling the country's public accounts. He has also moved to open up various sectors of the economy -- from auto insurance to legal services -- that had remained buffered from competition.

Still, Mr. Prodi's coalition remains rife with internal divisions, particularly over foreign policy, and it remains to be seen whether he will be able to keep the different parties in line. Among the reasons the government lost the Senate vote last week were disagreements over whether Italian soldiers should remain part of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization-led mission in Afghanistan.

Yesterday, one of Mr. Prodi's most ideologically charged allies, Oliviero Diliberto, head of the Party of Italian Communists, said the brief political crisis had "warned all of us to be more responsible." The government faces a thorny legislative agenda in the coming months, however, including a possible overhaul of Italy's costly pension regime -- an issue that is bound to divide members of Mr. Prodi's coalition.

Italian governments have usually emerged weaker, not stronger, from near-death experiences. Mr. Prodi was jettisoned as prime minister in 1998 after losing a budget measure by a single vote.

Prodi Prepares For Confidence Vote This Week (AFP)

AFP, February 26, 2007

Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi, who resigned over a foreign policy defeat last week only to be reappointed a few days later, will fight for his government's survival as he faces a confidence vote this week.

Parliamentary group chiefs from both houses of parliament are scheduled on Monday to set a date for the vote, with media predictions falling on Thursday in the Senate and Friday in the House of Representatives.

"Il Professore" as the 67-year-old Prodi is known, spent the weekend preparing a presentation of his new, 12 point "non-negotiable" programme which he imposed on his unwieldy centre-left coalition allies last Thursday.

Since securing renewed backing of his coalition partners after intense negotiations, Prodi and his allies believe the embattled former European Commission chief will muster enough votes to survive.

Prodi also got an unexpected boost when he won the support of opposition Senator Marco Follini, once a key ally of former prime minister Silvio Berlusconi.

Piero Fassino, leader of the largest party in Prodi's coalition, welcomed the move on Sunday as "the opening of a new phase" for the government, while the opposition accused Follini of a sell-out.

According to Italy's leading newspaper Corriere della Sera, Prodi's immediate survival is due more to preventing Berlusconi's rapid return to power than any new-found unity breaking out across his multi-hued coalition, which ranges from communist to Catholic parties.

"This agreement has not been made in order to govern but to avoid others regaining power," the newspaper said in an editorial Sunday.

Commentator Ilvo Diamanti, writing in the left-leaning La Repubblica, said "fear of the 'tyrant' Berlusconi is a little weak to keep the coalition together long-term."

Serbia Faces Judgment Day On Bosnia (WT/AP)

By Arthur Max, Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0136228

The Washington Times, February 26, 2007

THE HAGUE -- In one of the most momentous cases in its 60 years, the United Nations' highest court will deliver its judgment today on Bosnia's demand to make Serbia accountable for the slaughter, terrorizing, rape and displacement of Bosnian Muslims in the early 1990s.

If it rules for Bosnia, the International Court of Justice could open the way for compensation amounting to billions of dollars from Serbia, the successor state of Slobodan Milosevic's Yugoslavia. Specific claims would be addressed later.

Such a ruling also would be a permanent stain on Serbia in the eyes of history, regardless of any effort by Belgrade to distance itself from the brutality of those years.

Reflecting the complexities, the 16 judges have deliberated for 10 months since hearing final arguments. Officials at the World Court, as it is informally known, say that reading out the summary of the judgment is likely to take three hours.

The court was created after World War II to adjudicate disputes among U.N. members, most often over borders or treaty violations. Its decisions are binding, without appeal and enforceable by the Security Council.

The Bosnia case touches deep nationalist chords and arouses strong emotions. Among survivors expected to stand vigil outside the baroque Peace Palace while the decision is read are women from Srebrenica, where about 8,000 men were killed in July 1995.

Bosnia first approached the court 14 years ago, during the chaos of Yugoslavia's bloody disintegration. The political landscape has since changed dramatically, with both Bosnia and Serbia separately seeking membership in the European Union.

"This will be a very significant judgment, both from the perspective of the aftermath of the conflict and for international law generally," said Andre Nollkaemper, director of the Amsterdam Center for International Law at the University of Amsterdam.

Other courts already have ruled that acts of genocide occurred during the Bosnian war, when more than 100,000 people were killed in a Bosnian Serbian campaign that gave the world the phrase "ethnic cleansing."

Two Bosnian Serbian officers have been convicted by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. Gen. Radislav Krstic is serving a 35-year prison term for aiding and abetting genocide, and Col. Vidoje Blagojevic is appealing his 18-year sentence for complicity in genocide. Mr. Milosevic died last year in his prison cell in the final weeks of his four-year-long genocide trial.

The World Court case, entirely separate from the tribunal's deliberations, is not about people. Bosnia says the Serbian state must accept blame.

It argues that Serbia's nationalist ideology incited genocidal hatred, its financial and military aid to the Bosnian Serbs gave them the tools for genocide, and Yugoslav army officers actively participated in driving out Muslims.

Serbia says it's not that simple. Genocide, by definition, requires the clear intent to wipe out an ethnic or racial group, in whole or in part, in specific territories. Serbia says it never waged such a systematic campaign.

Moving Kosovo On (NYT)

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

Earlier this month, a United Nations envoy, Martti Ahtisaari, presented a sensible plan for the future of Kosovo. The small Serbian province has been administered by the United Nations since 1999, when NATO went to war to defend its ethnic Albanian majority. Mr. Ahtisaari's proposal would effectively grant Kosovo independence, but with strict limits, extensive international supervision, and protection for the ethnic Serbs and other minorities who live there.

The plan has been attacked by all sides. Kosovo's Serbs, and their allies in Belgrade, say they will never recognize an independent Kosovo. Kosovo's Albanians will accept nothing less.

There are few heroes in this story. Kosovo's Albanians have failed to live up to standards of human rights and democratic governance laid down by the U.N. That is why their independence must be conditional. Kosovo's European stewards have repeatedly delayed decisions on independence, hoping the Serbs' anger would cool. It has not. Further delay, we fear, will not bring the two sides to a consensus.

DOJ_NMG_0136229

The United States and Europe should press the Security Council to quickly endorse the Ahtisaari plan. The international community and NATO — having invested so much in Kosovo — must continue to stay deeply involved. It would not be surprising if, after seven years, interest has flagged. But without more outside help, there is little hope for building a peaceful democracy in Kosovo.

US In Macau To Discuss N. Korea Funds (AP)

By Min Lee

AP, February 26, 2007

A U.S. Treasury Department delegation was in Macau on Monday briefing local officials about the investigation of North Korean bank accounts in the Chinese territory, an American official said.

The visit came about two weeks after a breakthrough agreement in which North Korea agreed to initial steps to abandon its nuclear weapons program. American negotiators have agreed to resolve financial restrictions by mid-March.

North Korea has been especially angry about U.S. restrictions imposed in 2005 on Banco Delta Asia in Macau. Washington alleged the small bank was complicit in North Korea's counterfeiting and money laundering.

The U.S. allegations prompted Macau to freeze about $24 million at Banco Delta Asia. That led banks worldwide to shun North Korean business for fears of losing access to American markets.

On Monday, Dale Kreisher, spokesman at the U.S. Consulate General in Hong Kong, told The Associated Press that the U.S. Treasury delegation was in Macau briefing local officials about the Banco Delta Asia case.

"Discussions (with North Korea) along with the U.S. investigation have brought Treasury to the point where they think they can begin taking steps to resolve the BDA matter," said Kreisher, whose office is also responsible for Macau.

Kreisher declined to say if Washington was ready to lift the sanctions on the bank. He also wouldn't say who was in the delegation and how long it would spend in Macau.

Long Division (WSJ)

By Robert B. Zoellick

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

During President Hu Jintao's visit to the White House last spring, George Bush initiated a conversation over lunch about North Korea, and asked whether Kim Jong Il might consider Deng Xiaoping's pattern of reform. The Chinese president replied that he did not know, but thought Kim wanted to change. He added that when Deng took the risk of opening China in the late 1970s, he was reassured by a non-threatening external environment. Kim, said Mr. Hu, might find it easier to move if he received a positive signal. Mr. Bush replied, "What if we offered him a peace treaty?"

Not long thereafter, Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi had his farewell stop at the White House. When Mr. Bush probed about China's influence with North Korea, Mr. Koizumi suggested that U.S. signals loomed large in Pyongyang's calculations. History had led the Koreans to be suspicious of their neighbors, including China, and Koreans sense the U.S. might be the most important guarantor for Korea's future.

These exchanges illuminate strategic perspectives that underpin the U.S. approach to the recent six-party accord. First, the administration views this initial step as the beginning of a course that extends far beyond North Korea's nuclear program or even peace on the peninsula: The U.S. wants to set a direction for security relations in Northeast Asia for decades to come. Left unchecked, North Korea's nuclear weapons and missiles might build a movement in South Korea and Japan for their own programs. Washington wants the six-party process both to stymie North Korea's programs and develop closer security relations among the participants.

China is already acting as a "responsible stakeholder" by urging North Korea to step back from confrontation. By proposing a peace treaty to replace the 1953 armistice, the U.S. not only seeks to close out this vestige of the Cold War but also to open the way to overcome the painful legacies on the peninsula and in the region dating back to World War II, the Russo-Japanese War of 1904-05, and even the Sino-Japanese War of 1894-95.

The hard work ahead involves not only maintaining pressure to close down all nuclear weapons programs, but steps to build confidence on the peninsula, security assurances and transparency -- between the Koreas, as well as with the neighbors the Koreans may fear more than one another. This process will open the way for returning Japanese abductees, connecting energy and economic support to North Korean reforms, and enhancing cooperation between China and Japan. These conditions would improve the international environment in which the two Koreas could someday end the cruel division of one people.

Second, the administration believes the best way to change North Korean behavior and improve the lives of its people is to combine pressure with an opportunity for North Korea to open to the world step by step. The regime bases its terrible repression on a bizarre self-image that combines superiority and a state of siege. To end this and open eyes to a different world, the other five parties are offering peace and the prospect of normal ties. In line with Mr. Hu's suggestion, Mr. Bush is shaping an external environment that removes the rationalization for keeping the lid on North Korea's stunted development.

Third, the U.S. government recognizes that the forces of history -- and economics -- are on its side, not North Korea's. Having lost a war in Vietnam 30 years ago, the U.S. is winning the peace because of the magnet of its economic dynamism, its central role in the institutions of the world economy, the power of the private sector, and its role as a counterweight in Asia. The trends in world economics, information flows, and technology give America a new type of "strategic depth" that enables it to confidently offer North Korea a path away from isolation. Ironically, as Messrs. Hu and Koizumi observed, a reforming North Korea is likely to perceive the U.S. as a resource and reassurance (as should South Korea).

Of course, this six-party accord is only a portal. North Korea needs to fulfill its September 2005 commitment to abandon all nuclear weapons and programs. North Korea's steps are likely to be halting as it weighs the risks of opening with those of isolation. Yet even if Pyongyang chooses belligerence, U.S. cooperation with the other four parties will position it better to quarantine the dangers. The five can best deter North Korea. They will be best able to prevent the selling of nuclear materials.

President Bush does not view this move as another accord limited to nonproliferation objectives. It opens the way for peace and reconciliation on the peninsula and a means to shape the future security arrangements in East Asia. It is a recognition that America's diplomatic toolkit for dangerous states involves more than threats of force and isolation. The challenge for this administration, and those to come, will be to avoid letting the process slip into minimalist, tactical tradeoffs and instead to maintain strategic vision guiding the diplomacy of opening North Korea.

Mr. Zoellick, a former U.S. trade representative and deputy secretary of state, is vice chairman, international, of Goldman Sachs.

Thais Struggle With Violent Insurgency (NYT)

By Seth Mydans

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

PATTANI, Thailand, Feb. 22 — Some are already calling it war, a brutal Muslim separatist insurgency in southern Thailand that has taken as many as 2,000 lives in three years with almost daily bombings, drive-by shootings, arson and beheadings.

It is a conflict the government admits it is losing. A harsh crackdown and martial law in recent years seem only to have fueled the insurgency by generating fear and anger and undermining moderate Muslim voices.

A new policy of conciliation in the past four months has been met by increased violence, including a barrage of 28 coordinated bombings in the south that killed or wounded about 60 people on Feb. 18.

“The momentum of violence is now beyond the control of government policy,” said Srisompob Jitpiromsri, a political scientist at Prince of Songkhla University here.

“The separatists can pick and choose the time and place of the violence without any effective resistance from the government,” he said. “They have the upper hand.”

Now the insurgents seem to be taking their war to a new stage, pitting local Buddhists against Muslims by attacking symbols of Buddhism with flamboyant brutality.

The two religions had coexisted through the years here, often in separate villages. That mutual tolerance is breaking down now, and there are fears of a sectarian conflict that could flare out of control.

DOJ_NMG_0136231

"Buddhist monks, temples, novices," said Sunai Phasuk, a political analyst with the monitoring group Human Rights Watch. "Buddhist monks have been hacked to death, clubbed to death, bombed and burned to death. This has never happened before. This is a new aspect of violence in the south."

In another new development, said Francesca Lawe-Davies, an analyst with the International Crisis Group, some remote areas had become, in effect, off limits for the police or military, at least temporarily and perhaps permanently.

"It appears in the last year or so that insurgent groups are actually starting to control territory in a more conventional sense," she said.

Some Buddhist and Muslim villages have begun sealing themselves off from one another, and people in both the region's towns and villages say old friendships and patterns of cooperation are being undermined by mistrust.

Entire Buddhist communities have also fled in a "de facto ethnic cleansing," said Zachary Abuza, the author of "Militant Islam in Southeast Asia," in a report published last month. "The social fabric of the south has been irreparably damaged."

About 1.3 million ethnic Malay Muslims form a majority in Thailand's three southernmost provinces — Yala, Narathiwat and Pattani — a tiny percentage of the population of 65 million, which is overwhelmingly Buddhist.

The Muslims have complained of discrimination and attempts at forced assimilation since Thailand annexed the former Sultanate of Pattani a century ago. Armed insurgencies have risen and subsided over the past four decades, but the government may now be facing its most dangerous challenge.

"What is new about the current conflict is the level and degree of violence, the Islamist agenda of the insurgents and their unprecedented degree of cooperation and coordination," Mr. Abuza said.

"The level of violence in Thailand's south has never been higher," he said. "Nor has it been more brutal."

He said in his report that there had been more than 24 beheadings in the past three years and as many as 60 similar attacks.

Human Rights Watch counted more than 6,000 violent episodes over the past three years. It said more than 60 teachers and 10 students had been killed and 110 schools — the most visible signs of central government authority in many places — had been set ablaze.

About half the insurgents' attacks have been against other Muslims, especially those who cooperate with the government, in what appears to be an effort to weaken central control. The victims include not only village chiefs and suspected collaborators but also those who work in government jobs, teach at government-financed schools or work in major sectors like rubber tapping.

All of this adds up to war, Mr. Srisompob said. The military has flooded the region with up to 20,000 new troops; checkpoints have been set up along the roads; soldiers travel in convoys of armored vehicles.

"In the local communities in the red zones, it already is a war situation," he said. "It is different now from last year, from the last two years."

The insurgency is all the more difficult to combat because it does not show its face. Unlike most similar movements, this one has not set out its demands or published a manifesto. It is a collection of violent groups without clear central leadership.

When a Thai commander proposed a new policy of negotiation last year, he said it would be difficult because he did not know whom to negotiate with.

"We are fighting a ghost," said Chidchanok Rahimmula, a lecturer in security at Prince of Songkhla.

The policy of conciliation was put in place by Prime Minister Surayud Chulanont, who took power after Thaksin Shinawatra was ousted as prime minister in a coup in September.

Mr. Surayud apologized for the harsh policies of his predecessor during his six years in office, promised to investigate abuses and restructured the military command for the south.

People in rural areas say soldiers and police officers have become less aggressive and are trying to reach out by attending local fairs and holding dialogues.

Mr. Surayud conceded recently that none of that was working. "We can't see the results in three to four months because the painful feelings of southern people in the past four to five years run deep," he told reporters. "This is not easy to cure."

Indeed, the insurgency has responded by stepping up its violence, apparently in an effort to block any peace agreement. There has been no serious reply to Mr. Surayud's offer of negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0136232

People who live here, both in the villages and urban areas, say they have never been so frightened.

"Muslims feel fear, Buddhists feel fear," said Abdullayi Che-are-sae, 39, a local official in Tapong, a settlement of 200 Muslim families in a red zone near the city of Pattani. "But we don't know who we are afraid of."

At night, he said, the village falls silent as people close their doors and windows and turn off their lights, listening for the sounds of intruders.

Less than a mile down the road, the people of Khlong Tam, a Buddhist village, fall silent, too, he said, sharing the fears of their neighbors.

But the Muslims of Tapong and the Buddhists of Khlong Tam, who were once on cordial terms, have armed themselves and hardly speak to one another now, he said.

Here in the provincial capital, Chidchanok, who is Muslim, said she and her children check under the car every morning for bombs.

"And not only me," she said. "We don't go out at night. We shop at stalls in the street and don't go into the marketplace."

She said that people were afraid now to stand close to a government official or a soldier or police officer, potential targets of bullets or bombs.

"When we are in a restaurant, if we see a soldier or policeman nearby we hurry to leave," she said.

Shopkeepers are wary too. "In the shops near the university, if a soldier or policeman comes to buy something, the owner says, 'Quickly — just buy something and leave.' "

Southern Thailand, she said, had become "a kingdom of terror, a kingdom of fear."

"We really wonder about their identity and how they can be doing this," she said of the insurgents. "They are destroying their own society. They kill the teachers. They kill the teachers who teach their own children."

U.N. Weighs Deploying Force To Chad (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 26, 2007

BAHAI, Chad (AP) — Tribal leaders are desperate for the deployment of a U.N. peacekeeping force along Chad's border with Sudan to protect refugees and stop increasing spillover from the violence in Darfur.

The U.N. Security Council is considering a mission, with up to 10,000 troops, largely because Sudan's government has resisted efforts to send U.N. peacekeepers to Darfur itself.

But Chad's president is worried about inflaming tensions with Sudan, while U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon has warned the Security Council that peacekeepers would face "serious risks" of rebel attacks.

The two countries have strained relations because Chad supports the Darfur rebellion against the Sudanese government, and Sudan strongly backs Chadian rebels settled in Darfur, Western observers say.

Tens of thousands of Darfur refugees live in scorching, wind-beaten camps on Chad's side of the border, competing with Chadian villagers over scarce water and firewood. Various rebel groups and militias roam the vast region.

"We are waiting impatiently for the international force to arrive and protect both the border and the refugees," said Timan Deby, the sultan or traditional ruler of Bahai, a desert outpost in Chad near the Sudanese border.

More than 200,000 people have died since ethnic African tribesmen in Darfur took up arms four years ago, complaining of discrimination by the Arab-dominated Sudanese government. The U.N. blames the Sudanese government's counterinsurgency for the bulk of the atrocities. Of the 2.5 million people who have fled their homes, 230,000 have ended up in refugee camps inside Chad.

Along the frontier, clashes between ethnic groups and cross-border raids are "carried out with impunity," the British aid group Oxfam said recently. Dozens of civilians have been killed in recent weeks, Oxfam said.

So far, none of the 12 refugee camps have been attacked, but several villages have been plundered.

The region's governor, Atom Dillo, said the U.N. force was necessary to stop Sudanese infiltration into Chad, which he said was part of Sudan's strategy to destabilize its neighbor and prevent aid workers from helping Darfur refugees.

Chad's President Idriss Deby has accepted the idea of a U.N. mission on his border in principle. But Western officials in Chad say he is worried the force might be used as a starting point for deployment into Darfur, which would anger Sudan.

"He doesn't want to be seen as facilitating a possible invasion of a neighboring state, even Sudan," said one Western official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the situation's sensitivity.

Ban said Deby has proposed that the U.N. mission be a civilian one. He told the Security Council last week that any peacekeeping mission should help keep peace in refugee camps and deploy at key points to prevent cross-border attacks. But he warned it would carry "serious risks."

Last year, Chadian rebels based in Sudan launched several raids, briefly seizing the major eastern Chad town of Abeche and attacking the capital, N'djamena. Reports of smaller clashes come almost daily.

Col. Vincent Tesnieres, who commands a 1,000-strong French force already deployed in Chad, accused Sudan of providing the rebels with the ground-air missiles that recently helped them down Chadian aircraft.

"What is striking is that we now witness a level of violence completely unknown to Chad before," said Serge Male, the head of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Chad.

The UNHCR says it has a contingency plan for up to 50,000 more people to arrive from Darfur. The agency is trying to relocate the Darfur refugee camps further east from the border to ease the strain on Chad's meager natural resources.

The Chadian army is trying to protect the Darfur refugee camps but can't do much because it needs to focus on protecting the border, said Gen. Kalimi Sangui Abdalla, who commands Chadian military operations on the eastern frontier.

"This is why we will welcome United Nations forces," he said.

Gambian Defends The International Criminal Court's Initial Focus On Africans (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

THE HAGUE, Feb. 25 — The windows of Fatou Bensouda's office high up in the International Criminal Court's headquarters here offer her a sweeping view of orderly Dutch flatlands. But her attention is turned to her native Africa, on the chaos and killing at the heart of the court's first atrocities cases.

Mrs. Bensouda, a 45-year-old Gambian with an open and easy manner, is one of the court's top officials. She is the deputy to the chief prosecutor, and is in charge of trials concerning war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide.

All of the cases set to be taken up by the five-year-old court so far involve Africa, and the people she hopes to try include a list of warlords from four nations, leaders who were most prominent in Africa's recent conflagrations, some of which continue today.

The Darfur region of Sudan looms large on that agenda, because on Tuesday the prosecution plans to file its first criminal charges linked to the conflict between the Sudanese government and the rebel fighters. The prosecution will disclose the names of several senior figures it believes to be among those most responsible for Darfur's devastating bloodshed and human disaster. Other names are expected to follow.

The arrest of the Sudanese suspects is not certain. Court officials said Sudan, while insisting it was cooperating, had done its best to obstruct the court's investigations, ordered by the United Nations Security Council two years ago.

In one of the newly outfitted courtrooms, though, Mrs. Bensouda has already met one of the warlords on her list. Thomas Lubanga, a Congolese citizen and once a powerful militia leader, has been charged with conscripting and abusing children, some as young as 10, during the fighting in the country's Ituri region. He is the only suspect in the court's custody, and his trial, expected later this year, will be the first since the tribunal opened for business in 2002.

Besides Darfur, other cases under investigation involve the civil war in Congo and conflicts in Uganda and the Central African Republic, which have caused tens of thousands of deaths and created millions of refugees. Requests for the investigations, except in the case of Darfur, came from the countries themselves, but that has not prevented concern among Africans that their continent is the new court's principal target.

Mrs. Bensouda calmly dismisses that notion. "This court does not intend to focus only on Africans; it will prove that in the future," she said. "But at the moment, Africa clearly presents the gravest situations."

"This is also our court. It is not imposed on us — we want to believe in it," she continued, pointing out that of the 104 nations who are now full members of the court, among the first to sign on were numerous African states. Some larger nations, including China, Russia and the United States, which distrust the court's powers, are not members.

Mrs. Bensouda's country, Gambia, has mostly escaped the kind of serious violence on which her career now focuses. But it was her revolt against widespread injustice that drew her to the law from an early age.

"I was not suffering, but around me there were many victims of violence and crime, often women, who had no means to defend themselves," she said. One of her uncles, a judge, "had a deep influence on me."

Today, Mrs. Bensouda is a prosecutor who, over the course of a career that now spans two decades, has gained wide experience, rising to become her country's minister of justice and a senior prosecutor at the United Nations tribunal dealing with the Rwandan genocide in the 1990s.

She has long worked for gaining more legal protection for women, by having laws changed at home, and by emphasizing large-scale sexual abuse of women during conflicts.

It was her past as an advocate for women's legal rights that led many women's groups to applaud her election to the International Court — and now, more recently, to criticize her, along with the broader prosecution strategy in Mr. Lubanga's case.

Human rights advocates have said the Congolese trial has been far too narrow in its scope, focusing only on charges of conscription of children by Mr. Lubanga, rather than addressing the worst crimes of the militia under his command.

Last year, eight human rights groups, known for their support for the court, wrote an open letter to the chief prosecutor, Luis Moreno Ocampo, deploring that two years of investigations had not produced a broader range of charges. It was well known, the letter said, that Mr. Lubanga, leader of the Union of Congolese Patriots, a violent militia, "has committed numerous other serious crimes, including murder, torture and sexual violence."

In a meeting with the prosecutor, some human rights activists said that prosecuting only child conscription, which war victims do not regard as serious as the many killings, rapes and mutilations, sent the wrong signal to victims.

"Yes, we have been criticized," Mrs. Bensouda said, "but we believe that the problem of child soldiers is very, very serious. Some are turned into killers, others are used as sex slaves. It is affecting a whole generation of children who are very difficult to reintegrate into society. Fighting is often all they know. It's a problem in many places, and we want to highlight this here."

According to a United Nations report, after the Congolese conflict more than 18,000 children were released from armed groups and thousands more escaped on their own in the past two years. Worldwide, as many as a quarter-million young children are forced to serve in wars, by some estimates.

Torture, rape and other sexual offenses, she said, were very much part of the other investigations before the court. As for Mr. Lubanga, she added, "for now he will be tried for child conscription because that is where we had the best evidence at the time we issued charges."

Sudan, In Mud Brick And Marble (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

KHARTOUM, Sudan, Feb. 25 -- On the desert edges of Sudan's capital, Suzanne Yobu, who has a business degree and a decidedly proper manner, lives in a mud-brick house in a sprawling squatter's camp called Soba Aradi.

Sometimes, though, she attends church in the city, a place booming with oil money that comes mostly from her home region of southern Sudan, which she fled during a civil war that ended in 2005.

In a clankety bus, she passes the airport, where travelers can buy Gucci perfume these days. She rolls along smoothly paved boulevards, some lined with potted geraniums, and past scores of new buildings such as the swirling, white El Fateh Tower, a wildly futuristic hotel that symbolizes the government's vision of Khartoum as a kind of Dubai-on-the-Nile.

Seeing it all, though, Yobu thinks only about how soon she can leave.

"I don't like Khartoum particularly. All this money, the government brought it from the south. They are using our money to build their city and for this war," she said, referring to the crisis in Sudan's western Darfur region. "That is what is happening."

DOJ_NMG_0136235

In Sudan, successive rebel movements -- first in the south and now in Darfur -- have voiced similar grievances against the government. The ruling party in Khartoum, they say, hoards power and wealth at the expense of the rest of the country, physically the largest in Africa.

And in the past several years, the new oil wealth and investment pouring into the city of 6 million have sharpened the contrast between center and periphery.

These days, Khartoum has palm trees wrapped in lights, new Toyota dealerships and an outdoor cafe where patrons can sip lattes under a delicately refreshing mist spray. This week marks the opening of Khartoum's first five-star hotel, Al Salam Rotana -- a swank, $300-a-night palace of marble and haute cuisine for the jet set.

At the city's edges, however, is the detritus of power struggles dating back decades -- a dozen or so squalid, off-the-map camps, most without running water or electricity, and filled with more than 2 million people. Most of the residents are non-Arab Africans who fled the conflict in the south. More recently, people have come here to escape the conflict in Darfur, now in its fourth year.

For people in the camps, the economic boom has had the perverse effect of further undermining their already precarious existence. With land at a premium, the local government of Khartoum state periodically sends police and bulldozers into the camps to plow under swaths of mud houses, pushing people even farther out into the desert, and then sells the cleared land to developers.

The technique, called kasha, was first used by the government in the mid-1980s to force out southerners who had fled the civil war. The current ruling party has "perfected" the technique, said Alfred Taban, editor in chief of the Khartoum Monitor newspaper and a frequent critic of the government.

"They are trying to say, 'You are not welcome here,' " he said. "This boom, it benefits probably 1 percent or less."

In Soba Aradi, people see little difference between the conflict in southern Sudan, the current conflict in Darfur and their own treatment in Khartoum.

Though the war in southern Sudan had a religious dimension in that it involved an attempt by the government to impose Islamic law on a population that is about 30 percent Christian, the primary grievances of the rebel movement there had more to do with access to resources and power. The conflict in Darfur also largely comes down to a struggle for resources.

"It's all the same because it's the same government," said Emmanuel Agrey Lado, a physician's assistant from southern Sudan whose home has been bulldozed twice in two years.

U.S. diplomats, however, have mostly treated southern Sudan and the conflict in Darfur separately.

After intense engagement by the Bush administration, the Sudanese government in 2005 signed a U.S.-backed peace agreement creating a semiautonomous region in southern Sudan, just as government troops were intensifying their onslaught in Darfur.

Last year, the government signed a separate peace agreement with one Darfur rebel group, but fighting between government-sponsored militias and an increasingly fragmented rebel movement has continued.

Since the conflict in Darfur began, as many as 450,000 people have died there from disease and violence and 2.5 million have fled to camps in the area or across the border in Chad.

In recent months, the humanitarian situation in Darfur has worsened, as aid workers have been targeted in the violence and many relief groups have pulled out, leaving hundreds of thousands of people without food, medicine or clean water. President Omar Hassan al-Bashir has consistently rejected a proposal to send in a force of several thousand United Nations peacekeepers to supplement a beleaguered African Union force of 7,000 troops currently deployed in Darfur.

Meanwhile, the peace agreement in the south is faltering, with southern Sudanese officials accusing the government of shortchanging them on oil revenue and failing to implement power-sharing arrangements.

Increasingly, leaders in the south say the fate of their region is very much intertwined with that of Darfur, a notion that hearkens back to the vision of John Garang, the widely popular and iconic leader of the Sudan People's Liberation Movement (SPLM) who died in a helicopter crash in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0136236

Under his leadership, the SPLM had strong ties to rebel groups not only in Darfur, but also in the north and the east, as Garang came to realize that the suffering extended beyond his own region and that the only way to achieve a more just order in Sudan was through a unified movement. After his death, those relationships languished.

In recent weeks, however, the current president of southern Sudan, Salva Kiir Mayardit, has been reaching out to Darfur rebel leaders.

"We have similar grievances," said Deng Alor Kuol, a southerner who became a minister in the national government after the 2005 peace agreement. "Marginalization and neglect."

As Charles Kalisto, a resident of Soba Aradi, put it, "When I see all these tall buildings" in Khartoum, "I ask, 'Why am I staying under a plastic sheet?' "

Kalisto, who has lived in Khartoum for 22 years, has watched the city become clad in scaffolding and layers of new asphalt. He has tried to get a construction job there, to no avail. Kalisto, like many southerners, said it is difficult to get a job if you are not well connected, and even harder if you are not Arab.

So he is leaving, along with hundreds of thousands of others who have returned to the south in the past two years, by truck or a treacherous barge journey down the Nile.

In Soba Aradi last week, he was among a handful of residents who showed up at a big white tent to register for a U.N. program that is helping 150,000 southerners return home in organized bus convoys before the rainy season starts in May.

Kalisto said he and his family have no hesitation about leaving Khartoum, even for all the unknowns of southern Sudan, where villages, farms and nearly every scrap of infrastructure were destroyed in the war and most people are living in tents.

When he arrives, the government will give him seeds, some sticks and a tarpaulin. Still, Kalisto said, "If tomorrow there is a train, we want to go."

Suzanne Yobu will not be far behind. In 2011, there will be a referendum in the south on independence from Sudan, an option she seems to find attractive.

"This government has a different feeling towards the southerners," Yobu said. "They look at the south as inferior and themselves as superior. If we separate, we'll have more revenue, and more freedom also. The south has oil, and gold. But right now, the money is in their hands."

Early Results: Senegal's President Leads (AP)

By Rukmini Callimachi

AP, February 26, 2007

The president of one of Africa's most stable democracies sought another five-year term Sunday, jostling with 14 contenders in a race that may hinge on the votes of young people hungry for jobs.

Early results reported by state-run Senegalese Press Agency indicated President Abdoulaye Wade was in the lead but did not say by how much. It was not known how many votes had been counted, but they included polling stations in key cities including the capital Dakar and Thies, the agency said. The first official results are not expected until later Monday.

Wade has presided over an era of peace rare in a tumultuous part of the continent, and the economy — though struggling by Western standards — is stronger than in many African nations. Still, thousands of desperate youths have already voted with their feet, risking their lives to slip illegally into Europe by sea.

The median age in this country of 12 million is about 19 years, according to U.S. government statistics, compared with 36 in the United States. About half of Senegal's work force is unemployed.

The 80-year-old Wade sounded confident as he cast his ballot in a dusty polling booth in this seaside capital.

"I will win, there is no question about it," he said. "It's evident that the youth have voted for me."

Among the top challengers are two of Wade's former prime ministers: Moustapha Niasse, a former U.N. envoy, and Idrissa Seck, jailed by the government for seven months on embezzlement charges that were never proved.

To avoid a run-off, the top candidate needs to win more than 50 percent of the ballot. Though Wade is considered the favorite, the crowded field of challengers could splinter the vote and force a runoff.

DOJ_NMG_0136237

When Wade's black-tinted Hummer pulled up at the polling station, it was mobbed by supporters chanting "gorgui" — a respectful Wolof word meaning "old man."

Each of the candidates appeared as a grainy photograph on 15 separate pieces of paper to ensure Senegal's largely illiterate population can easily make their choice.

But some voters complained the supposedly indelible pink-colored ink, used to mark voters' thumbs to ensure they did not cast multiple ballots, appeared to wash off with soap. To allay those concerns, Wade showed reporters that his thumb remained pink even after he rubbed it vigorously with a Kleenex.

For the Socialist Party's Tanor Dieng, one of the candidates challenging Wade, the president's reassurances were not good enough.

"All he can do is bluff, because he knows he's losing," Dieng said.

International election monitors said early evidence suggested the election was orderly and fair.

Wade, who spent three decades in the country's opposition, won in a landslide in 2000, defeating the long-ruling Socialist party. He pledged to abolish the system of privilege which characterized the final years of the Socialist regime, and promised investments in education and job training.

Wade claims he has made good on his promises, and has presided over 5 percent annual growth.

But with 48 percent unemployment and the capital suffering cuts in electricity service — a situation unheard of several years ago — many say it's not enough.

"It was the youth that brought him to power and for us it's been a great disappointment," said Moustapha Diagne, 48, a computer parts importer.

At least 31,000 Senegalese last year undertook the dangerous voyage in small boats by sea to try to reach Europe. Others journeyed north through the burning desert — and perished along the way.

Wade is also criticized by some for focusing on the problems of the capital and neglecting rural areas. He has not been able to end an insurgency in Senegal's south.

Still, the president is widely credited with keeping Senegal relatively peaceful on a continent where many nations have suffered coups and wars.

Senegalese Vote Hinges On Views Of Economic Growth (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

DAKAR, Senegal, Feb. 25 — Moudou Gueye was confident that Senegal's presidential election on Sunday would turn around his fortunes, at least in the short term.

Seven years ago he voted for Abdoulaye Wade, a rabble-rousing professor who, after decades in opposition to Socialist Party rule, sailed into office buoyed by the votes of frustrated young people like Mr. Gueye, who is now 32. They hoped that Mr. Wade, a free-market liberal, would transform this impoverished nation's economy, which had been stunted by generations of ineffective central planning.

But Mr. Gueye said he did not feel much better off now. He still has no regular job and gets by selling coffee on the streets. He said Sunday that he hoped to make about $15 selling his sugary brew at 10 cents a cup to early-morning voters. When the morning coffee rush died down, he would cast his own vote, but not for Mr. Wade.

"I had high hopes," said Mr. Gueye, his eyes hidden behind a pair of knockoff Ray-Ban sunglasses. "But now we are all disappointed."

Voters in Senegal, an oasis of stability in a turbulent corner of the globe, were deciding whether to re-elect the octogenarian Mr. Wade or choose a new president from 14 other candidates, including some from the Socialist Party that voters roundly rejected in 2000

Senegal's state-run news service reported initial results Sunday night that showed Mr. Wade with a strong lead, but the results came from only a relative handful of 11,000 polling stations nationwide. Official results are expected Monday.

If no candidate wins more than 50 percent of the vote in the first round, there will be a runoff between the top two candidates, expected to be in mid-March. The presidential term has been shortened, so the winner will serve for five years.

In the more than four decades since it won its independence from France, Senegal has never had a coup and suffers from almost none of the ethnic strife that has dragged many West African countries into civil war. It is one of Africa's oldest and most open democracies, with genteel politics that have been the envy of many of its neighbors.

But this election has been different. The campaign was marred by accusations that the government was trying to stifle opposition. One opposition rally was barred from taking place, though others were allowed.

A brawl last week between supporters of a religious leader loyal to Mr. Wade and the supporters of Idrissa Seck, a former Wade ally who is running for president, left six people seriously injured and several cars torched. Such violence is mild by regional standards but almost unheard of in Senegal.

The unrest reflects a wide unease with the country's fortunes. Senegal has had relatively robust economic growth that has hovered at around 5 percent over several years (it was lower last year, owing in part to high fuel prices, according to government officials), compared with the 1 percent achieved during much of the Socialist era, and dozens of huge public works projects.

While in some ways the country is better off, economic growth and a building binge have not produced large numbers of jobs in a country struggling to make the transition from an agrarian society based largely on peanut farming to one that harnesses the wealth of a global economy.

And so Mr. Wade has struggled to convince voters, particularly the young people who make up more than half of the population, that he deserves another term.

"In many ways it is a choice between people they can't stand and the person who disappointed them," said a senior Western diplomat here. "It's a sad choice."

There is no better indication of Senegal's economic desperation than the vast exodus of young people to Europe. At least 36,000 Africans, mostly young men from Senegal, headed for the Canary Islands as illegal migrants by sea last year, according to the Spanish government. At least 6,000 of those who attempted the desperate 850-mile crossing did not survive, yet thousands more wait for the next crossing season to begin, paying $1,000 or more for a seat in an open-decked fishing boat.

Mr. Wade staked his legacy on a series of building projects, part of a New Deal-like plan to jump-start the country's economy. Some of the projects are under way, like a new seaside highway that hugs Dakar's rugged coastline, along with a series of oceanfront luxury hotels. Others, like a plan to build a new capital and a second airport, are still on the drawing board.

J. Habib Sy, a political analyst and director of a nonprofit organization, Aid Transparency, that investigates public spending, said his examinations of government expenditures over the last seven years had shown widespread waste and mismanagement.

"People were hopeful, myself included, that as an old man he would be wise," Mr. Sy said. "But it didn't happen that way."

Mr. Wade's supporters say he has already delivered and deserves more time to complete his vision for the country's future.

"This government has done more in seven years than the Socialists did in 40 years," said Boubacar Kante, a 33-year-old electrician, standing in line at a school in the Grand Dakar slum, waiting to cast his vote. "I found a job after Wade was elected, and life is better."

Countering criticism that Mr. Wade is too old to serve another term — his official age is given as 80, but many people suspect he is older — his daughter, Sindiély, who has worked as a special assistant to the president, said he was as sharp and agile as ever.

"It is not a question of age," Ms. Wade said as she waited to cast her vote in downtown Dakar. "It is a question of dynamism and ideas and what you have planned for your country."

Along Dakar's seaside roadway, young men marveled at the cars whizzing below a brand-new overpass, one of Mr. Wade's long-anticipated public works projects.

Pap Ndiaye, an 18-year-old street vendor who sells baby clothes to people stalled in traffic, said the newly completed road was a sign that the country was moving in the right direction.

"Wade has done a lot for this country," Mr. Ndiaye said. "Our hope is that he will stay and finish his work."

DOJ_NMG_0136239

Less than a mile away, the road abruptly ends with a bright yellow sign that says “déviation,” or detour. With a hard turn to the right, drivers pour off the broad new highway, and back into the tangled, chaotic streets of one of Dakar’s oldest and poorest neighborhoods.

High Cost Of Free Education In Kenya (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

Nairobi, Kenya — THE story of Olympic Primary School reads like a movie script.

A spirited campus in Africa's largest slum overcomes dire surroundings to triumph as the top-ranked public elementary school in Kenya's capital, beating better-funded private academies and sending dozens of graduates to the nation's top high schools.

Unfortunately, the saga doesn't come with a Hollywood ending.

Perched on a hill overlooking Kenya's notorious Kibera shantytown, the school is at the center of a growing public education crisis spurred by a national decision in 2003 to make primary education free to all. The move swelled Olympic's classrooms to record size, stretched its budget and eroded the school's hard-won standards.

Four years later, some of the brightest students are transferring to private competitors, causing the school's ranking to slip. Rather than being visited by international dignitaries praising its accomplishments, the school and its bulging classrooms are a tourist stop for guides offering sightseers a glimpse of Kenya's poverty and education woes.

Last month, Olympic's enrollment was 2,510 students, making it one of the largest schools in the country. With just 30 teachers, the average class size is 84, more than double what it was when the school was ranked No. 1.

"That's deadly," said Anne Nganga, Olympic's founder and former principal.

In 2004, having reached retirement age at 55 and fed up with the public school system, Nganga launched a private academy a few miles away. She worries that Olympic's facilities and teaching staff are stretched too thin. "I'm afraid it is going to break," she said.

Until 2003, Kenyan parents had to pay $150 a year to send their children to public primary school. That was less than what most private institutions charged, but even so the schools were out of reach for millions of children. Many families here live on just a few dollars a day.

Since the fees were eliminated, more than 1 million additional youngsters have entered public schools. The action has won international praise for President Mwai Kibaki, who is seeking reelection this year. His government said recently that it would attempt to extend free education into high school.

SO far, however, officials have failed to back their ambitious policy with adequate resources. Enrollment is up 24% since the fees were dropped, but the number of school facilities has barely expanded and the number of teachers has fallen 6%, according to the Education Ministry.

There are 10,000 fewer teachers than before the schools became free. With teacher salaries starting at slightly more than that of a maid — about $210 a month — some have quit in frustration and others have gone to private schools.

The government gives public schools $14.50 a year for each enrolled child, money that is supposed to cover everything from books and pencils to janitors and desks. At some schools, students must share textbooks. At a few, they sit on the floor or rocks because there isn't enough furniture.

At Olympic, because of its reputation, 3,000 newcomers showed up to enroll in 2003 when free education debuted. At the time, 1,700 children were being taught there. Frustrated parents threatened to burn down the new principal's office if she didn't enroll their children.

Even now, a line of hopeful parents snaked outside her office door one recent morning. With enrollment already at record levels, Principal Ruth Namulundu must seek a balance between the school's obligation as a government facility to admit students and her desire to maintain Olympic's academic standards.

This day, she accepted one youngster and asked the other parents to try again next month.

DOJ_NMG_0136240

"I don't have the teachers," Namulundu said. "Admissions is a big problem. We have to provide access. But my teachers don't understand why I have to keep admitting students."

School infrastructure and upkeep are constant struggles. There are no functioning computers. A urine stench from nearby toilets wafts into the first-grade classrooms.

Recess commences in a dirt field with a couple of grazing cows but no playground equipment. During the weekly schoolwide assembly and prayer, students squeeze shoulder to shoulder in a courtyard the size of a volleyball court.

Desperate for funding, school officials recently asked each student to contribute 1 cent so brooms and buckets could be purchased to keep the classrooms tidy.

For Emmanuel Onyango, 14, Olympic's struggle to maintain excellence is anything but academic. His future is riding in large part on his school's performance.

The fresh-faced eighth-grader has consistently ranked No. 1 or 2 in his class since the first grade. In a schoolwide competition last year, he won a $5 book voucher, which he used to buy a Danielle Steel romance novel.

Looking awkward in a parent-provided uniform that includes knee socks and short pants, the teenager sits attentively in the front row. He dreams of attending one of Kenya's prestigious national high schools, the best in the country in quality and teaching. He wants to become a pilot.

"I think I can make it," he said.

But with class sizes doubled, teachers are more distracted. Slower students get most of the attention. "Bigger classes have meant that teachers can't concentrate on one person for very long," Emmanuel said.

Instead of receiving advanced instruction, he usually finds himself tutoring the weaker students. His teacher, who uses Emmanuel to help teach math, said the tutoring reinforced the material.

"When advanced students know they will have to explain things to other students, they study harder and learn more," said Ochieng Otiento, 44, who has taught at Olympic for 10 years.

Emmanuel said he enjoyed the tutoring but sometimes yearned for a more competitive environment. "I'd like someone who could challenge me," he said.

School crowding is a problem across Africa, where education reform remains one of the toughest challenges. Factors including poverty and a surge in the number of AIDS-related orphans have left sub-Saharan Africa with the world's lowest gross enrollment rates.

Despite recent improvement, an estimated 40 million school-age children in Africa are out of the classroom, condemned to lives as unskilled laborers and perpetuating the cycle of poverty for another generation.

In Kenya, the plight and performance of public schools have reached the point where some middle-income and even poor families are pulling out their children. Last year, public school enrollment in half of Kenya's eight provinces dropped as parents who could afford private schools, where fees begin at about $260 a year, abandoned the public system.

Short-order cook Wambui Ndungu, 28, pulled her daughter from the local public school after the girl's grades and test scores plummeted. The daughter is thriving in private school, but Ndungu and her husband, who earn about $140 a month, are paying nearly a quarter of the family income in school fees. That means longer hours at the cafe for Ndungu and less meat on the family dinner table.

"I know public school is free, but it just wasn't worth it anymore," Ndungu said.

Government officials say they are working as fast as they can to provide relief.

"I try to tell them: 'Please continue your work. We are coming,' " said Margaret Thiongo, director of Nairobi's public primary schools.

At Olympic, Thiongo noted that the government added several new classrooms over the last three years but was running out of land for expansion. She blamed understaffing on a shortage of qualified teachers.

WITH national graduation exams looming at the end of the year, Emmanuel is feeling pressure. Five years ago, Olympic sent nearly three dozen graduates to public national high schools. Last year, it sent five.

"I must score well," he said. "This is the year that will determine my future."

DOJ_NMG_0136241

That's not just teenage drama speaking. Eighth grade is a key year in Kenya's educational system, marking the end of the line for many. Due to a severe shortage of public and private high schools, only about half of graduating primary school students find places.

Last year, 50 of 204 Olympic graduates were unable to go to high school because there weren't enough seats.

With the decline in quality and test scores at public schools, graduates of the private academies, which account for only 10% of all schools, now make up 90% of the students at the best high schools.

With the odds stacked against him, Emmanuel is wasting no time, enrolling in after-school and weekend classes. That means staying at school from 7 a.m. to 5 p.m. during the week, eight hours on Saturday and another five hours on Sunday, not including the one to two hours of homework each night.

Sunday afternoon offers his only free time. "I sleep," he said.

Even if he performs well, there's no guarantee his mother will be able to afford the $450 in annual fees. With four children in school, his mother, a nurse, is saving for Emmanuel, but an older sister who was accepted to a top national campus had to settle for one that ranks lower and is less expensive.

"I'm praying God will help us," Perazia Pilli Ogingo said.

Olympic officials also are doing what they can to keep standards high. Although its No. 3 ranking last year is impressive for a school of Olympic's size, administrators who recall past performance remain fiercely competitive.

"Next year we will be No. 1 again," said Monica Omwoyo, Olympic's deputy principal.

To lower class size in the all-important eighth grade, the school shifted a teacher from another grade. The average eighth-grade class size dropped to 65. It also added after-school and weekend classes and recently issued a plea to eighth-grade parents for a one-time $5 donation to administer monthly practice exams, a luxury not afforded in the government budget.

But one parent complained to government regulators that Olympic was improperly charging for items that are supposed to be free, such as $4 a month for weekend classes and even the penny for a broom.

Government officials said Olympic might be crossing the line. "There should never be a policy by which students who don't pay don't learn," said Thiongo, the city education director. She said weekend classes could be shut down.

But Emmanuel said he needs the extra study to stay sharp. He and his fellow students recently took a practice graduation exam for the first time. He was aiming for a score of 415. He got 412.

Not So Fast On Fast Track (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

President Bush's fast-track trade negotiating authority expires June 30, but a new business coalition pushing for its renewal has crafted a long-term plan, indicating that pro-trade lobbyists expect a much longer slog than they would like to admit.

The Trade for America Coalition, according to sources familiar with the effort, has planned for a new set of co-chairmen to take over six months into the campaign, which would take it beyond the deadline for fast-track renewal. A lobbyist whose clients are involved in the coalition said that even though Members and Bush administration officials continue to negotiate to renew it before the authority lapses, this likely will be no quick lobbying battle. And no matter what happens this year, pro-trade lobbyists are energizing a next generation of advocates as they anticipate many fights to come.

Fast track, also known as trade promotion authority, allows the administration to negotiate trade agreements with other countries. Congress can then approve or reject the agreements, without adding any amendments.

"I think everybody thinks TPA is a long-term prospect," said the lobbyist. "I don't think it's likely to happen in the short-term. It is likely to be a multi-year process."

Opponents of trade promotion authority — emboldened by the Democratic-controlled Congress — have geared up their own effort, working closely with the office of Rep. Mike Michaud (D-Maine). Michaud's staff is meeting regularly with representatives from the AFL-CIO and other labor unions, Sierra Club, Friends of the Earth, Public Citizen and the U.S. Business and Industry Council.

DOJ_NMG_0136242

Peter Chandler, Michaud's chief of staff, said his boss, along with Rep. Linda Sánchez (D-Calif.), is working with the groups to come up with a wholesale alternative to fast track and plans to unveil a package in the coming weeks. "A simple labor fix isn't enough," Chandler said. "It would look drastically different. We're going to come up with some sort of model that will be far better." That model will include international labor organization standards, and is expected to draw widespread opposition from business groups.

Yvette Pena Lopes, a legislative representative for the Teamsters, attends the Michaud meetings every other week in the Cannon House Office Building, as do Brett Gibson, who handles trade policy for the AFL-CIO, and Alan Tonelson, a research fellow with the U.S. Business and Industry Council.

On the other side of the aisle, the office of House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) has run coalition efforts in recent years to pass trade pacts such as the Central American Free Trade Agreement. But for now, Blunt spokesman Amos Snead said, "there is no formal coalition, because there is no package yet. The whip's office is actively involved in encouraging people to support TPA, and if the right package materializes, then we'd actively reach out internally and externally. That's when you might see a coalition form."

Trade lobbyists on both sides of the debate acknowledged the heightened possibility of Republican defections on a TPA vote in the House — either because the Bush administration accepts too many labor and environmental provisions, or because of pressure from constituents who fear that more trade deals mean fewer jobs in the United States.

While still pushing for renewal by this June, the Trade for America Coalition, whose members include usual suspects such as the National Association of Manufacturers and the Business Roundtable, has three co-chairmen, including up-and-comers in the trade policy fights.

Bill Lane, a longtime free-trade advocate with Caterpillar, said, "We're very aware that as part of promoting trade liberalization, we have to be serious about succession planning, and as part of that we are exceedingly focused on making sure there are leadership opportunities for the next wave of leaders. Business has been rightfully criticized for mounting 'just-in-time' lobby efforts. We now need a sustained effort to promote trade, and to do that we need to help the next wave of trade leaders to succeed."

Lane said that Leslie Griffin, one of the co-chairmen who is vice president for international government affairs at the New York Life Insurance Company, is part of the next generation of free-trade leaders.

"Ideally there should be no lapse," Griffin said of TPA. "But we'll be part of the dialogue as long as we need to be. There is an understanding that we have a positive story to tell on trade. We also recognize that we need to have an honest appraisal of the trade agenda. We've got to expand the circle of winners."

Over last week's recess, coalition members, including Nicole Venable, a Democratic trade lobbyist at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, met with the staffers for Members including Democratic Reps. Artur Davis (Ala.), Ellen Tauscher (Calif.), Baron Hill (Ind.) and Michael Arcuri (N.Y.).

"It would be easy if the business community just took the TPA papers from 2001" and recycled that effort, Venable said. "But we recognize we need to speak fresh and find things that are more responsive to Members' concerns."

Yet, three Democratic lobbyists who are pushing for fast-track renewal said the coalition got off to a bad start with Congressional Democrats when it kicked off earlier this month.

"I'd say that fell pretty flat," said a former House aide who is now a lobbyist. "It was viewed as business as usual, at a time when we don't need business as usual. It was probably not the best way to kick off trade in the new Congress."

Added another lobbyist who came from the Senate: "It was noticed that there were no Democrats."

While a full renewal of trade promotion authority remains difficult, several lobbyists said they support the idea of extending it temporarily, say for six months, or extending it just long enough to finish a deal with South Korea, which has not yet been signed.

Not everyone is gloomy about the prospects. A House Democratic Ways and Means aide said, "I think everybody is hopeful that we can find a common ground."

And Trade for America's Griffin agreed that she sees "genuine commitment" from Members.

One industry sector that could help the effort is high tech, which is viewed as having strong ties with many Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0136243

Ralph Hellmann, chief lobbyist for the Information Technology Industry Council, said his sector is willing to see some compromises when it comes to labor and environmental standards in trade deals.

"We are trying to build bridges between sides that may not agree — Republicans who want TPA extended as is to Democrats who want expansion of labor and environmental standards," he said. His colleague, Democrat Josh Ackil, added that it's important for the tech industry to "continue to tell Democratic leaders in the House and Senate that trade is important to us, while at the same time telling the White House they need to make sure that they work with Congress and are accommodating to their needs in order to get things across the finish line."

The techies' message of moderation has put members of the Michaud group on defense. "No doubt a certain luster attaches to the high tech firms," said Tonelson of the USBIC. "But they too are actively outsourcing and of course when they look at their U.S. workers, they're thinking 'Gee, why do we pay these folks so much?'"

One Year After Cafta (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

As the Central American Free Trade Agreement marks its one-year anniversary Friday, it's a good time to remind Capitol Hill protectionists how wrong they were when they tried to kill the deal in 2005. Every country that entered into Cafta is enjoying new benefits, including the U.S.

The U.S. and El Salvador were the first two countries to begin trading under Cafta last March. In the months that followed, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Honduras made it official. The Dominican Republic and Costa Rica have yet to join. Both have signed onto the negotiated agreement, but without implementing legislation before Feb. 29, 2008, they could end up shut out of the free-trade area. Costa Rica hasn't even ratified the deal yet.

The early results from Cafta's first year are promising. Central Americans are importing more than ever from the U.S. and the region is also attracting new capital. Both developments are helping participants grow more competitive and improving the quality of life for consumers.

To appreciate Cafta's potential for the region, some historical perspective is in order. Much of Central America's misery can be traced to extreme protectionism in the 20th century. The U.S. imposition of the Smoot-Hawley tariffs in 1930 was one important catalyst in closing Latin American markets to imports since most countries slapped on retaliatory tariffs. World War II provided another excuse for protectionism in an economic zone heavily dependent on northern markets for its commodities. Then along came Raúl Prebisch, an economist at the United Nations Economic Commission on Latin America and the Caribbean, who famously argued in 1950 that for the region to develop it had to close its markets and let infant industries develop free of foreign competition. "Import-substitution industrialization" became a religion. By 1985 Central America had the world's highest level of import protection. Quality, choice and competitiveness had plummeted.

After the Soviet- and Cuban-inspired civil wars of the 1980s, a slow transformation began. Today, dollarized El Salvador is the most economically liberal Cafta country and may be in a position to benefit the most from the trade accord. Its total exports to the U.S. actually went down in the past year but that seems to be explained largely by the end of the WTO multifiber agreement. Without Cafta, the contraction could have been worse.

Offsetting the pain is an increase in imports, which are helping diversify the economy. According to the Economy Ministry, 60% of non-maquiladora imports from the U.S. last year were in six sectors and accounted for 88% of the growth in imports over 2005. Most were intermediate and capital goods for manufacturing and services. This includes yellow corn and wheat for the agroindustry, polyethylene for plastics, electronic equipment such as telephones and computers, fuels, and paper and cardboard for packaging.

El Salvador is also shifting away from traditional low-wage, garment-assembly operations toward the delivery of value-added, high-end apparel that includes all services bundled in the production process. According to Ricardo Sagrera, president of the textile group Hilasal, enhanced two-way trade is helping El Salvador capitalize on its comparative advantages -- notably its legendary work force and its proximity to the U.S. -- and compete with China.

Imports of electronics are critical components in El Salvador's growing service sector. Call centers now support an estimated 5,000 jobs. Another profitable new service industry handles foreign shipping to the region from Asia and Europe, cutting out a stop in the U.S.

Investment levels would probably be higher if El Salvador had a better record on personal security. It is one of the most dangerous countries in Latin America, which surely discourages investors. Nevertheless, investments such as Citibank's $1.5 billion purchase of Central America's second-largest financial group, Grupo Cuscatlán, suggest confidence.

In Guatemala, which joined Cafta in July, the government says total trade grew by 17% in the second half of last year, compared with 5% in the first half. It also says that foreign direct investment tripled last year. A Guatemalan official I talked to said that the agreement has been good for his country because it has made doing business easier. For example, customs and photosanitary regulations have to be standardized and streamlined in order to comply with Cafta. This is leading to more efficient trading within the region.

That's important for companies like Wal-Mart, which has a substantial presence in Central America and is driving competitiveness in the retail sector. The retail giant taps suppliers in Central America for the perishables it sells. Greens come from Guatemala, El Salvador and Honduras, meat and pork from El Salvador. With Cafta, the distribution process has become more efficient.

Wal-Mart's need for perishables has also helped small and medium-sized farms in the region because the company has a program to develop suppliers. "They get a reliable marketplace and we get reliable suppliers," says a company representative. Wal-Mart's requirement that suppliers must be part of the formal economy could partly explain why business startups jumped by 20% last year. The company says that Cafta has been important also because the region is its largest supplier of apparel for its Western Hemisphere operations.

Nicaragua also is enjoying Cafta benefits. Total trade with the U.S. between last April, when it joined Cafta, and December was up by more than 20% over the same period in 2005.

We agree with free traders who criticized Cafta as inferior to unilateral market opening. Guatemala already had some of the lowest tariffs in the region, but in order to reach consensus with protectionist strongholds such as Costa Rica, it had to agree to tariff increases on some products. Cafta also unfortunately carves out protections for a small but important number of sectors -- sugar is one -- in the U.S. and in Central America for a decade or more. Nicaragua, one of the poorest countries in the region, gets a quota for apparel made from fabric originating in non-Cafta countries. This has diverted investment in the assembly business away from its neighbors. Yet in the absence of unilateral trade liberalization, Cafta may be the best alternative.

On its first anniversary, El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Honduras and the U.S. are already reaping the benefits of Cafta. If Costa Rica and the DR -- which have already lost thousands of textile jobs -- reject the deal, they will be approving a model of economic isolation that could cost their people dearly.

A Japanese Lesson For China (LAT)

By Lawrence H. Summers

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

A RISING Asian power is an export juggernaut and enjoys prodigious growth fueled by high savings and investment rates. Its rapidly modernizing industries threaten an ever greater swath of industry in Europe and the United States. Its formidable central bank reserves and burgeoning account surplus lead to claims that its exchange rate is being unfairly manipulated. Its financial system is bank-centric, heavily regulated in favor of domestic institutions and closely tied to government and industry. Rapid productivity growth holds down prices, but its asset values rise sharply.

Key congressional leaders in Washington demand radical action to contain the economic threat. Diplomats warn that public bashing is unproductive but make clear that economic issues are a crucial part of the bilateral relationship. Delegations of senior U.S. officials engage in "dialogue" with their counterparts about the many aspects of their economic policies that promote imbalances, warning of the congressional demons who stand ready to act if "results" are not achieved quickly.

All of this describes what is happening in China, and with our relationship with Beijing, today. It also describes the Japanese economy in the late 1980s and early 1990s, before its lost decade of deflation and considerable deterioration in global prestige. Although there are obvious differences, notably China's much lower level of development, the similarities are striking enough to invite an effort to draw some lessons from the Japanese experience.

The definitive history of Japan's dismal decade has yet to be written. But most observers would agree that key elements included the bursting of stock market and land bubbles, the resulting problems in the financial system, the collapse of aggregate demand as banks stopped extending credit and the difficulty of moving from export-led growth to domestic-led growth once consumer and business confidence was lost.

In retrospect, Japanese officials made several important policy errors. In order to avoid further yen appreciation in the late 1980s, they followed easy monetary and financial policies that gave rise to huge asset price bubbles and expansions in credit, which set the stage for the downturn. At the same time, they failed to encourage a shift to domestic demand-led growth at a moment when consumers were enjoying record increases in wealth. And they allowed problems in the banking system to fester. The result was that Japan was not well positioned to prevent or address the serious problems of the 1990s.

This suggests that if China is to sustain rapid growth and not repeat Japan's mistakes, it must fix the policy roof now, when the sun is shining. Allowing inevitable currency appreciation and spurring domestic demand by encouraging consumption is much easier now when the economy is at the edge of overheating than it is likely to be in the future when it cools off. It has been estimated that seeking to maintain the current exchange rate could require as much as $400 billion in reserve accumulation in 2007, which would almost certainly lead to rapid asset price inflation as renminbi are printed to buy dollars. And there will not be a better moment to fix problems in the banking system.

These lessons for Chinese economic policy contrast sharply with those drawn by observers in and out of China who attribute Japan's deflation and consequent poor performance to its willingness to accede to American pressure for currency appreciation. This alternative view offers no explanation for Japan's asset bubble and collapse, and no theory about what measures would have spurred domestic-led growth.

Another lesson of the Japanese experience is the need for modesty regarding economic diplomacy. Events and national and political decisions, not international communiques, shape economic outcomes. The effect of events beyond the control of governments — the collapse of Japan's asset markets, information technology's spur to U.S. productivity, the Asian financial crisis — dwarfed the diplomatic debate.

Even in areas in which government policies might have had significant effects, such as housing, finance, social security or retail regulation, there is no evidence that Japan in the 1980s and 1990s made any changes in response to U.S. pressure. If heavy-handed pressure makes it easier for special interests to invoke nationalism as they resist change, high-profile negotiations can be counterproductive. And in a world in which goodwill capital is scarce, heavy-handed pressure engenders resentments that spill into other spheres.

It was a cliche in the late 1980s and early '90s that the U.S.-Japan relationship was the world's most important bilateral relationship. Given China's scale, rapid growth and the greater level of imbalances in today's global economy, Chinese economic policy and its international economic relations are even more important. By learning from a rather unfortunate history, policymakers on both sides of the Pacific can avoid repeating its mistakes.

Why Our Enemies -- And Friends -- Hate Us (LAT)

By Niall Ferguson

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

BEING HATED IS NO FUN. And few people hate being hated more than Americans. I wish I had a dollar for every time I've been asked, "Why do they hate us?" — and another for each of the different answers I've heard. It's because of our foreign policy. It's because of their extremism. It's because of our arrogance. It's because of their inferiority complex. Americans really hate not knowing why they're hated.

DOJ_NMG_0136246

The best explanation is the simplest. Being hated is what happens to dominant empires. George Orwell knew the feeling. As a young man he served as an assistant police superintendent in British-run Burma, an experience he memorably described in his essay, "Shooting an Elephant." Called upon to kill a pachyderm that had run amok, Orwell was suddenly aware "of the watchful yellow faces behind" him: "The sole thought in my mind was that if anything went wrong those two thousand Burmans would see me pursued, caught, trampled on and reduced to a grinning corpse like that Indian up the hill. And if that happened it was quite probable that some of them would laugh."

Eric Blair — as Orwell was known then — could scarcely have been better prepared for his role as a colonial official. Born in Bengal, the son of a colonial civil servant, he had been educated at Eton, where boys learn not to worry about being hated. Yet even he found the resentment of the natives hard to bear: "In the end the sneering … faces of young men that met me everywhere, the insults hooted after me when I was at a safe distance, got badly on my nerves….[It] was perplexing and upsetting."

That's a feeling American soldiers in Baghdad must know pretty well.

But who hates Americans the most? You might assume that it's people in countries that the United States has recently attacked or threatened to attack. Americans themselves are clear about who their principal enemies are. Asked by Gallup to name the "greatest enemy" of the U.S. today, 26% of those recently polled named Iran, 21% named Iraq and 18% named North Korea.

Are those feelings reciprocated? Up to a point. The Gallup Center for Muslim Studies' latest poll found 52% of Iranians view the U.S. unfavorably. But that is down from 63% in 2001. And it's significantly lower than the antipathy felt in Jordan, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia. Two-thirds of Jordanians and Pakistanis have a negative view of the U.S., as do a staggering 79% of Saudis.

These figures suggest a paradox in the Muslim world. It's not the United States' enemies that hate it most. It's people in countries that are supposed to be friendly, if not allies.

The paradox of unfriendly allies is not confined to the Middle East. Last week was not a good week for Americanophiles in Europe. Tony Blair announced British troop withdrawals from Iraq, an unfortunate signal on the eve of the U.S. "surge." In Rome, his counterpart Romano Prodi had to resign because his coalition partners would not agree to keep Italian troops in Afghanistan or to enlarge a U.S. military base in Italy. Anti-Americanism is nothing new in European politics, but there is something new going on here, which extends to traditionally pro-American constituencies.

Back in 1999, 83% of British people surveyed by the U.S. State Department's Office of Research said they had a favorable opinion of the U.S. But by 2006, according to the Pew Global Attitudes Project, only 56% did. British respondents to the Pew surveys now give higher ratings to Germany (75%) and Japan (69%) than to the U.S. — a remarkable transformation in attitudes, given the notorious British tendency to look back nostalgically and unforgivingly to World War II. Britons recently polled by Pew regard the U.S. presence in Iraq as a bigger threat to world peace than Iran or North Korea.

Nor is Britain the only disillusioned ally. Only 38% of Germans and 19% of Canadians believe that U.S. foreign policy considers the interests of others. The poignant fact is that when Americans are asked to rate foreign countries, their most favorable views are of none other than Britain, Germany and Canada.

In the 1990s, Madeleine Albright pompously called the United States "the indispensable nation." Today it seems to have become the indefensible nation, even in the eyes of its supposed friends.

Orwell would have understood. Just as it was the educated beneficiaries of British rule in Asia who were the most strident anti-imperialists in Orwell's day, so the British empire's most natural allies — France and the United States — were anything but Anglophile. For it turns out that power not only corrupts. It also tends to isolate.

There is, after all, a reason why they say it's lonely at the top.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Support For Hunger Strike Growing (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer
The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

A former Florida professor has not eaten for more than a month to protest prosecutors' efforts to make him cooperate with their investigation into whether a network of Herndon-based Muslim charities financed terrorist organizations.

Sami al-Arian, 49, who has twice refused to testify before a federal grand jury in Alexandria, has lost more than 30 pounds and collapsed in jail from the effects of his water-only diet. His hunger strike has drawn the support of Muslim organizations, which held a news conference last week at Justice Department headquarters in Washington and called for a worldwide fast in support of al-Arian.

Tracy Billingsley, a spokeswoman for the federal Bureau of Prisons, said prison officials will force-feed al-Arian through a tube if he appears close to death. "We would not let an inmate die," she said.

A federal jury in Tampa deadlocked in 2005 on nine charges that al-Arian aided terrorists and acquitted him of eight other counts. He then pleaded guilty to one count of supporting a Palestinian terrorist organization. Sentenced to 57 months, including time already served, he was expected to be released from prison and deported this year.

But prosecutors want al-Arian to testify in their probe into whether the network of Muslim charities, businesses and think tanks was financing terrorist organizations, according to court documents. He has twice refused and been held in contempt by a federal judge. As much as 18 months could be added to his prison term unless he agrees to testify.

On Jan. 21, al-Arian stopped eating, supporters said. He has had only water since then, and several days not that. Federal marshals recently moved him from Northern Neck Regional Jail in Warsaw, Va., to a federal medical prison in Butner, N.C., federal officials and supporters said.

Al-Arian is trying to rally public support so prosecutors will stop trying to make him testify, said Agha Saeed, chairman of the American Muslim Taskforce for Civil Rights and Elections, a coalition of Muslim groups. The former University of South Florida professor has accused prosecutors of violating his plea agreement with the Justice Department, which he contends does not require his cooperation.

"Why do they continue to humiliate and punish this man?" asked Nihad Awad, national executive director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations. "They exhausted all their resources and found out there is no case against him. Enough is enough."

The U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria, which is leading the Herndon probe, would not comment.

David N. Kelley, a former U.S. attorney who prosecuted terrorism cases in New York, said it is a common tactic for prosecutors to seek additional testimony from someone already convicted. "In many instances, you are remiss if you don't pursue that," he said.

Kelley, who would not comment on the specifics of al-Arian's case, said people are routinely held in contempt if they refuse to testify. "The law is quite clear," he said. "The grand jury is entitled to every man's evidence, regardless of his status."

A judge has rejected al-Arian's argument that he does not have to cooperate with Alexandria prosecutors under his plea agreement. "The Court has never heard of the Government agreeing that someone would forever be protected from grand jury subpoena," U.S. District Judge James S. Moody Jr. wrote in November from Tampa.

On Wednesday, al-Arian's attorneys filed a notice indicating that they will appeal the contempt findings to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit in Richmond, said Ashraf Nubani, one of the attorneys.

DOJ_NMG_0136250

Prosecutors want al-Arian to reveal what they believe are his ties to the International Institute of Islamic Thought, a Herndon group that is one of the key organizations being investigated. The probe burst into public view in March 2002, when federal agents raided homes and businesses in Herndon and elsewhere in Northern Virginia.

The searches led to the convictions of two people, including prominent Muslim activist Abdurahman Alamoudi, who admitted that he plotted with Libya to assassinate Saudi Arabia's ruler. But no charges have been filed against the principals of the cluster of companies and charities at the center of the investigation, and the charities strongly deny terrorist ties.

Al-Arian contends that he has no information that could help the investigation and that any ties between him and the Institute of Islamic Thought are more than a decade old, according to court documents.

Intelligence Report Reassesses Threat Of Al Qaeda (WT)

By Sean Rayment, London Sunday Telegraph

The Washington Times, February 26, 2007

LONDON -- Al Qaeda has established a foothold in most countries across North Africa and the Middle East and poses a far graver threat to Britain than previously thought, according to a report being circulated among British security departments.

Titled "Extremist Threat Assessment," the document, which was drawn up this month, also predicts that Afghanistan will supersede Iraq as the main location for terrorists planning violent acts against the West.

The secret intelligence document says that the number of locally based Islamist terrorists involved in plotting suicide attacks against "soft" targets in Britain could number more than 2,000.

The document, which has been circulated to the MI5 counterintelligence service, Scotland Yard, the interior ministry, Cabinet officials and the Ministry of Defense, says al Qaeda has grown into a worldwide organization with a foothold in virtually every Muslim country in North Africa, the Middle East and central Asia.

It says the terrorist group's influence extends from North Africa, including Egypt, through to Lebanon, Turkey and Jordan, and into Somalia and Sudan. Al Qaeda is "resilient and effective" in Iraq, its "operating environment and financial position" in Pakistan has improved and a new group had emerged in Yemen.

"With violence in Afghanistan intensifying, and therefore receiving greater media attention, the country may well become more attractive as a venue for foreigners wishing to fulfill their jihad ambitions," the document says.

Using the term "UK" or "United Kingdom" to refer to Britain, the document states: "The scale of al Qaeda's ambitions toward attacking the UK and the number of UK extremists prepared to participate in attacks are even greater than we had previously judged."

It warns that terrorist "attack planning" against Britain will increase this year, and adds: "We still believe that [al Qaeda] will continue to seek opportunities for mass casualty attacks against soft targets and key infrastructure. These attacks are likely to involve the use of suicide operatives."

Eliza Manningham-Buller, the director general of MI5, warned recently that more than 1,600 "identified individuals" were actively engaged in plotting terrorist attacks in Britain. There were 200 known networks involved in at least 30 terrorist plots. It is thought the number of British citizens involved in plots could be well in excess of 2,000.

MI5 thinks that soft targets, such as the transportation system and economic targets such as the city of London and Canary Wharf, are most at risk.

A senior political source said the picture painted by the document was "particularly bleak and unlikely to improve for several years."

"The Security Services have constantly warned that the task of countering Islamist terrorism is a daunting one. There will be more attacks in Britain," he said.

Two years ago, Western intelligence said that al Qaeda was virtually a spent force, disrupted by counterterrorist operations around the world.

In July 2005, the Pentagon obtained a letter written by Ayman al-Zawahri, al Qaeda's deputy leader, saying the organization had lost many of its leaders and that it had virtually resigned itself to defeat in Afghanistan. Al Qaeda's lines of communication, funding and structure had been severely damaged.

Jonathan Eyal, the director of international security at the Royal United Services Institute, attributed the al Qaeda revival to the West's inability to kill or capture Osama bin Laden, and said the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq made matters worse.

"This document clearly demonstrates a marked shift from the mood of Western governments only a year or two ago," he said. "It is a clear admission that the organization is re-emerging and the reasons are that none of al Qaeda's top leaders have been killed or captured."

The Italian Job (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

The capture of an alleged Islamist terrorist recruiter in Milan four years ago in an operation carried out by U.S. and Italian intelligence could have been a model for transatlantic cooperation in counterterrorism. Instead, it is becoming Exhibit A in how European politicians are working against the U.S., undermining the fight against Islamic terrorism and endangering the NATO alliance.

An Italian court 10 days ago indicted 25 CIA agents and a U.S. Air Force lieutenant-colonel on charges that they kidnapped Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr and illegally took him back to his native Egypt, where he was imprisoned and, he claims, tortured. Five Italians were also charged -- including the top two officials at the military intelligence agency at the time.

Nasr, a radical imam also known as Abu Omar, is a terrorist suspect who had been under Italian police surveillance since 9/11. In the covert operation that took place in February 2003, Italians and Americans worked together to apprehend Nasr, before whisking him back to Egypt against his will and without the permission of an Italian court. The Milan prosecutor, Armando Spataro, contends that Nasr was "kidnapped." Such "extraordinary rendition," he tells us by phone, is illegal under Italian law, and he's ensuring that the "rules are really followed . . . without any political considerations."

As in many such operations, the particulars are in dispute. But no one, including the Italian prosecutors, doubts that Nasr posed a security risk. In 2005, a Milan court, at Mr. Spataro's behest, issued an arrest warrant for Nasr, charging him with building a terrorist network in Europe that actively recruited terrorists, including for Iraq. Eight of his accomplices have been sentenced to up to 10 years in prison on similar charges, and Italian authorities believe more are at large.

Why Nasr was captured rather than arrested in 2003 isn't clear. According to a July 2005 story in the New York Times, which cited unnamed current and former American officials, the CIA was concerned that Nasr was plotting to attack the U.S. Embassy in Rome. For whatever reason, the U.S. wanted him off the streets while the Italians weren't ready to arrest him. The CIA won't comment. The government of Silvio Berlusconi -- who was Prime Minister at the time -- denied any foreknowledge of the rendition.

No one seriously claims, however, that the CIA agents were in Italy without the explicit knowledge and participation of Italy's security services. This is the crucial point -- and explains why the indictments are a hostile act against the U.S. By long-established international legal practice, the official agents of one country operating in another with that state's permission are immune from prosecution. The status of forces agreement that governs U.S. troops stationed in Italy enshrines this principle at least for official conduct.

If the CIA agents did anything wrong, that's up to American authorities to decide. Mr. Spataro, an independent prosecutor, can indict as many Italians as he wants. His pursuit of U.S. government personnel, however, makes him a rogue. Aggravating the harm, Mr. Spataro cited the 25 agents by name, possibly putting their lives in danger. The trial in June, presumably in absentia, would likely do further damage by exposing intelligence-gathering techniques. Call it a tutorial for al Qaeda on how to avoid detection.

The appropriate response by Prime Minister Romano Prodi would have been a swift announcement that he would reject any extradition request from the court. Instead, Mr. Prodi merely hinted that he might do so before his government collapsed on Wednesday night. If he wins the confidence vote he's likely to face this week to resume power, he'll get a second chance to finally fulfill his obligation to his U.S. treaty allies and reject extradition.

European politicians are more at fault here than any prosecutor. Since the 9/11 attacks in the U.S., many European leaders have been playing a double game, working with the U.S. to root out terrorist plots on the sly -- and saving countless lives -- while publicly condemning "American methods" in rhetoric that has fed rising anti-Americanism. It doesn't help that many Europeans embrace the preposterous legal notion of "universal jurisdiction," the idea that an ambitious prosecutor can indict and try anyone for an alleged crime committed anywhere in the world.

This is the climate in which, for example, a German court this month issued arrest warrants for 13 CIA agents allegedly involved in transferring a German-Lebanese terrorist suspect, Khaled al-Masri, to Afghanistan for questioning. It made no difference that Mr. al-Masri had been arrested in Macedonia. Also in Germany, prosecutors are considering whether to bring war-crimes charges against former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, former CIA Director George Tenet and other senior civilian and military officials. Mr. Rumsfeld, Colin Powell and Dick Cheney were targeted by Belgian courts until the law there was changed. And so on.

European officials need to understand the risks they're running if they keep this up. Italy and the U.S. are NATO partners, but such an alliance is meaningless if "allies" make a habit of prosecuting each other for cooperating against a common threat. Italy's political grandstanding is endangering NATO, as well as the lives of millions on both sides of the Atlantic.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Terror: Is Tehran Targeting New York? (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

Increasing tensions between Washington and Tehran have revived New York Police Department concerns that Iranian agents may already have targeted the city for terror attacks. Such attacks could be aimed at bridges and tunnels, Jewish organizations and Wall Street, NYPD briefers told security execs last fall, according to a person with access to the briefing materials who asked for anonymity because of the sensitive subject matter.

NYPD officials have worried about possible Iranian-sponsored attacks since a series of incidents involving officials of the Iranian Mission to the United Nations. In November 2003, Ahmad Safari and Alireaza Safi, described as Iranian Mission "security" personnel, were detained by transit cops when they were seen videotaping subway tracks from Queens to Manhattan at 1:10 in the morning. The men later left New York. "We're concerned that Iranian agents were engaged in reconnaissance that might be used in an attack against New York City at some future date," Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly told NEWSWEEK. A spokesman for the Iranian Mission in New York said he was aware of the allegations but had no immediate comment.

With Full-body X-ray, A Closer Look At Air Travelers (CSM)

By Faye Bowers

The Christian Science Monitor, February 26, 2007

Most passengers asked to submit to a full-body X-ray at Security Checkpoint B didn't bat an eyelash. Nine in 10 gamely stepped up to a scanner about the size of a vending machine, placed their feet on the red footprints painted on the carpet, and raised their arms – all in the name of airport security.

The aim of the new technology unveiled Friday at Phoenix Sky Harbor International Airport: to allow officials to detect weapons – such as plastic explosives strapped to the body – that metal detectors and other security measures might miss.

A potential sticking point is that this machine, known as a backscatter, can see through clothes. Its deployment at the Phoenix airport is a test to see how well it works – and to assess how air travelers respond to its use. If passengers at Terminal 4 who were asked to undergo body scans are an indication, security trumps privacy.

"Sure, I'd be happy to do it," said Ella Adams from Atlanta, who had stopped in Phoenix on Friday to catch a connecting flight to San Diego. "Privacy to me isn't nearly as important as our security, especially if they assure me the X-rays aren't harmful."

In all, the Phoenix airport has seven security checkpoints, and the body- scanning machine has been installed for this pilot program at just one. About 8,000 travelers a day move through this checkpoint, says Paul Armes, security director at Sky Harbor for the federal Transportation Security Administration (TSA).

The backscatter will not be used for everyone who passes this way, at least not at first. A traveler would have to have set off alarms on the routine metal detector, or be randomly selected for further screening. Even then, travelers have two options: the new X-ray machine, or a pat-down, which has caused passenger complaints about invasiveness.

What the backscatter 'sees'

Privacy advocates remain wary of backscatter technology. Barry Steinhardt, director of the technology and liberty program for the American Civil Liberties Union, likens it to a "virtual strip search." He hasn't seen a demonstration of the latest version of the technology, but he saw an earlier one at a Los Angeles city jail.

"The one I saw was very graphic, almost like a nude picture," he says. The technology has not been installed at airports until now because of questions about privacy and how well it can detect possible weapons, adds Mr. Steinhardt. "Utility is ... important here. People are being asked to trade their privacy for security. But first show us there is some security [benefit]."

Backscatter technology has been around for years, says Joe Reiss, vice president of marketing for American Science and Engineering Inc. (AS&E), which makes the backscatter being tested in Phoenix. The technology has been used, for example, to check large cargo containers and passenger vehicles.

"About 15 years ago, this technology was incorporated in personal [body] scanning systems," Mr. Reiss adds. For airport use, AS&E has adjusted the technology so that what's depicted is only an outline of a passenger – with private parts blurred – and any objects on him or her, such as "a handgun, or a blade of a ceramic knife that wouldn't be discovered by a metal detector."

DOJ_NMG_0136253

"This technology gives us an additional layer of capabilities to detect objects," says Michael Golden, a technology expert for Southwest Airlines, who is on loan to the TSA. "This actually will show us where prohibited items are on the body," he says, though he declines to name all objects this machine can detect. "We think it is a good balance between security and privacy."

Other officials say the backscatter will be able to detect several items that other security technology – including metal detectors – cannot. Those items include plastic or ceramic knives, plastic explosives, and some liquid explosives. They say it can at best prevent a bomb plot like the one uncovered in London last summer, in which alleged terrorists planned to attack using liquid explosives.

What the screened passenger does

Here's how the screening is working so far. A traveler, after agreeing to the X-ray, is walked through the process by a TSA employee. He or she stands on the red-painted footprints facing the scanner, with arms raised as if a police officer had yelled, "Hands up." Then the traveler turns around for a back pose.

Another TSA employee in a tiny, walled room about 50 feet away assesses the image. A man views images of male passengers, and a woman views images of women. The images are not stored, government officials say, and they aren't transmitted anywhere else. The process should take about 30 seconds.

Kenneth Johnson, a Vietnam veteran with artificial shoulder joints and an artificial knee, was among the first to be pulled out of line Friday for closer screening. He chose the backscatter X-ray over the pat-down, saying he didn't mind it a bit.

As the TSA decides whether to buy the $100,000 machine, its pilot project is expected to last up to 90 days. It may be expanded later this year, using another manufacturer, at Los Angeles International Airport and John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York.

"We want to look at the operational capabilities of this machine and have a dialogue with the public about their perceptions of its use," says Ellen Howe, assistant administrator for the Department of Homeland Security.

Adding To Security But Multiplying The Fears (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

Foreigners arriving at the American border must present both index fingers for fingerprinting, but that will soon change. The Department of Homeland Security now wants 10 fingers.

The two-print system was largely a biometric backup, an added level of security to supplement and verify a passport or a visa. The 10-print system adds a powerful investigative tool.

“When we have a fingerprint of a terrorist who has left behind a bomb or an I.E.D. in Iraq or has left his fingerprint in a safe house somewhere, we don’t always have the two index fingers,” Paul Rosenzweig, a Department of Homeland Security official, said at a briefing in December. “It could be the pinkie or the thumb. And thus by moving to a 10-print system, we will enhance our ability to use biometrics to enable us to identify threats before they occur in the United States.”

Call it biometric mission creep.

People concerned about privacy and civil liberties say they fear the creation of gigantic biometric databases ripe for data-mining abuse. They note that Mr. Rosenzweig was a supporter of the Total Information Awareness program at the Defense Department, which had planned, as the Pentagon put it, to create “ultralarge all-source information repositories.” The program was shut down in 2003 because it scared people.

The administration’s last-ditch defense of that effort was telling, too. It changed the name to the Terrorism Information Awareness program.

There is a pattern here, said Marc Rotenberg, the executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center. “These techniques that are sold to us as necessary to identify terrorists inevitably become systems of mass surveillance directed at the American people,” Mr. Rotenberg said.

In an interview, Robert A. Mocny, the acting director of U.S.-Visit, the unit in the Department of Homeland Security that is in charge of the fingerprint program, said all the right things. “We cannot,” Mr. Mocny said, “have a reaction to 9/11 such that we’re sacrificing privacy and civil liberties on the altar of security.”

But the privacy folks have a point. Once information is captured, it must be tempting to use it. With little discussion, for instance, driver’s license photographs have been dumped into enormous digital databases, ripe for searches with facial recognition technology. Police departments have started to use the databases to find people and identify suspects. That may be a fine idea, but it is one that has been pursued without real debate or disclosure.

Mr. Mocny made a persuasive case that the move to 10 prints enhanced the legitimate goals of identification and investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0136254

“We’ve identified 1,800 people who’ve tried to lie their way into the United States, and their fingerprints tripped them up,” he said.

The 10-print program will, he said, make identifications even more reliable. “We’re now at 80 million-plus individuals in the system,” he said. “With that many fingerprints, they start to look alike.” More fingers, he said, means more differentiation.

On the investigative side, more fingerprints give the authorities more opportunities to check them against a watch list of 2.5 million prints that includes, he said, “known and suspected terrorists,” sexual predators and people wanted on criminal and immigration charges.

But there are real questions about the reliability of the technologies employed. Though fingerprint evidence is widely assumed to be close to infallible, recall the $2 million the federal government paid in November in the settlement of a lawsuit filed by Brandon Mayfield.

Mr. Mayfield, a lawyer in Oregon, was arrested in 2004 after the F.B.I. definitively and mistakenly concluded that his fingerprints matched one taken from a plastic bag containing detonator caps found at the scene of the bombings in Madrid that year.

“Fingerprints work fine when you have a bank robbery in Chicago,” said Michael Cherry, vice chairman of the digital technology committee of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers. But matching a partial fingerprint of poor quality and uncertain vintage collected in Afghanistan or Iraq to a database of global scope is a different matter.

The 10-print strategy, Mr. Cherry said, is a “technical nightmare that will produce many Brandon Mayfields.”

At an American Bar Association conference in November, Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, said the 10-print program “creates a powerful deterrent for anybody who has ever spent time sitting in a training camp and training or building a bomb in a safe house or carrying out a terrorist mission on a battlefield.”

Those terrorists, presumably, will be deterred by not wanting to test the nation’s border security. Or the deterrent may be a different one: encouraging a generation of young jihadists to wear gloves.

“Unless you believe there’s a constitutional right or a civil liberties right to have phony documents or to pretend to be someone you’re not, I don’t really see the cost in civil liberties,” Mr. Chertoff told the assembled lawyers.

“By the way,” he added, “we’ll be collecting all of your glasses after dinner.”

A Symbolic Setback To Linking Pay With Performance (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

MaxHR is out.

Human Capital Operational Plan is in.

The name change at the Homeland Security Department reflects a new set of priorities aimed at improving how thousands of Border Patrol, customs and immigration officers are hired and how career leaders are chosen and trained.

But the name change -- from trendy branding to prosaic government jargon -- also can be taken as a symbol of how one of the Bush administration's signature efforts to shake up the federal workforce lost momentum because of overly ambitious goals, adverse court rulings and budget cuts.

The shift to the new plan means that a key goal of the Bush White House -- to use about 110,000 Homeland Security employees as a model for a rigorous pay system with raises linked to job performance ratings -- will not be completed before the presidential election in 2008, leaving it to a new White House team to forge on or abandon that effort.

Marta Brito PÃ©rez, who became the department's chief human capital officer five months ago, called the decision to adopt a new workforce management plan "the right thing to do."

"It should be reassuring to the employees, employee representatives, the Hill and the public," she added.

Instead of pushing forward on a department-wide performance-based pay system, Homeland Security will set up a pilot project in 2008 focused on the department's employees who work in intelligence. The pilot will be coordinated with a pay initiative being developed by the director of national intelligence for the government's primary intelligence agencies.

Because intelligence analysts are in high demand across government, the pilot project should help the department stay competitive in hiring and pay while also providing a test of Homeland Security's new performance management system. That system calls for developing job goals for employees, tracking their accomplishments and using job ratings to steer larger pay raises to the best workers.

"There was a conscious decision that this organization needs to have a good performance management program in place before pay can be linked to it," Perez said. "We have to get this right."

DOJ_NMG_0136255

If the pilot goes well, the department in 2009 could move to the next step: shifting employees off the 15-grade General Schedule, a decades-old pay system that the Bush administration faults as giving too many automatic pay raises to federal workers, and into "pay bands" where salaries are more closely tied to occupation and geographic location.

But changing pay rules at Homeland Security may prove difficult. Federal unions have won court rulings that block the department's efforts to limit their bargaining rights, and the department will probably have to negotiate with unions over the design and implementation of a new pay system.

The unions and some employees are skeptical about revamping pay practices, in part because they believe giving managers greater discretion over raises will let them play favorites or use pay decisions to single out employees for punitive actions.

Under the new plan, known as HCOP, the department will focus on hiring and retaining a talented and diverse workforce, creating a "culture of performance," creating high-quality training programs and improving leadership development programs.

PÃ©rez said the department is not jettisoning MaxHR, which kicked off in February 2004. "We are moving beyond Max in areas that are keys to our success," she said.

Still, she acknowledged in an interview, "every time someone mentions Max, their eyes roll," apparently because it has become tainted by union lawsuits or because it is no longer seen as living up to its catchy name.

"We're not going to be using the term MaxHR anymore," PÃ©rez said. "Folks around here don't seem to like it. It is not reflective of the things we are doing."

WAR NEWS:

Rice Decries Democrats' War Tactics (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, February 26, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday denounced the Iraq war resolutions being planned by congressional Democrats as "the worst of micromanagement" that would intrude on the president's power as commander in chief to manage the war.

But Senate Democrats may not be able to force the issue. Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan said his party does "not yet" have 60 votes needed to defeat an expected Republican filibuster of a vote reversing the 2002 Iraq war resolution. "We hope to pick up some Republicans. We don't know if we will," he said.

Miss Rice strongly criticized the Democrats' plans, some of which would also restrict what actions U.S. troops may take or put impossible conditions on their funding.

"I think policies that diminish the flexibility of the commanders, the commander in chief, but especially the commanders in the field, that disrupt the normal process of allowing the executive branch to determine things like training times and so forth, this would be a problem," she said on ABC's "This Week."

She said that while "it's very important for to have the oversight role when it comes to the execution of policy in the field, there has to be a clear relationship between the commander in chief and the commanders in the field."

"If you ever disrupt that chain, then you're going to have the worst of micromanagement of military affairs, and it's always served us badly in the past," Miss Rice said.

Mr. Levin said Democrats still plan to bring forward a resolution that reverses the congressional authorization for President Bush to invade Iraq. Democrats have said they would approve a new resolution limiting the scope of Mr. Bush's ability to wage war in Iraq, with an aim to bring home most U.S. forces from the country by March 2008.

"Hopefully, we're going to come with a resolution which is going to modify, in effect, the previous resolution that was very broad," Mr. Levin, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "We don't believe it is going to be possible to remove all of the troops."

The draft version, supported by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, would restrict U.S. troops to fighting al Qaeda terrorists, training the Iraqi security forces and maintaining Iraq's borders. The approach backed by many House Democrats, led by Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, would only fund U.S. forces in Iraq under onerous conditions that Mr. Murtha has said the Pentagon could not meet.

ABC's "This Week" host George Stephanopoulos asked Miss Rice whether she would recommend that Mr. Bush veto any bills to require forces to leave Iraq. She said that decision was up to the president.

DOJ_NMG_0136256

When Miss Rice was asked on "Fox News Sunday" by host Chris Wallace whether Mr. Bush would "feel bound" by legislation calling for the end of the U.S. combat role, the secretary of state responded: "The president is going to, as commander in chief, need to do what the country needs done."

Mr. Levin declined to say how many American troops should remain if the Democrats' plan to withdraw forces from Iraq passes. However, he was more direct when asked what would happen if Mr. Bush simply ignores any new congressional resolution.

"Well, then we have a constitutional battle on our hands because this is a binding resolution," he said. "It would be very difficult, I think, for him to sustain that position given the fact that he has relied so heavily on our resolution authorizing him to go to war in the first place."

Several Republicans, including some who have turned against the war, have challenged Democrats to vote on a bill that would cut off funding for the war.

"The truth of the matter is there's really only, you know, one way to end the war, if that's what our Democratic friends want to do. That is to cut off the funding for the war," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, during a meeting with reporters on Friday.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who now supports a timetable for a withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq, echoed Mr. McConnell's statement during an appearance yesterday on CBS' "Face the Nation."

"They should cut the funding or let the president do what he needs to do, because to micromanage a war is the worst thing," said Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican. "It's the ingredient for a loss."

Rice Says Congress Shouldn't Micromanage War (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spoke out Sunday against efforts in Congress to limit the role of U.S. forces in Iraq, saying President Bush would not allow himself to be constrained by such a "micromanagement of military affairs."

Asked whether Bush would abide by a binding resolution, now being drafted by Democratic leaders, that would include the start of troop withdrawal from Iraq, Rice told "Fox News Sunday" such a measure would hinder his efforts to support the "flexibility of our commanders to do what they think they need to do on the ground."

"I can't imagine a circumstance in which it's a good thing that their flexibility is constrained by people sitting here in Washington, sitting in the Congress, trying to micromanage this war," Rice said. "I just don't think it's a good thing."

She said Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new U.S. commander in Iraq, backs the president's plan to send in 21,500 more troops, primarily to deal with sectarian violence in Baghdad.

The legislation being drafted by Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and other Democrats would limit the mission by modifying the 2002 resolution authorizing the use of U.S. military force in Iraq.

It would restrict the role of U.S. forces to pursuing Al Qaeda operatives and supporting and training Iraqi army soldiers. It could also set a March 2008 goal for withdrawing troops not involved in those activities.

It is unclear how much bipartisan support Levin and others have managed to gather in the Senate since failing in this month's effort to pass a symbolic resolution opposing the troop buildup. A similar measure passed the House.

Rice, who also appeared on ABC's "This Week," said the restrictions were impractical given the nature of war and counterterrorism in Iraq.

"How do you possibly distinguish what is going on in Baghdad, for instance, from the fight with Al Qaeda?" she said. "Some of these car bombs may indeed be the work of an organization like Al Qaeda or Al Qaedaaffiliated allies."

Levin, on NBC's "Meet the Press," argued that Congress had "the responsibility — not just the power, the responsibility — to speak out and to change the course when you have a failing course, which is what we're on."

"This is not a surge so much as it is a plunge into Baghdad and into the middle of a civil war," Levin said.

Asked if he was "tying the hands of the commander in chief," he answered in part: "Of course we're trying to tie the hands of the president and his policy. We're trying to change the policy. And if someone wants to call that 'tying the hands' instead of 'changing the policy' — yeah, the president needs a check and a balance."

If Congress passes this binding resolution and Bush ignores it, Levin said, "we have a constitutional battle on our hands."

Deauthorizing Iraq (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, February 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136257

Democratic senators face trouble this week trying to cleanse themselves of the stain of voting for President Bush's Iraq war resolution. Republican senators who have turned against the U.S. military intervention in Iraq are not interested in bailing out Democrats by approving their proposal to repeal the authorization overwhelmingly passed by Congress in 2002.

As Congress returns this week from the year's first recess, an amendment to repeal authorization is supposed to be attached to the bill containing homeland security recommendations by the Sept. 11 commission. But Sen. Norm Coleman, who has become prominent among Republican critics of Bush's war policy, told me from his home state of Minnesota that he would oppose deauthorization and predicted that no more than two Republican senators would vote for it.

One of those two Republican senators would have to be Nebraska's Chuck Hagel, who has fearlessly critiqued Bush's war policy. But Hagel told me that he is not inclined to support a repeal. If Hagel is lost, Democrats might fall short of the 50 votes necessary for final passage, much less the 60 necessary to close off debate. George W. Bush may be an unpopular president fighting an unpopular war, but Democrats are finding it hard to make war policy from Capitol Hill.

Democrats do not cloak the political nature of their efforts. Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden, participating in a Nevada forum for Democratic presidential candidates last week, exultantly announced to applause his intent to "revoke the president's authority that he was given . . . to go to war." The mantra is not limited to the presidential hopefuls from the Senate. On the campaign trail in New Hampshire, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico also called for de-authorization.

The de-authorization effort follows a series of frustrations for Democrats. Biden, having regained the Foreign Relations chairmanship after the 2006 elections, pushed a harshly worded, though nonbinding, antiwar resolution that went nowhere. A milder bipartisan measure fell short of the votes needed for cloture. Democratic backing for a plan to place conditions on the funding for Bush's surge of troops dropped off when its sponsor, Rep. John Murtha, bragged that troops in the field "won't have the equipment" under his plan.

As Congress began its break, Biden and Carl Levin, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, looked to events 37 years ago. A 1964 resolution (passed with only two dissenting votes in the Senate) gave President Lyndon B. Johnson his requested free hand in Vietnam because of a trumped-up attack on a U.S. naval vessel in the Gulf of Tonkin. It was repealed in 1970 as an amendment to a noncontroversial bill.

But as is true with most Iraq-Vietnam analogies, de-authorization of the Tonkin Gulf resolution bears little resemblance to what is being contemplated today. President Richard M. Nixon began pulling combat troops out of Vietnam soon after he took office in 1969, and he offered no objection to repeal of the LBJ resolution. It passed the Senate 81 to 10, with unanimous support from Republicans.

In contrast, the proposed 2007 de-authorization looks like a Democratic effort to escape the wrath of the antiwar party faithful. Of the 29 Democrats who voted for the 2002 war resolution over four years ago, 21 are still in the Senate, seven are up for reelection next year and three -- Biden, Christopher Dodd and Hillary Clinton -- are running for president.

After checking with antiwar Republicans on recess last week, I found that several who had favored a nonbinding resolution rejecting Bush's policy are loath to give Democrats a get-out-of-jail-free card on Iraq. An exception was Sen. Gordon Smith of Oregon, who indicated he might favor de-authorization but would never vote to cut off funds. However, Coleman told me: "I don't see us going back and rewriting history." Similarly, Hagel said: "We are not going back and rewind every decision we made."

Hagel's position is critical. Before the recess, Biden and Levin sought support from the conservative who had been one of only two Republicans to back their tough nonbinding resolution. Hagel has long been appalled by Bush's war policy, but he is rightly suspicious of Democratic ploys that would have no impact on dire conditions in Iraq.

Specter Explores Congress' Role On War Policies (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 26, 2007

Even as Senate Democrats ready a bill to rewrite President Bush's authorization for the Iraq War, Senate Judiciary ranking member Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) is raising constitutional questions about just what Congress can do to restrict the commander in chief's ability to wage war.

"I'm worried that the Congress is going to go off half-cocked," said Specter, according to a transcript of a Feb. 22 interview with the Philadelphia Inquirer. "I don't want to see something come to the Senate and have a historic debate ... and be called upon to vote on something which I haven't fully explored, and the Senate doesn't understand."

In a Feb. 20 letter to Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), Specter called for more hearings on Congress' options regarding Iraq and specifically questioned the Democrats' nascent plan to rewrite the 2002 Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Iraq.

"I question whether, absent the use of the appropriations power, the only choice for the Congress is a total repeal of the authorization to use military force in Iraq," Specter wrote. "If Congress acts to repeal the authorization to use force in Iraq, the question may arise whether the President may veto that action requiring a two-thirds override."

Indeed, Bush is unlikely to sign such a repeal or any modification to the 2002 Iraq War authorization, and Senate Republicans are expected to vigorously object to — and possibly filibuster — any new authorization measure.

But Specter indicated in his letter that if a new war authorization measure were to become law, it would be binding on the president even though Bush and other presidents have treated war authorizations as mere expressions of support that do not have the force of law.

Specter pointed out that the current war authorization governing the Iraq conflict "placed restrictions on the President's use of force in Iraq, requiring him to certify that diplomatic means are insufficient and that the use of force will not impede the war on terrorism," among other things.

Of course, Congress twice repealed the use of force authorization for the Vietnam War, but then-President Lyndon Johnson essentially told Members that he never needed their permission in the first place, noted Louis Fisher, a Constitutional scholar at the Law Library of Congress.

Specter also outlined a number of ways in which Congress previously has restricted or cut off funds for war efforts, most notably during then-President Richard Nixon's administration in the early 1970s.

However, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has repeatedly said that Democrats will not move to cut off funding for troops currently in Iraq and he has reacted coolly to proposals to restrict funds for Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to the region.

In the Philadelphia Inquirer interview, Specter said Rep. John Murtha's (D-Pa.) proposal to use the appropriations power to put strict limits on troop movements in an attempt to force a draw-down of troops in Iraq might go too far.

He said the key question Senators must answer will be "where Congressional power ends under the precedents that I cited in the letter and where micromanagement begins."

In the letter, which Leahy's office said he had not yet seen, Specter outlined several other ways that Congress could effect a change in the president's Iraq policy, while Democrats also said the authorization for the war is just one weapon in their arsenal.

"We're examining all our options to force President Bush to make the necessary changes in Iraq," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

Though Specter declined to specify what he would be willing to vote for, he noted in his letter that Congress in the past has dictated military personnel choices to the president as well as troop levels under its constitutional authority to "raise and regulate armies and navies."

Following the Civil War, for example, Congress barred then-President Andrew Johnson from firing Gen. Ulysses S. Grant without prior approval from the Senate, the letter stated. Under then-President Theodore Roosevelt, Congress required that the crews on naval vessels should be made up of at least 8 percent Marines.

"This represents a specific action by the Congress to control a quite specific aspect of warfare," Specter noted of the naval vessel provision.

Fisher, however, said Congress has even more options — from targeting the president's domestic priorities to removing him from office.

"One big recourse, when you're dealing with the president, is that you can always [use Congressional powers] to hurt him elsewhere," said Fisher, who testified at a Jan. 30 Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on the subject of Congress' war powers. "The big one at the very end, of course, is impeachment."

The Choice On Iraq (WSJ)

By Joseph Lieberman

The Wall Street Journal, February 26, 2007

Two months into the 110th Congress, Washington has never been more bitterly divided over our mission in Iraq. The Senate and House of Representatives are bracing for parliamentary trench warfare -- trapped in an escalating dynamic of division and confrontation that will neither resolve the tough challenges we face in Iraq nor strengthen our nation against its terrorist enemies around the world.

What is remarkable about this state of affairs in Washington is just how removed it is from what is actually happening in Iraq. There, the battle of Baghdad is now under way. A new commander, Gen. David Petraeus, has taken command, having been confirmed by the Senate, 81-0, just a few weeks ago. And a new strategy is being put into action, with thousands of additional American soldiers streaming into the Iraqi capital.

Congress thus faces a choice in the weeks and months ahead. Will we allow our actions to be driven by the changing conditions on the ground in Iraq -- or by the unchanging political and ideological positions long ago staked out in Washington? What ultimately matters more to us: the real fight over there, or the political fight over here?

If we stopped the legislative maneuvering and looked to Baghdad, we would see what the new security strategy actually entails and how dramatically it differs from previous efforts. For the first time in the Iraqi capital, the focus of the U.S. military is not just training indigenous forces or chasing down insurgents, but ensuring basic security -- meaning an end, at last, to the large-scale sectarian slaughter and ethnic cleansing that has paralyzed Iraq for the past year.

Tamping down this violence is more than a moral imperative. Al Qaeda's stated strategy in Iraq has been to provoke a Sunni-Shiite civil war, precisely because they recognize that it is their best chance to radicalize the country's politics, derail any hope of democracy in the Middle East, and drive the U.S. to despair and retreat. It also takes advantage of what has been the single greatest American weakness in Iraq: the absence of sufficient troops to protect ordinary Iraqis from violence and terrorism.

The new strategy at last begins to tackle these problems. Where previously there weren't enough soldiers to hold key neighborhoods after they had been cleared of extremists and militias, now more U.S. and Iraqi forces are either in place or on the way. Where previously American forces were based on the outskirts of Baghdad, unable to help secure the city, now they are living and working side-by-side with their Iraqi counterparts on small bases being set up throughout the capital.

At least four of these new joint bases have already been established in the Sunni neighborhoods in west Baghdad -- the same neighborhoods where, just a few weeks ago, jihadists and death squads held sway. In the Shiite neighborhoods of east Baghdad, American troops are also moving in -- and Moqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi army are moving out.

We of course will not know whether this new strategy in Iraq will succeed for some time. Even under the most optimistic of scenarios, there will be more attacks and casualties in the months ahead, especially as our fanatical enemies react and attempt to thwart any perception of progress.

But the fact is that we are in a different place in Iraq today from even just a month ago -- with a new strategy, a new commander, and more troops on the ground. We are now in a stronger position to ensure basic security -- and with that, we are in a stronger position to marginalize the extremists and strengthen the moderates; a stronger position to foster the economic activity that will drain the insurgency and militias of public support; and a stronger position to press the Iraqi government to make the tough decisions that everyone acknowledges are necessary for progress.

Unfortunately, for many congressional opponents of the war, none of this seems to matter. As the battle of Baghdad just gets underway, they have already made up their minds about America's cause in Iraq, declaring their intention to put an end to the mission before we have had the time to see whether our new plan will work.

There is of course a direct and straightforward way that Congress could end the war, consistent with its authority under the Constitution: by cutting off funds. Yet this option is not being proposed. Critics of the war instead are planning to constrain and squeeze the current strategy and troops by a thousand cuts and conditions.

Among the specific ideas under consideration are to tangle up the deployment of requested reinforcements by imposing certain "readiness" standards, and to redraft the congressional authorization for the war, apparently in such a way that Congress will assume the role of commander in chief and dictate when, where and against whom U.S. troops can fight.

I understand the frustration, anger and exhaustion so many Americans feel about Iraq, the desire to throw up our hands and simply say, "Enough." And I am painfully aware of the enormous toll of this war in human life, and of the infuriating mistakes that have been made in the war's conduct.

But we must not make another terrible mistake now. Many of the worst errors in Iraq arose precisely because the Bush administration best-cased what would happen after Saddam was overthrown. Now many opponents of the war are making the very same best-case mistake -- assuming we can pull back in the midst of a critical battle with impunity, even arguing that our retreat will reduce the terrorism and sectarian violence in Iraq.

In fact, halting the current security operation at midpoint, as virtually all of the congressional proposals seek to do, would have devastating consequences. It would put thousands of American troops already deployed in the heart of Baghdad in even greater danger -- forced to choose between trying to hold their position without the required reinforcements or, more likely, abandoning them outright. A precipitous pullout would leave a gaping security vacuum in its wake, which terrorists, insurgents, militias and Iran would rush to fill -- probably resulting in a spiral of ethnic cleansing and slaughter on a scale as yet unseen in Iraq.

I appeal to my colleagues in Congress to step back and think carefully about what to do next. Instead of undermining Gen. Petraeus before he has been in Iraq for even a month, let us give him and his troops the time and support they need to succeed.

Gen. Petraeus says he will be able to see whether progress is occurring by the end of the summer, so let us declare a truce in the Washington political war over Iraq until then. Let us come together around a constructive legislative agenda for our security: authorizing an increase in the size of the Army and Marines, funding the equipment and protection our troops need, monitoring progress on the ground in Iraq with oversight hearings, investigating contract procedures, and guaranteeing Iraq war veterans the first-class treatment and care they deserve when they come home.

We are at a critical moment in Iraq -- at the beginning of a key battle, in the midst of a war that is irretrievably bound up in an even bigger, global struggle against the totalitarian ideology of radical Islamism. However tired, however frustrated, however angry we may feel, we must remember that our forces in Iraq carry America's cause -- the cause of freedom -- which we abandon at our peril.

The Politics Of The Brit Drawdown (NSWK)

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

In public, British and American officials say the U.K.'s withdrawal of troops from southern Iraq is a sign of success. But that wasn't the private reaction when the Brits first explained their plans last year. Several officials on both sides of the Atlantic (who all declined to be named when discussing the internal debate on security issues) say there was real consternation among Bush's aides about the prospect of a British withdrawal at a time when the president was planning to make the case for a surge of troops. Two senior officials in Washington said the concern was about how the British drawdown would look in PR and political terms inside the Beltway.

The two sides have been running on different tracks for several months. As the Brits outlined their plans for withdrawal, in November and December of last year, the details of Bush's surge were far from settled. At the same time, the Baker-Hamilton group was releasing an alternative strategy for Iraq. British officials were far more supportive of the study group's proposals than their counterparts inside the White House were. But the Brits also admitted that their challenges in southern Iraq are much simpler than the sectarian war facing American troops in and around Baghdad. After several rounds of talks, the Americans were eventually satisfied that Britain's phased withdrawal would truly be "conditions-based"; that the reduction in force was geared to the security situation on the ground and not a politically inspired cut-and-run.

In fact, the British officials concede that Prime Minister Tony Blair has a strong political interest in starting the endgame for his engagement in Iraq before he hands over power to his political ally Gordon Brown. Democrats in Washington, meanwhile, treated the news as a flak jacket against GOP accusations that they support a policy of retreat. "No matter how the White House tries to spin it, the British government has decided to split with President Bush," said Sen. Ted Kennedy.

On the ground in Iraq, rival Shiite parties are already jockeying for power. "The withdrawal of the British forces is a political decision to save Blair more than it is a decision to help the people of Iraq," says Ali Yassin of the Fadhila Party in Basra. "We are afraid of the vacuum that will come after the withdrawal of the British forces."

Britain, which had more than 40,000 troops in the region at the time of the 2003 invasion, now has 7,100 troops in Iraq. Blair said the number could "possibly" drop to below 5,000 by the end of the year. One Downing Street source told NEWSWEEK that it's "potentially the case" that all British troops could be out of Iraq by the end of 2008. That would happen only if conditions allowed, but he said, "We believe things are heading in that direction." In that case, the Brits are on the same timeline as most of the Democratic candidates who want to succeed President Bush in 2009.

Samuelson: A $2 Trillion Footnote? (NSWK)

By Robert J. Samuelson

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

Anyone who practices deadline journalism is bound to find much to regret—things you wish you'd said (or hadn't said) and words, arguments and attitudes that, with hindsight, seem poorly chosen. Which brings me to my September 2002 column, "A War We Can Afford." As the situation in Iraq has deteriorated, some readers have suggested that I revisit that column and confess to error. Let me now take up their invitation, because today's ferocious war debate raises many of the same issues.

Yes, that column made big mistakes. The war has cost far more than I (or almost anyone) anticipated. Still, I defend the column's central thesis, which remains relevant today: budget costs should not shape our Iraq policy. Frankly, I don't know what we should do now. But in considering the various proposals—Bush's "surge," fewer troops or redeployment of those already there—the costs should be a footnote. We ought to focus mostly on what's best for America's security, the situation in Iraq and our global influence.

To be sure, the war's costs have been huge. Since September 2001, Congress has provided $503 billion for Iraq, Afghanistan and related activities, says the Congressional Budget Office. The administration's request for fiscal 2007 (ending in September) and fiscal 2008 would bring the total to $746 billion. Iraq represents about 70 percent of that. By contrast, my original column put the cost of an Iraq war at up to $80 billion. That was based on the cost then of the war in Afghanistan ($10 billion), the cost of the first gulf war ($61 billion) and the expectation that another invasion would involve fewer troops (it did). It also assumed that U.S. troops wouldn't stay indefinitely.

As to the future, CBO has done two "illustrative scenarios"—one involving a troop reduction to 30,000 by 2010, the other a reduction to 75,000 by 2013. In both instances, troop levels would remain until 2017. By CBO's estimates, the two scenarios would involve extra spending from 2009 to 2017 of $269 billion and $696 billion, respectively.

Finally, the war has created costs that, though they don't show up in accounts labeled "Iraq," are properly attributed to Iraq. Trucks, helicopters and tanks are wearing out at faster rates; they'll have to be replaced or refurbished. Recruiting costs have risen. Veterans' disability benefits and health costs are increasing. Already, 1.4 million U.S. troops have served in the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, says Linda Bilmes, a budget expert at Harvard. Since the first gulf war, almost 40 percent of veterans have received disability benefits, she says. The rate for today's wars could be higher. She estimates the present value of future disability and health benefits at between $300 billion and $600 billion.

The war has clearly worsened the long-term budget outlook. How then can I treat that so lightly? What's missing is context. Dominated by Social Security and health care, the federal budget now totals nearly $3 trillion annually. No one knows what the wars' ultimate costs might be. But suppose that they reach $2 trillion by 2017 (the figure is cumulative, not in any one year). That's a big number, perhaps too big. It's also a wild guess. Still, CBO estimates all federal spending over the same period (2002-2017) will total $48 trillion; war spending would be about 4 percent. In the same period, the income of the U.S. economy (gross domestic product) would total an estimated $248 trillion; war spending would be less than 1 percent of that. The point, as I said in 2002, is that we're so wealthy we "can wage war almost with pocket change."

With hindsight, it now seems almost incontestable that the Iraq war should never have been fought. It has eroded our global power, weakened our military and resulted in thousands of American and Iraqi deaths. What I most regret about my earlier column is that it seemed to bless a war, when I was mainly trying to focus attention on questions more important than money. Given the headline (I wrote it) and the fact that those questions came at the end of the column ("Is this war justifiable? Should the United States go it alone? What would happen if we don't fight? What will happen if we do?"), the reaction was understandable. In truth, I was uncertain about the war then, just as I'm unsure of what to do now.

But I am certain—now as then—that budget consequences should occupy a minor spot in our war debates. It's not that the costs are unimportant; it's simply that they're overshadowed by other considerations that are so much more important. We should argue about what's best for our national security. We can pay for whatever's necessary. If we decide to do less because that's the most sensible policy, we shouldn't delude ourselves that any "savings" will rescue us from our long-term budget predicament, which involves the huge costs of federal retirement programs. Just because the war is unpopular doesn't mean it's the source of all our problems.

Zakaria: Iraq Needs An 'Economic Surge' (NSWK)

By Fareed Zakaria

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

We are now fighting a war intelligently in Iraq. The only problem is, it's the last war, not the present one. The United States has gambled all its efforts on a troop surge that tackles the conflict that defined Iraq from 2003 to 2005—the insurgency—rather than the civil war now raging across the country. Worse, in trying to solve yesterday's problem we are exacerbating today's. In Baghdad, Shiite militias have melted away. Almost all U.S. military operations are now directed against Sunni insurgents. If those are successful, the picture could look less violent in six months, but it will be a dangerous stasis. A senior U.S. military officer, who is not allowed to speak on the record on these matters, said to me, "If we continue down the path we're on, the Sunnis in Iraq will throw their lot behind Al Qaeda, and the Sunni majority in the Arab world will believe that we helped in the killing and cleansing of their brethren in Iraq. That's not a good outcome for the security of the American people."

We don't intend to side with anyone. We're trying to be evenhanded and build a single, democratic nation. But this attempt at neutrality is collapsing in Iraq's bloody sectarian reality. Last week's uproar over allegations that Shiite policemen in Baghdad had raped a 20-year-old Sunni woman vividly illustrates how trust between the two communities has been shattered. Shiite Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki first ordered an investigation, then 12 hours later declared the woman a liar, freed and rewarded the alleged rapists and later fired a Sunni official who had called for an unbiased investigation. Meanwhile we're stuck in the middle, promising to uncover the truth while both sides are convinced that we've betrayed them. This is the definition of a no-win strategy.

The United States needs to find fresh approaches that won't feed the sectarian dynamic and will address the needs of ordinary Iraqis, not the political elites who are jockeying for power. Most important, we need to find a strategy whose costs are sustainable. Militarily this means drawing down our forces to around 60,000 troops and concentrating on Al Qaeda in Anbar province. The surge we should be pushing instead is a political one, and even more critically, an economic one.

An economic surge is long overdue. One of the less-remarked-upon blunders of the Coalition Provisional Authority was that—consumed by free-market ideology—it shut down all of Iraq's state-owned enterprises. This crippled the bulk of Iraq's non-oil economy, threw hundreds of thousands of workers into the streets and further alienated the Sunnis, who were the managerial class of the country. The economic effects of this decision have been seismic. For example, Iraq's agricultural productivity has plummeted because fertilizer plants were summarily closed. Unemployment in non-Kurdish Iraq remains close to 50 percent, which helps explain why so many young men are joining gangs, militias and insurgent groups. For the moment at least, democracy in Iraq has sharpened the country's divisions. Capitalism and commerce can make them less relevant. That is the lesson of many conflict-ridden countries from Northern Ireland to Mozambique to Vietnam.

Paul Brinkley, a talented deputy under secretary of Defense, is trying to get the bulk of these state-owned factories up and running. He's already restarted a bus factory in Iskandariyah, south of Baghdad, and the experience has been telling. Hundreds of workers still in the area showed up for work and the machines are now humming busily. There have been no attacks on the factory. "The insurgents attack people working for the police, Army or the Americans. They do not want to alienate locals trying to make ends meet," said one official working on the project.

Of the original 193 state enterprises, 143 could be restarted soon, says Brinkley. Management and workers are desperate to get jobs. The problem is money. Brinkley points out that his next target, a ceramics factory in Ramadi, is only waiting for two generators before it can reopen. They cost $1 million each. But funds for this purpose are hard to find. Washington has pledged more than $18 billion to fund "reconstruction" in Iraq but will not appropriate a cent to start up state-owned Iraqi companies. The Iraqi government has billions in oil revenue of its own but is so dysfunctional that it cannot move a new project through the system. So the factory is idle. A major global consulting firm has reviewed Iraq's state-owned enterprises and estimated that it would cost $100 million to restart all of them and employ more than 150,000 Iraqis—$100 million. That's as much money as the American military will spend in Iraq in the next 12 hours.

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

'It's too soon to tell," The late Chinese leader Zhou Enlai is reported to have answered when asked for an evaluation of the significance of the French Revolution of 1789. This was nearly two centuries after the great upheaval of France. Revolutions are full of cunning, and the Iranian Revolution, now almost three decades old, has been no exception-cunning and ferocity side by side, the talk of a revolutionary millennium often concealing the skills of a leadership steeped in the ways of the bazaar. Shrewd players, these clerical leaders have found the cracks in the order of states around them. Brutal men, they rule a society of great historical sophistication. Given room to maneuver by a substantial windfall of oil income, they have made their nation a player of consequence in its neighborhood. Sly and opportunistic, Iran's rulers have been able to pick and choose at a time, and in a place, of great volatility.

American power swept away two regimes that the Iranians dreaded-the Taliban in Afghanistan and Saddam Hussein in Iraq. True, America was now a land power on Iran's flanks; the Iranians ducked at first, then gathered themselves as the American burden grew. Mixing bravado and bluff, and granting proxies in Palestine and Lebanon, the leaders of the Iranian theocracy appear to have succeeded in spreading the image of a mighty power able to have its way in the world. For some, that great arc stretching from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean is now a battleground between Pax Americana and the Persians. This belief is in part due to the abdication of the Arab states, their virtual absence from the contest of nations. There is bigotry in Arab lands, an animus on the part of the Sunni majority toward the political emancipation of the Arab Shiites. Arab diplomats and leaders shy away from Iraq-the pitiless jihadists are the only Arabs who come to Iraq-but the Iranians are present in force as pilgrims and traders and troublemakers and intelligence operatives.

"A cemetery of dreams." Iran is a radical player in the world of states, to be sure, but we should not overstate its power. We should not fall for the Persian bluff. It is important that we do all we can to thwart Iran's nuclear ambitions and to checkmate it in arenas that count, but we should always remember that this is a society swimming against the tide of history and confronting the limits of its capabilities. There is an Iranian role in Iraq, but it should not be exaggerated. It is not true that the Iraqi political class marches to the Iranian drummer. It is well known that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki spent his years of exile in Syria and kept his distance from the Iranians. "Iraq is a cemetery of dreams," a thoughtful Iraqi observed to me of his country. "Iranian dreams, no less than American dreams perhaps." Iraqis are a tough breed, and the notion that they are eager to take their country into a Persian dominion is unconvincing. The Iranians dwell virtually alone in the House of Islam, separated by language and culture, marked by their Shiism.

Then there are the troubles that count-the disabilities at home. Iran's deranged president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, came into power promising to put Iran's oil wealth "on the dinner table." But the Iranian economy is on the ropes. Hyperinflation, the drying up of international credit lines, and the astounding growth in energy consumption in Iran are bringing the country to the edge of crisis. The price of bread and meat and basic commodities has risen by as much as 25 percent. To tranquilize the realm, gasoline is subsidized well below its cost, and domestic consumption now accounts for a stunning 40 percent of Iran's oil production. Dire predictions now hold that the country will be unable to export much oil a decade from now.

The true believers will proclaim that revolutionary purity trumps all, but worldly needs and affairs ultimately prevail. A society that spends $20 billion a year to subsidize the price of energy, electricity, and gasoline will in the end have to contend with the wrath and disappointment of its people. There is swagger in Iran, and there is menace, for its rulers are without scruples. Terrorism, for them, is always an option. But theirs is a vulnerable and brittle society. There is no need to "engage" them and bail them out as they stumble. The regime should be harassed, contained, and held to account. We may not have to wait two centuries to pronounce on the fate of this revolution. The swagger abroad and the rot at home: It is a trajectory we are all too familiar with by now.

Just The Facts, Ma'am (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, February 26, 2007

The dark art of intelligence, never far from the surface in our post-9/11 world, is once again front and center, only not exactly in the way President Bush might have wished. After several weeks of on-again, off-again promises of a top-secret briefing on the alleged role of Iranian agents in the nightmarish violence of Iraq, U.S. military officials finally decided to deliver the goods in a secret briefing to reporters in Baghdad-and promptly stubbed their toe. The charge of Iranian meddling in Iraq is a grave one and needs to be dealt with seriously. But given the Bush administration's dismal record in the intelligence arena, the Baghdad briefing was handled in the worst way possible. No cameras or tape recorders were allowed. The identity of the intelligence analyst who led the briefing was not disclosed. And despite weeks of careful vetting by intelligence and military officials back in Washington, the briefing ran disastrously off message. This is all the more sad for the fact that there was, at the heart of the briefing, what appeared to be some very credible evidence to support the allegations against Iran.

One of the few salutary things about military conflict is that in bringing soldiers face to face with the enemy, it affords the opportunity of collecting courtroom-quality evidence that is the intelligence equivalent of the Holy Grail. That seems to have been the case here. The reporters in Baghdad were shown physical evidence-materiel, serial numbers, and the like-indicating that Iranian agents were shipping a highly lethal new roadside bomb into Iraq. More damningly, intelligence officials concluded that the agents were members of an elite cadre called the Quds force, a unit of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guards Force, which reports directly to Iranian leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. That's about as good as intelligence work gets. But then the briefer blew his case sky-high with this statement: "So the activities that the ... Quds force are conducting in Iraq, we assess, are coming from the highest levels of the Iranian government."

Iraq syndrome. It took the Pentagon's highest-ranking soldier, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to flatly refute the unsupported "highest levels" statement. Then President Bush finally got around to doing the same thing. "We don't know ... whether the head leaders of Iran ordered" it, he conceded.

For all the predictable-and, evidently, unfounded-criticism about the Bush administration's trying to make a case for attacking Iran, much as it made its flawed case for attacking Iraq, there is more at stake here than politics as usual, and perhaps President Bush's forthright rejection of the "highest leaders" charge was a tentative first step toward acknowledging it. Yes, the alleged parallels between Iraq and Vietnam have been badly overdrawn. But there is one fitting comparison whose implications the Bush administration-and perhaps succeeding administrations-will have to learn to live with. The lies and self-delusional scenarios our military and political leaders indulged themselves in during the Vietnam War created a long hangover effect called the Vietnam syndrome. As a result of the many misapprehensions and misstatements made before the invasion of Iraq and in its mismanaged aftermath, we are now beset by something that can only be called the Iraq syndrome. Its symptoms may be seen not just in the cynicism of so many Americans, as reflected in the opinion polls, but also in the reflexive rejection of American pronouncements by friends and allies even, as was the case with the unfortunate Baghdad briefing, when they are tenanted upon hard, credible evidence.

In the global war on terrorism, no tool will be more critical to American success than good intelligence. This administration, however, has done much to render that tool almost unfit for use. The tawdry disclosures from the perjury trial of Vice President Cheney's former aide, Lewis "Scooter" Libby, and the scathing Pentagon report against former Rumsfeld aide Douglas Feith show an administration dangerously cavalier about the credibility of its most critical intelligence and seemingly unconcerned about employing it in an overtly political context..

Vice President Cheney may feel as if the prewar intelligence failures on Iraq have been dealt with by simply hanging the issue around the neck of George "Slam Dunk" Tenet, the former director of central intelligence. And President Bush may sleep easier at night, having finally acceded to the demands that he create a new Director of National Intelligence office to fix the problems exposed by both Iraq and the 9/11 attacks. The jury on the latter is still out, but the implications of the Iraq syndrome are so pernicious that, for a long time to come, much greater care will have to be taken in the collection, analysis, and portrayal of American intelligence information. Credibility takes a long time to build, but it can be lost in just an instant.

How U.S. Is Failing Its War Veterans (NSWK)

By Dan Ephron And Sarah Childress

Newsweek, February 25, 2007

After returning from Iraq in late 2005, Jonathan Schulze spent every day struggling not to fall apart. When a Department of Veterans Affairs clinic turned him away last month, he lost the battle. The 25-year-old Marine from Stewart, Minn., had told his parents that 16 men in his unit had died in two days of battle in Ramadi. At home, he was drinking hard to stave off the nightmares. Though he managed to get a job as a roofer, he was suffering flashbacks and panic attacks so intense that he couldn't concentrate on his work. Sometimes, he heard in his mind the haunting chants of the muezzin—the Muslim call to prayer that he'd heard many times in Iraq. Again and again, he'd relive the moments he was in a Humvee, manning the machine gun, but helpless to save his fellow Marines. "He'd be seeing them in his own mind, standing in front of him," says his stepmother, Marianne.

Schulze, who earned two Purple Hearts for wounds sustained in Iraq, was initially reluctant to turn to the VA. Raised among fighters—Schulze's father served in Vietnam and over the years his older brother and six stepbrothers all enlisted in the military—Jonathan might have felt asking for help didn't befit a Marine.

But when the panic attacks got to be too much, he started showing up at the VA emergency room, where doctors recommended he try group therapy. He resisted; he didn't think hearing other veterans' depressing problems would help solve his own. Then, early last month, after more than a year of anxiety, he finally decided to admit himself to an inpatient program. Schulze packed a bag on Jan. 11 and drove with his family to the VA center in St. Cloud, about 70 miles away. The Schulzes were ushered into the mental-health-care unit and an intake worker sat down at a computer across from them. "She started typing," Marianne says. "She asked, 'Do you feel suicidal?' and Jonathan said, 'Yes, I feel suicidal'." The woman kept typing, seemingly unconcerned. Marianne was livid. "He's an Iraqi veteran!" she snapped. "Listen to him!" The woman made a phone call, then told him no one was available that day to screen him for hospitalization. Jonathan could come back tomorrow or call the counselor for a screening on the phone.

When he did call the following day, the response from the clinic was even more disheartening: the center was full. Schulze would be No. 26 on the waiting list. He was encouraged to call back periodically over the next two weeks in case there was a cancellation. Marianne was listening in on the conversation from the dining room. She watched Jonathan, slumped on the couch, as he talked to the doctor. "I heard him say the same thing: I'm suicidal, I feel lost, I feel hopelessness," she says. Four days later Schulze got drunk, wrapped an electrical cord around a basement beam in his home and hanged himself. A friend he telephoned while tying the noose called the police, but by the time officers broke down the door, Schulze was dead.

How well do we care for our wounded and impaired when they come home? For a country amid what President Bush calls a "long war," the question has profound moral implications. We send young Americans to the world's most unruly places to execute our national policies. About 50,000 service members so far have been banged up or burned, suffered disease, lost limbs or sacrificed something less tangible inside them. Schulze is an extreme example but not an isolated one, and such stories are raising concerns that the country is failing to meet its most basic obligations to those who fight our wars.

The question of after-action care also has strategic consequences. Iraq marks the first drawn-out campaign we've fought with an all-volunteer military. In practice, that means far fewer Americans are taking part in this war (12 percent of the total population participated in World War II, 2 percent in Vietnam and less than half of 1 percent in Iraq and Afghanistan). Already, the war has made it harder for the military to recruit new soldiers and more expensive to retain the ones it has. If we fall down in the attention we provide them, who's to say volunteers will continue coming forward?

The issue of veterans' care jumped into the headlines last week when The Washington Post published a series about Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C. The stories revealed decay and mismanagement at the hospital, and provoked shock and concern among politicians in both parties. "The doctors were fantastic," a Walter Reed patient, 21-year-old Marissa Strock, tells NEWSWEEK. "But some of the nurses and other staffers here have been a nightmare." Strock suffered multiple injuries, including broken bones, a lacerated liver and severely bruised lungs, when her Humvee rolled over an improvised explosive device on Nov. 24, 2005. She later had both her legs amputated. "I think a big part of [Walter Reed's problems] is they just don't have enough people to adequately handle all the wounded troops coming in here every day," she says. (Walter Reed did not respond to requests for comment about Strock's case.) The Pentagon responded swiftly to the Post series. It vowed to investigate what went wrong and immediately sent a repair crew to repaint and fix the damage to the aging buildings.

The revelations were especially shocking because Walter Reed is one of the country's most prestigious military hospitals, often visited by prominent politicians, including the president. But it is just one part of a vast network of hospitals and clinics that serve wounded soldiers and veterans throughout the country. A NEWSWEEK investigation focused not on one facility but on the services of the Department of Veterans Affairs, a 235,000-person bureaucracy that provides medical care to a much larger number of servicemen and women from the time they're released from the military, and doles out their disability payments. Our reporting paints a grim portrait of an overloaded bureaucracy cluttered with red tape; veterans having to wait weeks or months for mental-health care and other appointments; families sliding into debt as VA case managers study disability claims over many months, and the seriously wounded requiring help from outside experts just to understand the VA's arcane system of rights and benefits. "In no way do I diminish the fact that there are veterans out there who are coming in who require treatment and maybe are not getting the treatment they need," White House Deputy Press Secretary Tony Fratto tells NEWSWEEK. "It's real and it exists."

The system's shortcomings are certainly not deliberate; no organization is perfect. Some of the VA's hospitals have been cited as among the best in the country, and even in extreme cases, the picture is seldom black-and-white. Before he killed himself, Schulze was seen by the VA 46 times, VA Secretary James Nicholson told Congress this month. (He did not elaborate on what care Schulze received.)

Yet, as the number of veterans continues to grow, critics worry the VA is in a state of denial. In a broad sense, the situation at the VA seems to mirror the overall lack of planning for the war. "We know the VA doesn't have the capacity to process a large number of disability claims at the same time," says Linda Bilmes, a Harvard public-finance professor and former Clinton administration Commerce Department official. Last month Bilmes released a 34-page study on the long-term cost of caring for veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan. She projects that at least 700,000 veterans from the global war on terror (GWOT) will flood the system in the coming years.

As it is, for some veterans the wait can be agonizing. Patrick Feges was on hold for 17 months until his first disability check from the VA came through. An Eagle Scout from Sugar Land, Texas, Feges enlisted in 2003 and found himself in Ramadi a year later. In October 2004, a mortar exploded on his base about 50 yards from him, spraying him with shrapnel, slicing his intestines and severing a major artery. Feges lost consciousness and was flown to Walter Reed, where he underwent surgery. Long scars trail down his legs and midsection. At the hospital a fellow Texan came to visit: President Bush stood by his bed and chatted with him.

Feges is a polite 22-year-old with a military manner. He addresses strangers by last name and an honorific, even when prodded to drop the formality. "I was brought up right, sir," he explains. But his voice rises slightly when he describes his ordeal with the VA. A case officer in Houston processed Feges's request for disability in September 2005, then lost his application. Feges was summoned to repeated medical evaluations at the Houston center, but a year later he was still waiting for a check. By then, Feges had been accepted to culinary school in Austin and did not want to put off his studies. His mother, an elementary-school teacher, took a second job at a local McDonald's to help support him.

For discharged service members, the VA serves two functions: it provides medical care for service-related conditions at its clinics and hospitals across the country, and it reviews claims for disability benefits—chiefly, the monthly payments wounded veterans get for the rest of their lives. The review process can be complicated. It requires veterans to prove, through documents and sometimes through the testimony of fellow soldiers, that their afflictions are a result of their time in the military. Feges listed on his application all the ways he'd been affected by the wounds: he'd lost mobility in his ankles and knees, he suffered regular stomach cramps from the intestinal wound, he lost sensation in his hands and legs, he had trouble standing for long periods. NEWSWEEK presented the VA with the names and details of the veterans whose stories are told here, but a spokesman for the agency declined to comment on individual cases, citing doctor-patient confidentiality. Speaking generally, Dr. Michael Kussman, the VA's acting under secretary for health, tells NEWSWEEK that the department is trying to reach veterans earlier, as they approach their date of discharge, and that he does not believe Iraq and Afghanistan are straining resources severely. "The impact on the VA so far has been relatively small," Kussman says. "It has not kicked the system over in our budget and in our ability to absorb it."

Still, a jump in disability claims in recent years has created a bottleneck. Daniel Cooper, the VA's under secretary for benefits, confirmed his department was coping with a backlog of 400,000 applications and appeals; 75 percent of them were still within a "reasonable" reviewing time frame, he says. Yet, most of those claims were filed by veterans of previous wars (a veteran can file or appeal a claim even decades after discharge). As more servicemen and women return from Iraq, the backlog is likely to increase. Cooper says the average waiting time for a benefits claim is about six months. NEWSWEEK turned up a number of veterans who'd waited longer. Keri Christensen, a National Guard veteran and a mother of two, says the VA in Chicago took 10 months to process her application. Rory Dunn, who nearly died in an IED attack outside Fallujah, says his application was delayed because, among other things, the VA mixed up his file with that of a Korean War veteran.

Feges's claim was finally approved last month: after NEWSWEEK and the advocacy group Veterans for America began looking into his case, he got a call from a VA official in Waco, Texas, with the news that his money would come through. Last week he received back pay to the date of his application.

The compensation is not huge. A veteran with a disability rating of 100 percent gets about $2,400 a month—more if he or she has children. A 50 percent rating brings in around $700 a month. But for many returning servicemen burdened with wounds, it is, initially at least, their sole income. "When I started school, that's when it became really hard not to have that money," says Feges.

One reason to worry about a crush of new vets at the VA has to do with the proportion of wounded to dead Americans in Iraq. Though we tend to mark the grim timeline of the war by counting fatalities, what really distinguishes this conflict is how many soldiers don't die, but suffer appalling injuries. In Vietnam and Korea, about three Americans were wounded for every one who died. The ratio in WWII was nearly 2-1. In Iraq, 16 soldiers are wounded or get sick for every one who dies. The yawning ratio marks progress: better body armor and helmets are shielding more soldiers from fatal wounds. And advanced emergency care is keeping more of the wounded alive. The VA's Kussman says that soldiers who survive the first few minutes after an explosion have a 98 percent chance of surviving altogether. But that means an increased burden on the VA's health-care system.

Two such survivors are Albert and Connie Ross. Albert lost a leg when a rocket-propelled grenade landed close to him in August 2004 while he was on patrol in Baghdad. Connie lived through a 2004 suicide bombing in Mosul but suffered multiple fractures and burns. When the two met in a hallway at Brooke Army Medical Center in San Antonio, Texas, Connie thought she noticed a certain swagger in Albert's walk. "He had this weird dip in his walk, so I asked him, 'Why are you pimp-walking in a hospital?' And he said: 'I'm not pimp-walking, I'm an amputee.' I was so embarrassed." The two married earlier this year and are expecting a child.

Though he's been in the VA system for more than two years now, Albert still doesn't have a primary-care doctor. Without one, getting appointments with specialists can be difficult. "You're supposed to be assigned one right away," says Albert, who now lives in San Antonio. "I'm not frustrated so much as worried—worried if and when something does go wrong, something will happen with one of my legs ... They [primary-care doctors] are the ones who have to fill out a work-order form; it's impossible to do anything without them."

One thing Albert desperately wants to do: get a new prosthetic. He's one of the early African-American amputees of the war. But the fake limb he's been given matches the skin tone of a Caucasian. It so embarrasses Albert that he always wears a sock over it—even if he's in sandals. "He's very self-conscious about it," says Connie. "It really bothers him."

Albert's situation is probably atypical. The VA says a huge majority of veterans get primary-care doctors within 30 days. But people inside the system do concede there's a shortage of mental-health workers at many of the VA's hospitals and clinics across the country. And Schulze is not the only veteran to commit suicide after being turned away. In a similar case in 2004, the VA twice neglected to treat Iraq veteran Jeffrey Lucey for posttraumatic stress disorder (the second time because he was told alcoholics must dry out before being accepted to an inpatient program). By the time a VA counselor tracked down a bed in a New York facility with a built-in detox program, Lucey had already hanged himself. "The system doesn't treat mental health with the same urgency it treats general health care," says a senior VA manager who did not want to be named talking about shortcomings in the agency.

Even when veterans get to the right doctors, understanding how to leverage what they need from the system can be mind-bending. Tonia Sargent, whose husband, Kenneth, nearly died in a sniper attack in Najaf in 2004, says no one ever sat her down and explained the benefits and how to access them. Her husband's brain injury made him often incapable of understanding his own care. Key decisions fell to her alone. It's a "don't ask, don't tell system," she says.

Kenneth is a Marine master sergeant who'd been in the Corps for nearly 18 years. He was on his second tour in Iraq when a sniper bullet ricocheted off the metal hatch on his vehicle and hit him directly below the right eye, grazing the front of his brain and exiting near his left ear. Among other things, he was diagnosed with traumatic brain injury, which has become the signature wound of the Iraq war. Tonia had to fight the Marine Corps to keep him from being discharged, figuring he'd get better medical care if he remained in active service. But some of his treatment has been outsourced to the VA.

One of the tricks she learned early on was to demand photocopies of her husband's records—every exam, every X-ray, every diagnosis—and personally carry the file from appointment to appointment. "I don't know if there is a more formal protocol for transferring documents, but I know that what I brought ... was definitely put to use." When Sargent was transferred to the VA's lauded Polytrauma Center in Palo Alto, Calif., doctors there encouraged her to go home to Camp Pendleton near San Diego and treat his stay at the hospital as if it was a deployment. "After two weeks, they asked me how long I was planning to stay with my husband," she says. "They said it was his rehab, not mine. But I needed to learn how to care for him, and he suffered from extreme anxiety without me." She pushed back, staying in Palo Alto until he completed his care.

How can the system improve? Bilmes, who authored the Harvard study, proposes at least one drastic change—automatically accepting all disability claims and auditing them after payments have begun. (The VA says that would be an irresponsible use of taxpayer money.) Other critics have focused on raising the VA's budget, which has been proposed at $87 billion for 2008. More money could go toward hiring more claims officers and more doctors, easing the burden now and preparing the VA for the end of the Iraq war, when soldiers return home en masse.

But veterans' support groups and even some former and current VA insiders believe there's a reluctance in the Bush administration to deal openly with the long-term costs of the war. (All told, Bilmes projects it could cost as much as $600 billion to care for GWOT veterans over the course of their lifetimes.) That reluctance, they say, trickles down to the VA, where top managers are politically appointed. Secretary Jim Nicholson, a decorated Vietnam War veteran who was chosen by Bush in 2005, tends to be the focus of this criticism.

The senior VA manager who did not want to be named criticizing superiors told NEWSWEEK: "He's a political appointee and he needs to respond to the White House's direction." Steve Robinson of Veterans for America levels the accusation more directly. "Why doesn't the VA have a projection of casualties for the wars? Because it would be a political bombshell for Nicholson to estimate so many casualties." The VA denies political considerations are involved in its budgeting or planning. Nicholson declined to be interviewed but Matt Burns, a spokesman for the VA, called Robinson's comments "nonsensical and inflammatory," adding: "The VA, in its budgeting process, carefully prepares for future costs so that we can continue to deliver the quality health care and myriad benefits veterans have earned."

Fratto, the White House deputy press secretary, says money is not the problem. He points out the VA has had a hard time filling positions in some remote parts of the country. "You need to find people who are trained in PTSD and other disorders that are affecting veterans and find those who are willing to go to places where they are needed."

As is often the case in America when government institutions falter, however, community groups are already stepping into the void. Veterans of Foreign Wars has advocates helping vets negotiate the VA bureaucracy, much the way health facilitators in the private sector help consumers get the most from their health insurance. Robinson, of Veterans for America, has pulled together teams of volunteers—physicians, psychologists, lawyers—who give vets free services when the local VA branch falls down. At his office recently, he was coordinating a traumatic-brain-injury screening with a private doctor for a veteran who'd been denied access to VA care. The fact that Americans are coming forward doesn't absolve the VA of its obligation to provide first-rate care for veterans. Most of the wounded's problems just can't be solved by private citizens and groups, no matter how well meaning. But it does serve to remind us that we should take better care of veterans wounded in the line of duty as they make their way home, and try to remake their lives.

Untreated Wounds (NSWK)

By Babak Dehghanpisheh

Newsweek, February 26, 2007

Private Atiya was driving a heavy truck on the outskirts of Baghdad when he saw the flash. Then, a deafening boom and darkness. When Atiya came to, he was lying on the side of the road and the truck, still carrying 11 of his colleagues from the Iraqi National Guard, was rolling on without a driver. He looked down. "I saw my leg was gone," he says, squeezing his eyes shut at the memory. "It was the worst pain." One of his arms was broken, the other severely burned.

Atiya (who asked that only his first name be used for safety reasons) is one of thousands of members of the Iraqi security forces who have been wounded on the job. That attack, near the town of Abu Ghraib last Wednesday, was the third time Atiya, 32, has been hit by an IED since he joined the Guard last year. He was quickly taken to the American-run Combat Support Hospital, known as the Cash, in the Green Zone, often the first stop for critically wounded soldiers. "These guys are in harm's way more than any other slice of the Iraqi population," says an American doctor at the Cash who asked not to be quoted by name.

During a speech last year, the then secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld noted that Iraqi security forces take casualties at "roughly twice the rate of all Coalition forces." That's approximately 40,000 wounded and more than 6,000 dead, grim numbers by any measure. (Both the Iraqi Ministry of Defense and the U.S. military refuse to divulge data on Iraqi wounded for "security reasons.") "I've lost many friends," says Atiya, a soft-spoken man with a thick black mustache and receding hairline. At the Cash, Iraqi and American soldiers receive the same state-of-the-art care until they're stabilized. But for the Iraqis, it's downhill from there. "The problem is what happens afterward," says the U.S. doctor. "The safety net is very low."

Most of the Iraqi soldiers are first transferred to a hospital in central Baghdad that, by local standards, has decent equipment and well-trained doctors. Some Sunni troops are terrified of being absorbed into the public-healthcare system, which is run by officials with ties to the Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. All the Baghdad hospitals that receive Iraqi wounded have heavy security to guard against insurgents.

Under Saddam Hussein, an extensive infrastructure was put in place to deal with the casualties of the dictator's wars. Military hospitals were set up for long-term care and an Association of Veterans' Affairs helped the disabled and paid out pensions. Now one of the largest former military hospitals is used by squatters and the veterans' office doesn't deal with soldiers who signed up after 2003. A spokesman for the Ministry of Defense says that wounded soldiers are looked after well and continue to receive their salaries even if they can't return to the job. But anecdotal evidence suggests otherwise. Shakir Mohammed, a fair-haired 27-year-old soldier from Baghdad, received severe burns on the right side of his body from an IED attack in 2004. After treatment at the Cash, he says the Iraqi Army forgot about him. "When we left the hospital, no one asked about us anymore," he says. "All aid stopped at that time."

Mohammed still has nasty purplish scars on the right side of his body and says he's often in pain. He's also back on the job: with unemployment as high as 50 percent, the roughly $550 he receives each month is tough to beat. "There are no other jobs," says Mohammed. Swathed in bandages, Private Atiya looks down at his missing left leg and says he hopes the Guard can find him a posting in Najaf, his hometown. "I have no regrets," he says. "I want to serve."

Militant Iraqi Shiite Cleric Denounces Security Push (NYT)

By Damien Cave And Wisam A. Habeeb

The New York Times, February 26, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 25 — Iraq's most powerful Shiite militant cleric publicly repudiated the new Baghdad security plan for the first time on Sunday, according to a statement distributed by his aides that said the push to quell violence was doomed to fail as long as it was directed by the American military.

The cleric, Moktada al-Sadr, controls the Mahdi Army, the largest Shiite militia in Iraq, and without his support for the stepped-up security effort, the prospects for continued sectarian violence and a direct conflict with American troops could increase.

His precise whereabouts have remained unknown since Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki announced the start of the plan two weeks ago. Until now Mr. Sadr seemed to cooperate, allowing his most unruly commanders to be arrested and ordering his organization to focus on political rather than military resistance.

It was unclear why he would turn against the joint American-Iraqi plan, but many of his followers have been losing patience with the failure of the security push to eliminate violence against Shiites. On Sunday, that violence included a suicide bombing by a woman that killed 40 people at an elite Baghdad university attended mainly by Shiite students.

"There is no good that comes from a security plan controlled by our enemies, the occupiers," the statement said. "If you stay away from them, God will protect you from horror and harm. Make sure your plans are purely Iraqi and not sectarian."

The statement attributed to Mr. Sadr was read to a crowd of several hundred supporters in Baghdad's largest Shiite neighborhood by a top aide to his organization. The statement, which did not call on supporters to resist the plan but reiterated his longstanding demands for an immediate American withdrawal, is likely to put more pressure on Prime Minister Maliki, who recently called the security plan a "dazzling success."

In fact, since the plan started, violence in the capital has seemed to abate only marginally, with some days of relative calm and others pocked with violence that begins at dawn and continues until dark.

The Americans have repeatedly asked for patience and have emphasized that the plan's results will only become evident after several months.

On Sunday, Lt. Col. Scott R. Bleichwehl, an American military spokesman, said the denunciation by Mr. Sadr — who controls 30 seats in Parliament that the prime minister relies on for power — would not deter the security push. He said Iraqis supported the effort.

"The coalition is committed to working together with our Iraqi partners to reduce the violence and help protect the population," he said. "All of our operations are being done with the full cooperation with the Baghdad operational command and the duly elected Iraqi government."

The bombing on Sunday at Mustansiriya University's college of economy and administration wounded at least 55 people, most of them students, many of them women. Most suicide attacks in Iraq have been conducted by men, but since the first woman exploded herself at an army recruiting station near the Syrian border in September 2005, a handful of other women have carried out attacks.

The suicide bomber at Mustansiriya arrived at the busiest time of day, at about 12:40 p.m., minutes before the start of afternoon exams. Officials said she approached the campus through a middle pathway, between separate canopied entrances for men and women. When guards saw her trying to enter, they questioned her, and she moved quickly toward the building, the officials said.

The blast shattered glass all the way through the surrounding academic buildings, from front to back. An hour and a half later, the walkway where the explosion occurred was covered with blood, body parts, skirts, veils, blood-stained textbooks and steel ball bearings.

Inside the main room of the security building closest to the blast, where women are checked before being allowed in, a pool of water red with blood rippled at the doorway.

After the attack, about 10 American Humvees, along with Iraqi Army vehicles, were deployed at the site. Iraqi police officers patrolled the scene after hearing reports that a second suicide bomber might be on the way.

In a campus courtyard about 25 yards from where the explosion hit, students and neighbors dug small holes around a flower bed so they could bury some of what was left at the scene.

Hussain Ali al-Mousawi, a middle-aged blacksmith who said he lived across the street from the university, collected body parts on a notebook, placing severed fingers, pieces of skull and flesh on pages covered with student notes.

He said he had been carrying bodies, and the sleeves of his striped cotton shirt were soaked bright red.

He walked over to the holes and placed clothing, flesh and debris into the ground. Stunned Iraqi policemen stared. All around him, students crouched or sat on the ground crying.

At one point, a group of young men pulled away a wailing first-year accounting student who could not bear to leave. His arms resting on the shoulders of two friends, he shouted through tears; “I don’t want to go home, I don’t want to go home. I want to die here! I want to die here where my friends have died! How can I come back tomorrow without them?”

Mr. Mousawi continued his work. He showed a reporter the remains he sought to bury. “I don’t know what they’ve done to deserve this,” he said. “What have they done wrong?”

Many of the surviving students expressed defiance. Falah Hasan, 35, a third-year management student standing nearby blamed Syria, Saudi Arabia and other countries for sowing destruction in his country. He said that Iraqis would not give up.

“We are burying here the minds of our society,” he said, pointing to the ad hoc graves being filled by Mr. Mousawi, the blacksmith. “We are planting them anew. How many of our great minds have they killed? They are targeting the students who are carrying pencils — our dirty neighbors.”

“We shall reconstruct the great Iraqi mind from the beginning. This land will produce more minds than ever.”

The attack Sunday was the second recent assault at a branch of the university. Two car bombs and a suicide bomber killed at least 70 people at a nearby campus on Jan. 16.

Other colleges throughout Iraq have been made targets in the past year, reflecting what is widely viewed as an attempt by Sunni extremist groups like Al Qaeda to drive out Iraq’s middle class, the secular and the educated.

Also on Sunday, a car bomb struck near the Iranian Embassy in central Baghdad, killing one person and wounding four. Several mortars landed in Abu Dshir in southern Baghdad, and another car bomb in central Baghdad wounded four.

Bomber Targets Baghdad College; At Least 39 Students, 9 Guards Die (WP)

BAGHDAD, Feb. 25 -- A suicide bomber detonated a belt of explosives Sunday afternoon at a university in Baghdad, killing dozens of students, in the second large-scale attack on a college campus in the capital this year.

At least 39 students and nine guards were killed in the blast at the college of administration and economics of Mustansiriya University in northwestern Baghdad, according to Fadil al-Amiri, the school's administrative dean.

Last month, at least 70 people were killed in a bombing at the university's main campus.

"The students were coming very happy, very enthusiastic, anxious to take their exam," the dean said in a telephone interview. "It is catastrophic. They're like ripe flowers, just starting their lives."

The attack was one of the deadliest in the capital since stepped-up security measures in the capital officially took effect on Feb. 14. U.S. and Iraqi officials have taken measures to limit vehicle access to markets, government buildings and other sites frequently targeted by insurgents using car bombs. But the officials have expressed concern about the difficulty of intercepting suicide bombers with explosives strapped to their bodies.

Universities in Baghdad have remained open despite a string of threats, attacks and kidnappings targeting students and professors. Amiri said he spent the afternoon visiting injured students at hospitals.

"I knew these people," he said. "They considered me their guide. They are preventing people from coming to study in order to disable the education system."

Hours after the bombing, a statement attributed to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr criticized the security plan. The statement, issued in the holy city of Najaf, said that "bombs continue to explode" under a plan "controlled by the occupiers," a reference to the United States.

The statement expressed support for Iraq's security forces and called for reconciliation between Sunnis and Shiites. Sadr, the leader of the Mahdi Army, a powerful Shiite militia, is widely seen as a wild card in the success of the security plan.

"You are capable of protecting Iraq and its people with your faith, your sacrifice, your patience, your unity and your love, and not by the occupier and his tanks and planes," the statement said. "The security plan will not be good if it is controlled and ruled by our enemies, the occupiers."

Also Sunday, a spokesman for Iraq's Oil Ministry said a draft of the country's much-anticipated oil law still faces a potentially lengthy legislative review process. Kurdish officials announced Saturday that they had endorsed the draft bill, which still must be considered by a committee headed by the prime minister's office, said Assem Jihad, the Oil Ministry spokesman.
